IAMES, our dread Soveraigne, 910.

HENR. SPELMAN Mil. Lectori.

NOn leve, nec temerè laudo tibi foria, lector,
Gratum opus & dignum consule (crede) vides.
Noster hic Ortelius, sic nostrum hunc exhibet orbem,
Vt res eminent, tota Britanna, simul.
Ora, sinus, fluvii, portus, nemus, oppida, tractus,
Regna, ducès, populi, fœdera, bella, quies.

S^r. Rich. Saint George Norrey King at Armes, in favour of this worke.

IT is farre from my purpose, to commend without cause, or by overcurious flourish to make a shadow seeme a substance, this worke needs no such deceptio visus; The subject is of it selfe honorable, and able to stand without such weake proppes. The glory of our Nation being almost buried in the pit of obscurity, is herein revived, the continuance of Christianity traced from age to age, the antiquity and situation of our Townes, Castles, Religious Houses, Nobility, and all other memorable matters so lively portrayed, as in a glasse we may rightly discerne the true shape, quality and condition of each of them in particular. This worke therefore being now brought upon the publike stage and view of the world, may in my poore censure give satisfaction to the learned Reader, and abide the touch of the malignant opposer; which being effected effected without hope of gaine, or vaine ostentation with so great care, both of body and minde, is the more precious, for, difficilia quæ pulchra. Wherein Gods power is made knowne in this his weake, but worthy instrument: and the glory of Great Britain made more famous to the world, as well in the Geographicall demension of the Lands situation, as in the Historicall relations of her most famous Monarchs, and glorious Actions; no Kingdome hitherto so particularly described, nor Nations History by true record more faithfully penned: In honour whereof, I sacrifice these lines of my love, upon the Altar of this worke, and celebrate the Authors remembrance to future posterities.

To my friend M^r. IOHN SPEED, being very sicke.

GReat love, and little skill may cause me to missay,
But certainly this sicknesse cannot make thee die:
Though cruell symptomes, and these thirteene yeeres assay
For thy deare country, doth thy health and strength decay;
Tet stih thy toylsome labour, and thy industry
Is for thy Countries sake, her fame on hie to raise:
Shee shall thy temples crowne with everlasting bayes,
And in despite of death, shall cause thy memory
To live in endlesse fame with all posteritie.

Now may shee see her beauty, and her riches store,
What erst shee was in every age, and change of state,
And present greatnesse such as never heretofore,
Since this great Monarch rul'd from north to southerne
And stih thy life is to thy Country dedicate, (shore
Let none presume thy lawrell from thy head to reave
For this her story, which thy skilfull hand did weave:
But live, and weare it(Speed)untill the worlds great fate
Shall bring all earthly things unto their utmost date.

IO. SANDERSON.

THE PROEME TO THE LEARNED AND LOVERS OF GREAT BRITAINES GLORY.

HAving thus farre travelled in the portrait and description of this famous Empire of Great Britaine, I might here have rested, and claimed the priviledge that yeeres and imbecillity have brought me unto: had not a farther desire in others urged it a matter incident, historically to lay down the Originals of those Nations, and successions of those Monarchs, which either by birth or conquest have aspired to the Imperiall Crowne. And albeit I find my selfe both tired in the former, and most unfit to prosecute this latter, yet will I endeavour to give herein my best assayes; though as my labours, so my wants also, thereby will be made more vulgar to the world.

Heraclite. For if those men were blame-worthy against whom Heraclité exclaimeth, who with long toile and great trouble finde a little pure substance in a great deale of base earth: how shall I then free me from the like imputation, that from so many mines of pure metals, have gotten so little Oare, and the same neither well tried in my defective fornace, nor yet artificially cast off through the default of the mould; wanting both skill for to fashion, and measure to performe the true proportions that in such a project is to be required; and how often these my defects have disswaded my proceedings, is best knowne to him that is the searcher of the heart.

But by what fate I am inforced still to goe forward, I know not, unlesse it be the ardent affection and love to my native Country; wherein I must confesse that Nature in those gifts hath beene both liberall, yea, and prodigall, though Fortune as sparing and fast handed against me, ever checking the Bit with the Raines of necessity, and curbing the meanes that should illustrate my labours: which moves me oft times to thinke, that if the great Philosopher Theophrastus; had cause on his death-bed to accuse Nature, for giving man so long a lesson, and and so short a life; then I against Fortune may as justly exclaime, that hath assigned me so great a subject and so little meanes. And therefore let it not seeme offensive that I draw my waters from the Cisterns of others, who am not able to fetch them at the spring-head my selfe: Neither that I strike upon the same Anvile unto their sound, though nothing so loud, nor with the like strength; wherein yet this fruit at least will (I hope) redound of my endeavours, that I shall incite the more learned; if not otherwise, yet in emulation of me, to free the face drawne by Apelles, from the censure of the fault or defect in the foot, and not onely to amend, but even to new-mould the whole. Which thing though my dayes are neere spent; and with Barzillai I may say that Musicke to me is now unpleasing: yet doth my eare thirst after the set of that straine, as Socrates thoughts ranne ever on his Booke: who the night before he was to suffer death, was desirous to learne Musicke, because he would die, learning still something. Moses the first Governour of that Common-wealth, which whiles it stood, was the glory of the earth, and a paterne to all kingdomes succeeding, left this for a Law to remaine for ever, That the Fathers should teach their children; and should commit unto writing those things which the Lord in their dayes dayes had done; and enjoined the children likewise to enquire of the times that were past, even from the first creation of man: For when as Empires and Kingdomes, Common-weales and Cities, doe end and perish, yet the Histories thereof doe remaine and live; And that made Cicero to say as he did, That Salamina should be utterly forgotten, before the things that were done in Salamina should perish: And therefore as among the wise answers of Thales, the Histories of Countries are to bee accounted for Principals, either as Cicero calleth them the Mistris of life, and expositions of Times; so likewise let us from the lyricall Poet Simonides learne this further, That he is perfectly happy that knowes his native countrey, to be truely glorious. And as Cassidore calls him a worthy Citizen, that seeketh the commodity of his Countrey: So contrarise he is by Bale esteemed but a fruitlesse clod of earth, that sucks the sappe of his soile onely to himselfe, whose memorial shall perish as the dispersed smoke in the clouds, though for a time he mount aloft in his swelling pride. This naturall love and true affection to our Native Country we may further learne from the ancient Patriarkes and Fathers themselves; who besides a desire that they had to theirs, continually to live therein during life, commanded their bodies to be buried therein after death: from whose Bowels they first had assumed their breaths, and in whose bosome they laid their bones, as in their last bed of rest. Yea, of the unreasonable creatures, the Birds and Beasts, wee may learne this love, that alwayes are willing towards their home. And if it happen that Countries grow unkinde as Homers did, that in his old age and blinde, suffered him to beg his bread; or that a Prophet in his owne Countrey is not esteemed, as Ieremy felt it, and Christ Iesus taught, yet did the one for his peoples captivity wish his eyes a fountaine of teares, and the other for his Countries destruction lamented and wept, holding it unlawfull to take the children's bread, and to give it unto others.

Thucydides. Socrates.

2 Sam. 19. 35. Deut. 11. 19. 20. Deut. 4. 32.

That this our Countrey and subiect of History deserveth the love of her inhabitants, is witnessed even by forraine Writers themselves, who have termed it the Court of Queene Ceres, the Granary of the Westerne World, the fortunate Iland, the Paradise of pleasure, and Garden of God; whose Typographicall descriptions for the whole Iland, and Geographicall Survayes for the severall parts, exceed any other kingdome under the cope of Heaven; that onely excepted which was conquered and divided by Iosuah; And for fruitfulnesse and temperature may be accounted another Canaan; watered with Rivers that doe cleave the earth, as the Prophet speaketh, and maketh the Land as rich and beautifull, as was that of Egypt. Our Kings for valour and Sanctity, ranke d with the worthiest in the world, and our Nations originall, Conquests, and continuance, tried by the touch of the best humane testimonies, leave as faire a Lustre upon the same stone, as doth any other, and with any Nation may easily contend (saith Lanquet) both for antiquity and continuall inhabitants, from the first time that any of them can claime their Originals.

And although our many Records are perished by the invasions of strangers; through their covetous Conquest of so faire a Land, or in the civill dissentions of home-bred Aspirers that have sought the possession of so rich a Crowne, yet Truth hath left us no lesse beholding unto her, then mightier Nations, and them that would be fayre more famous. Neither is it to be wondred at, that the Records of Great Britaine are eaten up with Times teeth, as Ovid speakes, when as in Times Ruines lie buried their Registers, that have been kept with a stronger guard, as Titus Livie in the entrance of his History affirmeth of the Romanes. As for those things (saith hee) as are reported either before or at the foundation of the Citie, more beautified and set out with Poets fables, then grounded upon pure and faithfull reports, I meane neither to averre nor disprove. Of whose uncertainties, let us awhile heare the reporters themselves speake, before we proceed to the certaine Successions of our British Monarches: untill which time the credit of our History may well be said to waigh with (if not downe-peize) many others. Varro (that learned Romane Writer, who lived an hundred yeeres before the birth of our Saviour Christ) calleth the first world to the Flood uncertaine; and thence to the first Olympias fabulous: Because in that time (saith he) there is nothing related (for the most part) but Fables among the Greekes, Latines, and other learned Nations. And therefore Plutarch beginneth the lives of his worthy men no higher then Theseus: because (saith he) what hath beene written before, was but of strange things, and sayings full of monstrous Fables imagined and devised by Poets, which were altogether uncertaine and most untrue. And Diodorus Siculus (that lived in Augustus Cæsars time, a great searcher after Antiquities, and for thirty yeares continuance a traveller into many Countries, for information and further satisfaction) writing his History called Bibliotheca, containing forty Bookes, and yeeres of continuance one thousand one hundred thirty and eight, of his first sixe himselfe giveth this censure in his Proeme. These Bookes (saith he) containing the Acts of ancient men, before the destruction of Troy, with the ancient Histories as well of Grecians, as of Barbarians, are called fabulous: Which moved Lucretius the Poet to demand this question:

Cur supra bellum Thebanum & funera Troiæ,
Non alias quondam veteres cecinere Poetæ?

Why have not Poets in their Works of fained Stories brought, Things done before the Warres of Thebes, or Troyes destruction wrought?

Yea, and of Troyes story it selfe, if we may beleeve Thucydides (whom Bodine commendeth for an absolute Historian) though it be ancient (saith hee) yet a great part thereof is fabulous. And Tully out of Plato complaineth of as much: For you Grecians (saith he) as children in learning, deliver onely things uncertaine, and have mingled Fables with the Wars of Thebes, and of Troy, things (perhaps) which never were, but gathered out of the scattered Verses of Homer and others, not digested by Aristarchus, and are yet uncertaine and obscure. And that the Greekes indeed were but Babes in Antiquity. Iosephus in his Nations defence against Appion sufficiently doth approve, where he affirmeth, That Invention of their letters was not so old as the siege of Troy, insomuch that the Poesie of Homer (then the which there is none more ancient among them) was not committed to writing, but sung by roate. And the Latine tongue it selfe by M. Cato, is said, not to have beene in use foure hundred and fifty yeares before the building of Rome. And Titus Livie their famous Historian, freely confesseth, That the use of Letters and learning among the Romanes, was very rare and hard to be found before the taking of Rome by the Gaules. Yea, and of the uncertainty of Romes foundation, how lavishly soever Historians have written, not only Fenestella hath continued whole Pages, but Plutarch likewise in the life of Romulus, hath many sayings, whereof this is one; The Historiographers (saith he) doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause, the great name of Rome (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through the world) was first given unto it; some affirming that the Pelasgives after they had runne over a great part of the world, lastly, stayed themselves in that place where Rome was new built, and for their great strength in Armes, gave name to that Citie Rome, which signifieth power in the Greeke tongue. Other say, that certaine Troians after their siege, in certaine Vessels saved themselves by flight, and being put into the Thuscan Sea, anchored neere to the River Tyber: whose wives being extreamely Sea-sicke, through the counsell of Roma a Lady, the wisest and worthiest among them, set fire on the whole Fleet; whereupon their husbands (though sore offended) were inforced to make use of their present necessity, and neere unto Palantium planted this Citie, whose Fame presently grew great, and in honour of Lady Roma, named it Rome: and from hence they say the custome of * kissing in salutations came; after the example of these wives, who to appease their husbands wraths with smiles and imbracings, kissed their mouthes. Some will have the name Rome from Roma, the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or else of Telephus the sonne of Hercules, and of the wife of Æneas. Others of Ascanius the sonne of Æneas. Some againe from Romanus the sonne of Vlysses and of Cyrce, will have it named Rome. Others from Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy, derive that name. And Romulus as that is most generall, and carrieth the most likelihood) to be Romes names Founder, do not agree about his Ancestors, as more at large in Plutarch appeareth. And therefore with Thucydides we may well say, It is a hard and difficult matter to keepe a meane in speaking of things, wherein scarcely can be had a certaine opinion of truth. And the rather for that the Writers themselves have blamed each others of affectation and falsehood, as in Iosephus we may see; who affirmeth, That Hellanicus dissented from Acusilaus, Acusilaus with Diodorus correcting Herodotus; Ephorus accused Hellanicus of untruths; so did Timæus reprove Ephorus of as much, Philistus and Callias dissented from Timæus in his History of Sicily, and Thucydides is accounted a lyar by some. Cæsar is taxed by Asinius Pollio (saith Suetonius) to be partiall in his Commentaries; and Tacitus by Tertullian is blamed for untruths; Fabius Maximus is reprehended by Polybius for defectively writing the Punicke warres; and himselfe againe with Silenus, Timæus, Antigonus, and Hierom, as much found fault with by Dionysius Halicarnasseus for writing the Romane Histories so unperfectly. And a man may use the very same speech against Dionysius, saith Bodine. These things thus standing, let us give leave to Antiquity, who sometimes mingleth falsehoods with truths, to make the beginnings of Policies seeme more honourable: And whose power is so farre scrued into the worlds conceit, that with Hierome we may say, Antiquity is allowed with such generall applause, that knowne untruthes many times are pleasing unto many. Yet with better regard to reverend Antiquity; whom Iobs opposer wils us to inquire after, and to our owne relations in delivering their censures, let this be considered, That more things are let slip, then are comprehended in any mans writings, and yet more therein written, then any mans life (though it be long) will admit

THE SITE AND CIRCVIT OF GREAT BRITAINES MONARCHIE.

THE FIFTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER I.

BESIDES thoſe fruitfull Ilands that diſperſedly are ſcattered about the Maine, like to beautifull Pearles that incompaſſe a Diademe, the Ile of GREAT BRITAINE, doth raiſe it ſelfe firſt to our ſight, as the body of that moſt famous and mighty Empire, whereof many other Kingdomes and Countries are parcels and members. Being by the Almighty ſo ſet in the Maine Ocean, as that ſhe is thereby the high Admirall of the Seas; and in the terreſtriall Globe ſo ſeated, as that ſhe is worthily reputed both The Garden of pleaſure, and The Storehouſe of profit, opening her Havens every way, fit to receive all forraine trafficke, and to utter her owne into all other parts: and therefore (as the Soveraigne Lady and Empreſſe of the reſt) deſerves our deſcription in the firſt place.

BRITAINE Admirall of the Seas.

(2) This Iland is ſo ſpacious and ample, that Ceſar (the firſt Romane diſcoverer thereof) ſuppoſed that he had found out another World: for to his ſeeming it appeared, that the Ocean was rather contained within that Mayne, then that Mayne, to be compaſſed with the Ocean about. And Iulius Solinus, for her circuit and largeneſſe, ſaith that it deſerveth the name of another world. But Ariſtides a Greeke Author ſpeakes much more properly, who by way of excellency termeth BRITAINE, The Great Iland: As likewiſe Tacitus, that undertooke to deſcribe BRITAINE by his owne knowledge, who ſaith, that of all Ilands knowne to the Romanes it was the greateſt: And ſo doth Dionyſius in his deſcription of the World.

In Panegyr. Orat. to Conſtantium.

Ariſtides.

Tacit. in vit. Agr.

BRITAINE the greateſt Iland knowne to the Romanes.

Dionyſius. Strabo. Rutil. Numat.

(3) But as Strabo compares the then knowne World, to a Cloake; Rutilius Numatianus, Italy, to an Oken leafe; and Dionyſius Spaine, unto an Oxe-hide: ſo the ſaid Tacitus in the life of Agricola, from Livie his ancient, and Fabius Ruſticus his moderne, doth liken the faſhion thereof to a long Diſh, or two-headed Axe: whoſe forme notwithſtanding may better be expoſed to the eye, in the draught before ſeene, then can be explained in words to conceit, or unto any other thing be compared beſides it ſelfe: eſpecially ſeeing that ſo many good Writers have had but very bad ſucceſſe in their reſemblances of Countries. And this of them is rather unlike to either, if we ſpeake of the whole, which then was unknowne, as it ſeemed by Tacitus. And the hugeenorme tract of ground beyond Caledonia, which runneth unto the furthermoſt point, growing narrow and ſharpe like a wedge, was firſt redoubled with the Romane fleet by Iulius Agricola, and BRITAINE diſcovered to be an Iland, one hundred thirty and ſix yeares after Iulius Ceſars firſt entrance therein.

Fabius Ruſtic.

BRITAINE diſcovered to be an Iland 136 yeares after Iulius Ceſars entrance into it. Tacitus in vit. Agric.

(4) Some have beene induced by the narrowneſſe of the Sea, and likeneſſe of the Soile, to thinke that BRITAINE was ſometime joyned to the continent of France: whereunto Servius Honoratius ſubſcribeth in his Commentary upon the firſt Eclog. of Virgil, who thereamentioneth.

——Penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos,

The Britaine people quite from all the world diſjoynd.

BRITAINE thought one continent with FRANCE. Servius Honorat.

As likewiſe by Claudian another ancient Poet it is ſtiled, ——noſtro dedu&a Britannia mundo,

The Britaine ſoile removed from our worlds continent.

Claudian.

And Vinianus with them affirmes, that in the beginning, Britaine and Gallia were both one Land. The like doth Virgil verifie of the Ile of Sicile, which in times paſt he reports to have beene one with Italy. Others hold, that all Ilands had their firſt ſeparation from the Maine by the rage of the generall Deluge, and that the mountaines thereby ſhewed their tops above the plaine grounds; and the plaines ſetling lower, became deepe vallies. When or whoſoever, by Gods divine ordinance and wiſedome, wee ſee that theſe Ilands ſituated in the Seas, doe no leſſe ſerve and adorne the Ocean it ſelfe, then the Lakes and Pooles of water doe the dry land, and all of them (as members of one maſſe) to miniſter ſuſtenance for the life of all things living, and pleaſures to the uſe and ſervice of man.

Vinianus.

Sicile thought once one continent with Italy. Dionicius Nigr. Though of ſome that all Ilands had their firſt ſeparation from the Maine by the rage of the Generall Deluge.

(5) The Iland of BRITAINE, of all others the moſt famous (by Catullus reputed the furtheſt towards the Weſt) is bounded on the South with Normandie and France, upon the Eaſt with Germany and Denmarke, upon the Weſt with Ireland and the Atlanticke Ocean, and upon the North with the vaſt Deucaledon Seas. The length thereof, meaſured by the graduations to both extremes, that is, from the Lyſard Point Southward in Cornwall, which lieth in the Latitude of 50 degrees, and 6 minutes, to the Straithy head in Scotland (being the furtheſt point of this Iland towards towards the North) set in the degree 60. and 30. minutes containeth (according to the scale of the terrestriall Globe) six hundred twenty foure miles: not to trouble the Reader with other accounts, seeing the same so exactly to agree with the spaces of the Heavens. And the extent of Land in the broadest part is from the Landsend in Cornwall, in the West (situated in 14 degrees, and 37 minutes of Longitude, according to Mercator his Atlas) unto the Iland Tenet, in the East of Kent, (lying in 22 degrees, 30 minutes) and containeth miles 340, as they have delivered, that with curious search have laid the dimension thereof.

Catullus.

Britains length.

Britains bredth.

(5) The site of this Iland is set by the Mathematicks in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and the Longitude likewise placed betwixt the Parallels fourteene and twenty six: a seat as well for Aire as Soile, both fruitfull and milde; and for length of dayes, pleasant and delightfull: for in the height of Summer the day is said to be eighteene Equinoctiall houres long, whereof sixteene and a halfe are spent from Sun to Sunne. Yea, and Tacitus saith, that in the furthest North part of the Iland, the nights are so short, that betwixt the going out, and comming in of the day, the space is hardly perceived, and the Sunne seeme neither to set nor arise: Because (saith he) the extreame and plain parts of the earth project a low shadow, and raise not the darkneſſe on high, so the night falleth under the skie and stars. Better might he have said, by reason of the inclination of his Circle to the Horizon, descending not directly, but passing obliquely, razing as it were under their Horizon.

BRITAINE in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and for Longitude placed between the parallels fourteene and twenty five.

In the furthest North part of Britaine the nights so short, as the space betwixt the dayes going and coming can hardly be perceived. In vit. Agricolæ.

(7) The aire, saith Strabo and Tacitus, is rather inclinable to showres then to snow. And Cæsar commends it to be more temperate, and the cold lesser, then that in France, as not subject to either extreames as the more Northerne and Southerne countries are: to which temperature Cæcenius Getulicus, a very ancient Poet seemeth to have respect, when of this Iland, thus he verifiieth:

Cæsar com. 5.

The cold in Britaine, lesse then in France.

Non illic Aries vernò furit asperus agris,
Gnosia nec Gemini præcedunt cornua Tauri.
The horned Ram there butteth not the aire of tender spring:
The Twins, nor Bull do to this soile vnimely seasons bring.

Trolus in Virgil. Georgic. 1.

(8) And although the Seas thereof are accounted and called by Nubiensis the Arabian, The darke and dangerous Seas, in regard of the misty vapors that therefrom arise, yet in the Winter season those clouds are dispersed into still showres of raine, that doe dissolve the rigour and great extremitie of the cold: yea, and those Seas themselves stirred and working to and fro with the windes, doe thereby waxe warme (as Cicero saith) so that a man may easily perceive within that world of waters a certaine heate enclosed. And Mitrutines Felix proving that God hath a speciall regard to the severall parts of the world, as well as to the whole, saith, that Britaine, though other whiles wanting the aspect of the Sunne, yet is it releeved with the warmth of her invironing Seas; and as much refresheth, we may well say, by those sweet and gentle winds that in the height of Summer are sent from those seas, and doe abate the rigour of the Suns great scorching heat; and yeeldeth not onely entercourse for Trafique into all parts of the World, but plentifully aboundeth with all sorts of fish, to the great benefit of the Inhabitants; and bringeth forth Pearles, as Tacitus sheweth, which were usually cast out with the flood, and gathered at the ebbe. These Pearles though not altogether so orient as they in India, by Amianus in his 23 Booke and 12 chapter, are called Rich gems. And Pliny in his ninth booke and thirtie fifth chapter, useth the like tearme: The desire whereof (as Suetonius saith) drew Cæsars affection for the Conquest of Britaine.

Britaines winds in summer assuage the heat.

Tacit. Agricola.

Ja vit. Cæsar. cap. 47.

Britaine abounderh with all sort of graine.

(9) The soile (saith Tacitus) setting aside the Olive, the Vine, and such other plants as are onely proper to hotter Countries, taketh all kinde of Graine, and beareth it in abundance: it shooteth up quickely, and ripeneth slowly: the cause of both is the same, the over-much moisture of the soile, and the aire. And Cæsar writeth, that for timber it was stored of all kindes, as in Gallia; the Beech and Firre-tree onely excepted. For abundance of Graine, Britaine is said to bee The seat of Queene Ceres, by Orpheus the old Poet; and the Granary and Storehouse for the Westerne World, as Charles the Great termed it. And by our owne ancestors in the blacke booke of the Exchequer, it is called A Paradise of Pleasure. From whence the Romans were wont yearely to transport (with a fleet of eight hundred vessels bigger then Barges) great store of Corne for the maintenance of their Armies. But vnto the particular relation of each severall blessing belonging to this most happy Iland, we will not againe enter, seeing that in every Country we have sufficiently, and no more than truly, spoken thereof. Onely, if ye please, heare what hath been said of this Land by the Romane Orators, and first in the Panegyricke to Constantius the Emperour.

Cæsar com. lib. 5.

Britaine called the seat of Queene Ceres.

Panegyric. to Constantius.

(10) O happie BRITAINE, and more fortunate then all other parts beside, which first dedst see Constantine Emperour! For good cause hath nature endowed thee with all blessings both of aire and soile: wherein there is neither excessive cold of Winter, nor extream heat of Summer: wherein there is so great abundance of graine, that it sufficeth both for bread and drinke. There the forrests are free from savage beasts, and the ground voyd of noysome serpents: in whose stead is an infinite multitude of tame cattle that are with their Vdders strutting full of milke, and loden with fleeces to the ground. And verely (that which for the use of our lives we much esteeme) the dayes are therein very long, and the nights never without some light, for that those utmost plaines by the sea side cast and raise no shadowes on high; and the aspect both of skie and starres passeth beyond the bound of the night: yea, the very Sunne it selfe, which unto us seemeth for to set, appeareth there onely to passe by a little, and goe aside.

In Britaine neither excessive cold of winter, nor extreame heat of Summer. Britaine abounding with all plenty of food for mans sustenance and delight.

Britaine nights never without some light.

And in another, spoken to Constantine, the father of Constantine the Great, thus is said:

Panegyr. spoken to Constantius.

Though Britaine be but a single name, yet surely the States losses have been manifold, in forgoing a Land so plentifull in fruit and graine, so rich in pasturage, so full of mines and veines of mettall, so gainefull in tribute and revenewes, so accommodated with many havens, and for circuit so large and spacious.

BRITAINE full of mines of mettals. Remayns.

And a Poet of good antiquity, of natures motherly affection towards this our Iland, hath thus written:

Tu nimio nec frigida gelu, nec sydere fervens,
Clementi cælo temperieque places.
Cum pareret Natura parens, variaque fevore
Divideret dotes omnibus una locis,
Sepositit potiora tibi, matremque professa,
Insula sis felix, plenaque pacis ait.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid desiderat usus,
Ex te provenient, vel alunde tibi.
Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art;
Thy ayre a heavenly temper, sweetly breath'd,
So pleas'd Dame Nature when she first bequeath'd:
To every soile of her rich gifts a part;
Then Mother-like best choice for thee she sought:
Be thou (quoth she) the Blessed Ile of peace.
What ever pleasure yeelds, or wealths increase,
From thee shall grow, or shall to thee be brought.

(11) And that BRITAINE hath beene taken for those fortunate Ilands whereof the Poets have imagined a perpetuall spring time, is certaine by Isacius Tzetzes, a Greeke Authour of good account. And in Robert of Avesbury we read, what time Pope Clement the fixt had elected Lewis of Spaine, to be Prince of the Fortunate Ilands, raising him powers both in Italy and France, the English Leigier Ambassadours, that lay then in Rome for King Edward the third, were so deepely set in the opinion, that this preparation was made against BRITAINE, that they wrote their suspicions conceived, and presently with-drew themselves into England, to certifie the King of these designes. And it seemeth Pope Innocent the fourth was of the same minde, when (as Matth. Paris. Writeth) hee said, Vere hortus deliciarum est Anglia: vere puteus inexhaustus est: Et ibi multa abundant, de multis multa possunt extorqueri, &c. Certes, the Kingdome of England is the very Paradise of pleasures, a Well which can never be drawen dry: where many things doe abound, and whence many things may be extorted, &c. With which his conceit he was afterward so farre transported with a longing desire, as he made great meanis and earnest suit to the King of England (as the said Author writeth, ad ann. 1250.) that hee might come into England to see that Country which was every where so much renowned. In a word, BRITAINE is so rich in commodities, so beautifull in situation, and so resplendent in all glory, that if the Omnipotent (as one hath said) had vouchsafed to fashion the world round like a ring, as he did like a Globe, it might have bin most worthily the onely Gemme therein. Whose Vallies are like Eden: whose Hills are as Lebanon: whose Springes are as Piscah: whose Rivers are as Iordan: whose Walls is the Ocean: and whose defence is the Lord IEHOVAH.

(12) The body then of this Imperiall Monarchie (wherein not onely the greatnesse of it selfe in it selfe, but also extendeth her beautifull branches into many other Countries and Kingdomes farre jacent and remote.) This greatnesse is made the more sensible, for that the Iland in times past sustained at once no lesse then eleven Kings in their royall estates, all of them wearing Crownes, and commanding great powers. Such was the Heptarchy of the Saxons seven Kingdomes, seated on the South of Severius his Wall. Two Kingdomes thence had their sites in that Northerne part, and their severall Kings of Scots and Picts ruling on both sides the Clude, even unto the Deucaledonian Seas. And two Kingdomes (if not more) divided into North and South, and their Kings of the ancient Britaines ruling the West part of this Iland beyond the Clavdh Offa, or Offa his Ditch, commonly called WALES.

Iosephus Iscan. lib. 7. cap. 13.

BRITAINE sustained at once no lesse then eleven Kings commanding great power.

(13) The Ilands likewise belonging to this Empire had Kings of their owne, as that of Man, the Orkades, and in Ireland at one time five Kings raigning together. France also is annexed; and so was Cyprus sometimes with some Provinces of Syria, subdued by K. Richard the first, surnamed Cœur-de-lion. And at this present in the new World of America, a Colony of BRITAINS is seated in that part now called VIRGINIA, whereby the borders of our Soveraignes command and most rightfull title may be inlarged, and the Gospell of Iesus Christ further preached, which no doubt will in time be imbraced, to the salvation of many and great honour to the BRITAINES. And that the borders of this most royall Tent have beene wide spread in former times, White of Basingstock is of opinion, who affirmeth that the limits of the British Empire in old time was from the Orcades unto the Pyrenean mountaines. And that King Athelstan, after his conquest of those Northern parts with that of Denmarke wrote so his title: which further is confirmed by the Charter of King Edgar for the foundation of the Cathedrall Church at Worcester, wherein likewise he so stiled himselfe. The inlargement whereof we pray to be accomplished, especially in those parts where God is not knowne, according to the saying of the Prophet, that the curtaines of our habitations may be further spread, with increase on the right hand and on the left and that our seed may possesse those GENTILES, and dwell in their Cities: Whereby the ninth Nation may be converted unto CHRIST, as eight others before this time by English-men have been.

CHAPTER. II.

The first inhabiters of this Iland being meerely barbarous, never troubled themselves to transmit their originals to posterity. Cæsar. com. lib. 6. Druides the onely wise men among the first Inhabitants of this Iland. If the first inhabitants of this Iland had written any thing of their originall, yet it must needs have perished. Gildas de excidio Britanniæ. No understanding of the first affaires of this Iland, but from forraine Writers. Polybius.

AS touching the first Inhabitants and originall Names of this Iland, things are so farre cast into the misty darknesse of obscurity and oblivion, that there is no hope left us, so lately borne, to discover them; especially knowing that the first Inhabitants being meerely barbarous, never troubled themselves with care to transmit their Originals to posterity: neither if they would, could have done, being without letters, which onely doe preserve and transferre knowledge unto others. But admit they had letters, yet was it not lawfull for them to commit their affaires to writing, as Cæsar doth testifie of the Druides, the onely wise and learned men among them, that had the managing both of Iustice and religious Rites. And had they committed these things to writing, yet doubtlesse had they perished in the revolutions of so many ages as are passed, and so many conversions or eversions of the State. Gildas and Ninius, the Britaines first Historians, confesse plainely, that they had no understanding of the ancient affaires of this Iland, but from forraigne Writers; and neither that above two hundred and odde yeares before the birth of our Saviour Christ. At which time Polybius a most grave Writer, and an attendant upon Scipio, faith, that Regions Northward from Narbona (as this is) were utterly unknowen; and whatsoever was written or reported of them, was but a dreame. And therefore untill such time as the Romane Writers reach forth their hands to direct us, wee shall wander, as without a guide, and shall seeme to heape more rubbish upon former ruines.

Tzetzes. Writers the best directers for the antiquity of Britaine.

(2) Yet let this be granted, that the Originall names of Countries and Provinces were first assumed from their possessors, whereof Iosephus in the seventh Chapter of his first booke of Antiquities, is a sufficient Witnesse, who in the dispersion of Noahs sonnes and his nephewes, named the Countries according to their families. So did the children of Dan name Laish their families. So did the children of Dan name Laish after their father: Iair his Cities that he conquered in the land of Gilead: and Iudea from Iudah, whose King was of him. And that this also was the practice of the Gentiles, Perionius doth shew, who saith, that himselfe knew no Nation in the earth, which would not have their names either from their Prince, Captaine, or King: the example whereof he inferteth, that Spaine was so named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus, and the like.

Perionius de origin. Gallicæ. Spain named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus.

(3) And accordingly from Samothes the sixth sonne of Iaphet (whom Moses calleth Mosech) the brother of Gomer, and of Iavan, whose seed is said in the tenth of Genesis to have replenished the Iles of the Gentiles

Samothes the first sonne of Iaphet: the first inhabiter of this Iland, who named it Samothea after his owne name. Diod. Sicul.

Gentiles, is brought by some Authors into this Iland, the yeere after the generall Floud two hundred fifty and two, where he feated, and gave Lawes to his people, and left to his posterity the name thereof to be called Samothea, after his owne. But fith the credit of this Samothes and his Samothea ariseth onely from a small and new Pamphlet, bearing the name of Berosus the Chaldean, bolstred out under a flew of aged Antiquity, and thrust into the World under the countenance of the ancient Historian himselfe: I meane not to enforce, seeing my purpose is to expose this most beautifull Iland in her owne beseeming attire, and not deformed by these rotten and patched rags. And of this forged Berosus wee have better cause to upbraid Iohannes Annius his Countenancer & Commenter, then the Egyptian Priests had to twit Solon, in accusing the Grecians, that for History he had not attained to the yeares of a gray head. For it exceeds not much one hundred and twenty yeares since the same Booke first appeared in the World; and then vehemently suspected as fabulous by Lodovicus Vives, and afterwards convicted by the learned Gasperus Varrerius in a severall Treatise, and now universally rejected of all skilfull Antiquaries.

The credit of this Samothes and his Samothea, stifleth only from a small and new Pamphler, bearing the name of Berosus the Chaldean.

Ludovicus Vives, Gasperus Varrerius. Berosus rejected.

ALBION the name of this Iland so termed by the Grecians.

(4) But the name ALBION is better received, being found so tearmed of the Grecians in ancient time, as in the Booke De Mundo, written to Alexander, and supposed to be Aristotles, Pliny in his Naturall History, Ptolomy, Strabo, and others: yet upon what ground it should be so called, there arise many conjectures. Pomponius Mela, Nicolas Perottus, Rigmanus Philelfus, Aristotle, and Humphrey Lhuyd, derive it from Albion Mareoticus a Gyant, and sonne of Neptune, that conquered (as they say) these Samotheans, and seated himselfe in this Iland the yeare after the Floud three hundred thirty five. And if that be true which Perottus and Lilius Giraldus have written, then may this Albion give name to this Iland. Notwithstanding, Strabo, Munster, and Frier Bartholmew, will have it so named, ab albis rupibus, of the rockes and white cliffes appearing towards the coasts of France: which carrieth the more likelihood through the credit of Orpheus a most ancient Poet, who in his Argonauticks (if so be they were his) calleth the Iland next unto Hibernia, or Hernin, which questionlesse is this of ours, ἀκτὴν, λεύκην, that is, the white Land. And accordingly have the Welsh Poets called it Inis Wen. And this is further confirmed from Cicero, who termeth these whitish cliffes mirificas moles; as also by the anticke Coins of Antoninus Pius, and Severus the Roman Emperors, wherein BRITAIN is stamped in a womans attire sitting upon rocks. And the same being chalky, or of a plaster-like substance, Fracastorius supposeth was the cause of the sweating sickneſſe, and whereof Albion had the name. Unlesse some will derive it from Alphon, which as Festus saith, doth signifie white in Greek, or Olbion, rich or happy, in regard of the fertility of the soile, wholsome temperature of the Aire, and the rich commodities in the same: either from Alpion for the high situation. But from the Latine albis rupibus it could not be derived, when that language was unknown to the world. Marianus the Monke, Iohn Rous, David Pencair, and William Caxton, from others more ancient, do fetch the name thereof from Albina the beaurifull daughter of Diocletian King of Syria, who with her fifters thirty in number, for the slaughter of their husbands, were banished their Countrey, and without man, oares, or tackles, were committed to the mercy of the Seas, who after many adventures, lastly arrived upon this shore, where they inhabited, and gave name to this Iland, calling it Albion after the name of their eldeſt ſiſter: and accompanying with Divels, brought forth a Progeny of Gyants, if we will beleeve the Legend of this moſt impudent liar, which is worthily rejected by Badius, Volaterranus, Harding, Bale, Iohn Rous, and others. But that the name Albion was both of great acceptance and long continuance, is apparent by the worthy Epitheton of King Edgar the Saxon, who in his Charter for the foundation of the Abbie of Ely, hath these words: Ego Edgarus Basileus dilectæ Insulæ Albionis, subditis mihi sceptris Scotorum, Cumbrorum, & omnium circumcirca Regionum, quieta pace fruens, &c. By which he knitteth the whole Iland together, as a land worthily to be beloved, and calleth it ALBION.

(5) The next name ascribed unto this Iland is Britaine, and that first found and given by the Grecians, who were the first discoverers of these Westerne parts of the world: either from their painted bodies, as their neighbours (if not ancestours) the Gaules were named of their long shaggie haire, or of their rich mettals therein gotten, and thence carried in abundance into other Countreies; or from Brute, that with his dispersed Trojans conquered it, as he of Monmouth hath translated; or what occasion soever I dispute not: onely in feares me I shall give but small satisfaction to the desirous Reader, of the cause and originall of this name, being consorted with so many uncertainties, wherein the further we follow this intangled threed, the further are we led into the Labyrinth of ambiguity. But as Plutarch, Livie, and other Latine Writers have complained of the many fictions and fables of Poets intermingled with the histories of truth, whereby truth it selfe was often made incredible; so we in rehearsing the divers names of Britany, and the reasons thereof by sundry Writers alledged, reſt free in our relations, either from impeaching the power of Antiquitie, or approving those things that are as yet wrapped up in Times oblivion, leaving the credit to them that have left the same unto us, and the censure of their opinions, to the judgement of the learned, and those of better experience.

Marianus Scotus. Iob. Rous. Albion, from Albina the beautifull daughter of Diocletian.

A ridiculous opinion for a progeny of Gyants in Albion.

Britaine the name of this Iland thought to take his name from Brute.

(6) The vulgar received opinion, held on with foure hundred yeares continuance, (some few mens exceptions had against the same) is, that this Iland tooke the name of Britannia from Brute the sonne of Sylvius, of whom more shall be spoken in the next Chapter for the peopling of this Iland, & from whom some (following a suspected Gildas) doe write the name Britaine: for so doth Hieronie, who translating Aethicus that excellent Scythian Philosopher, calleth both this and the Ilands adjacent, Insulas Brutannicas. But besides the many objections made both by forraine and home-bred Writers, that seeme to make the Story of Brute doubtfull, Humphrey Lhuyd a Cambre-Britaine, a learned and diligent searcher of Antiquities, doth confidently deny the name Britaine to be taken for Brute; and among many other observations, makes this an infallible argument, that the letter B, is not the first radicall of that name; and affirmeth boldly, that there is not any British word whose first radicall letter is B. And therefore he will have it to be anciently written PRYDCAIN, compounded of two British words, PRYD and CAIN, which signifie (as he saith) Beauty and White; the C. being lost in the latter word, for the more easie pronuntiation in the British tongue; and the P. in the former changed into B. by the Latines, for the more gentle and pleasant sounds sake: so that himselfe thinketh, that those learned and expert men in the British tongue, wch wrote the Ilands name with B. doe therein rather follow the Latines, then judging that to be the true name indeed: for proofe whereof hee citeth both ancient Copies, and Traditions of their own old Poets the Bards, by whom (saith he) it was usually called Prydain, as the fitteſt denomination for so beautifull a land. But if either colour or commodities were her God-fathers at the Font-stone, why was she not rather named, The Palace of Queene Ceres, or old orpheus termes her; either Insula florum, as it hath beene found written in a very ancient manu-script? And yet to second this his conceited name, I finde recorded by Bishop Cooper, a learned Writer, that which makes for that purpose. At Eryschurch (saith hee) two miles from Salisbury, in the digging downe of a wall, a booke containing twenty leaves of very thicke velome was found, which from the hands of Master Richard Pace, chiefe Secretary to the King, Ireceived; but being sore defaced, could read no one sentence thorow; thorow, yet did I well perceive the word PRYTANIA, (not called so, from the adjuncts White and Beauteous) but rather from the Greeke word Πρυτανία, Prytanya, which as he saith, doth signifie mettals. For the Grecians flourishing in wisedome, and experience, entred the Ocean, and finding this Iland full of Brasse, Tynne, Lead, Iron, Gold and Silver, gave name thereunto accordingly, and called it Prytania. Thus farre he. And some in regard of these rich commodities thence brought, will have it named Britannia, as upon like occasion Vibius Sequester affirmeth Calabria to have beene some time so called. Others, and those many, do hold a more strange opinion, namely, that this Iland was called Britannia, of Breta a Spanish word which signifieth Earth, for that it was separated from the maine land, and, say they, it was once ioyned with the continent of France. Of this opinion are Antonius Volscus, Dominicus Marinus Niger, Servius Honoratus, Vinianus Bodine, Twyne, and Verstegan. But how that name from that separation may be gathered, I understand not: for if it be granted that this Iland also was cut from the continent (as it is thought all others in the world were) by the violent rage of the universall flood, yet it followeth nor that this only should claime that name, and from that occasion more then any other, or then all of them so divided and set apart in the maine Ocean. Others there are that would have the name Britaine to bee brought from Britona a Nymph in Greece, daughter to Mars, who (as they say) to avoid the lascivious intents of Minos, forsooke the countrey, and passing the seas, arrived in this Iland, and by her the name arose, this hath Textor. But I might as well cite Calepine for his Anglia, and Marianus for his Albina, being all Fables, consorting alike together and fictions of the same authority that Virgils Dido is. Hefychius deriveth the name Britaine from Britannus the father of Celtice, on whom Hercules begat Celtus the original of the Celtæ, as Parthenius Micæus, a very ancient author writeth. And Sir Thomas Eliot, a learned Knight, draweth the name of this Iland from the Greeke fountaine alfo, but of other signification, viz. Πρυτανία, Prutania, by which terme the Athenians signified their publike revenues, and yet that is justly excepted against, seeing that it is a peculiar terme onely to the Athenians, and that the Grecians called this Iland Βρεττανία, not Πρυτανία, Goropius Becanus, in his Originall of Antwerp, saith, that the Danes sought here to plant themselves, and so named this Iland Bridania, that is, free Denmarke. And others derive it from Prutenia, a country in Germany. But that both these are fictions it manifestly appeareth, for that this Iland was famous by the name of Britaine many hundred yeares before that either Dania or Prutania were heard of in the world.

Parthenius Miceus. Sir Thomas Eliot. Britaine of the Greeke word Πρυτανία,

Pomponius Latus would have it Briton, and that name given it from the Britons in France. Indeed it is probable, that from the Celtes, the old Gaules, our originals defeended: but that the name should come of them, hath no colour of truth, seeing that those Britons came from us, and not we from them: and in Cæſars time that coaſt was called Armorica, but this of ours Britaine. Forcatulus deriveth the name thereof from Brithin a drinke, which as Athenæus saith was used among the Greeks. And others will have it from the Brutij a roaving and ſtragling people in Italy: both which are accounted but idle conceits, and for no leſſe we will leave them. White of Baſingſtocke will have the name thereof derived from an Hebrew word, and Iſidore from a word of her owne language. Thus then is Britanny burthened with many titles under one truth; and theſe are the aſcriptions, cauſes and exceptions, as farre as we are able to gather: all which muſt give place to that we which, to follow out of the collections and judicious obſervances of Maſter Camden. Ancient Nations had names of their owne: afterwards

(7) This then he holdeth for granted, That ancient nations in the beginning had names of their own: and that after from these the Greeks and Latines by wreſting them to the analogie or proportion of their ſpeech, impoſed names upon Regions and Countries, which tooke their denominations from their people and in-dwellers. So lewry was named from the Iewes, Media from the Medes, Perſia of the Perſians, Scythia of the Scythians, &c. And why not then by the authority of Martial, Iuvenal, Auſonius, Procopius, and in old inſcriptions ſet up by the Britaines themſelves, BRITTA, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITTVS, from BRIT, or BRITH, from whom any one being of that nation might be termed NATIONE BRITTO, as is ſeene ſo inſcribed in Saint Mary the Round at Rome: The Saxons likewiſe themſelves called the Britaines Brithy, and Witichindus the Saxon every where nameth the Britaines Britæ: ſo that the word BRITIS doubleſſe the Primitive, from whence BRITTO is derived, and from whence the firſt glimpſe of light leading to the word BRITAINE, ſeemeth to appeare, And that all nations deviſed their names of that, wherein they either excelled others, or were known by from others, whether in regard of their firſt founders honor, as the Ioues of Iavan, the Iſraelites of Iſrael, the Cananites of Canaan, or whether in reſpect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations, as the Iberi after the Hebrew Etymologie, becauſe they were Miners; the Heneti, becauſe they were ſtragglers; the Nomades, for that they were breeders of cattell; the Almanes for their eſteemed valour and manhood; the Frankners for being free; the Pannonians, as Dio conceiteth, of their coats with cloth-ſleeves; the Æthiopians of their blacke hue: and the Albans, becauſe they were borne with white haire, for ſo ſaith Solinus, that the colour of their heads gave name unto the people. Seeing the that theſe our Ilanders were known & called by a name cõmon to both them & their neighbors, Cimbri or Cumeri, and had no better marke to be diſtinguiſhed and knowne from the borderers, then by their cuſtome of painting their bodies, whereof the moſt approved authors doe witneſſe, as Ceſar, Mela, Plinie, Martial, and others, who affirme that the Britains uſed to colour themſelves with woad, called in the Latin glaſtum (and Glaſe at this day with them doth ſignifie blue) what if I then ſhould conjecture (ſaith hee) that they were called Britains from this their painted bodies? for what is thus ſtained or coloured, in their ancient countrey ſpeech is called BRIT. Neither let this Etymologie of Britains ſeeme to be either harſh or abſurd, ſeeing the very words found alike, & the name alſo as an expreſſe image repreſenteth the thing which in Etymologies are chiefly required: for Brith, and Brit, do paſſing well accord: And the word Brith among the Britaines, impliesth that which the Britains were indeed, to wit, painted, ſtained, died, and coloured, as the Latine Poets deſcribe them: having their backs pide or medly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them. From which colours and uſe of painting, the ancient Britaines (as he thinketh) had their names, and is yet in uſe among the Welſh. But this is certaine that a Britain is called in the Britiſh tongue, BRITHON, and as BRITHO came of BRITH, ſo did BRITANNIA, who as Iſidore ſaith, tooke the n ame from a word of their owne nation: for what time the ancient Greeks (that firſt gave name to this Iland) either as Rovers, or Merchants travelled into other remote and farre diſioyned countries (as Eratoſthenes reporteth) learned from the Inhabitants themſelves, or elſe of the Gaules which ſpake the ſame language, that this our nation was called Brith and Brithon: They then unto the word BRITH, added TANIA, which in the Greek Gloſſaries betokeneth a REGION, and where of they made a compound name Βρεττανία, that is, the BRITONS-LAND. And that this is ſo, the countries alſo lying in the Weſt part of the world, as Mauritania Luſitania, and Aquitania, doe ſufficiently confirme: for the Grecians being the firſt Surveiors of thoſe regions of Mauri, who, Strabo ſaith, was called Numidia, made Mauritania, of Luſus the ſonne of Bacchus, Luſitania; and of Aquis (waters, as Ivo Carnotenſis is of opinion) called the country Aquitania: as alſo Turditania, and Baſtitania, Provinces in Spain, might ariſe from the Turdi, & Baſti their poſſeſſors. And that this maner of compoſition is moſt uſuall in the names of countries we ſee: For came not Ireland by compoſition of the Iriſh word Erim? Did not Angle-terre, grow together of an Engliſh and French word and became England? Doth not Franc-land proceed from a French and Saxon word? Came not Poleland from a Polonian word, which with them betokeneth a plaine? and was not Danmarch compounded of Dan, and the Dutch word March, which signifieth a bound or limit? Neither have we cause to wonder at this Greeke Addition TANIA, seeing that S. Hierom in his questions upon Genesis, proueth out of most ancient Authors, that the Greeks inhabited along the Sea-coasts and Iles of Europe thorowout as far as to this our Iland. Let us read, saith he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Sisinius Capito, as also the Greeke writer Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Ilands well neere, and all the sea coasts of the whole world, to haue been taken up with Greek inhabitants, who, as I said before, from the mountaines Amanus & Taurus, euen to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side. And verily, that the Greeks arrived in this our region, viewed and considered well the site and nature thereof, there will be no doubt nor question made: if we obserue what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Tauromnites, who was in Britaine in the yeare one hundred and sixty before Cæsars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an inscription unto Vlysses in Greeke letters, erected in Caledonia as Solinus saith, and lastly, if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans heere, hath delivered and written as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had euer discovered unto the Greeks, Britaine, Thule, the Belgick countries, and their sea coasts especiall, if the Greeke ships had not entred the British and German Ocean, sea, and related the description therof unto their Geographers? had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of six dayes sayling beyond Britaine, unlesse some of the Greeks had shewed the same? Who euer told them of Scandia, Bergos, and Nerigon, out of which men may saile into Thule? And these names seeme to haue been better known unto the ancient Greeks, then either to Pliny or to any Roman. Whereupon Mela testifieth, that Thule was much mentioned and renowned in Greeke Writers: Pliny likewise writeth thus; Britaine an Iland famous in the Monuments and Records both of the Greeks and of us. By this meanes therefore, so many Greeke words haue crept into the Britisb, French, and withall into the Belgick, or Low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Bayfius, and Budæus, doe make their vaunt and glory in this, that their French-men haue been of old colonies, that is, lovers & studious of the Greeks, grounding their reason upon few French words of that Idiome, which receiue some marks and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrianus Iunius joyeth no lesse, because in the Belgike words there lie coverily Greeke Etymologies: then may the Britaines make their boast in whose language many words there be derived from the Greeke. Thus farre Master Cambdens judgement for Britannia.

Which name we finde first mentioned by Polybius the Greeke Historian, who lived and travelled with Scipio thorow most parts of Europe, about 265. yeeres before the birth of Christ. And after him Athenæus a Greek Author of good account, and before the yeare of Grace, 179. mentioneth the name of Britaine, and that upon this occasion: King Hiero, saith he, framing a ship of such hugenesse and burden, as was admirable to the world, was much troubled for a tree, whereof he might make the maine Mast: which at last with much adoe was found in Britaine, by the direction of a Swineheard: and by Phileas Tauromnites the Mechanicke conveyed into Sicilie, whereby that want was sufficiently supplied. To this let not the Criticks from Cæsar lay, that Britaine brought forth neither Beech nor Firre, as he in his fift booke of Commentaries affirmes (if by Fagus he meane the Beech) seeing that the same kind doth most plentifully grow in all parts of this Iland, and the Firre-trees for Masts in the North-West of Scotland, upon the banks of the Lough-argick of such great height and thicknesse, that at the root they beare 28. handfuls about, and the bodies mounted to 90. foot of height, they beare at that length 20 inches Diametre, as hath been measured by some in commission, & so certified to his Majesty; and at this present growing upon the lands of the right worthy Knight, Sir Alexander Hayes, his Majesties principall Secretary for Scotland. But among the Latine Writers, Lucretius was the first that before Cæsar mentioneth Britaine in these verses:

Lucretius.

Nam quid Britannum cœlum differre putamus,
Et quod in Ægypto est, quia mundi claudicat Axis:

(9) But about the same time, when as by Gods decree the Romans fulnesse was come to the wane, and the greatnesse of their glory did abate; by the downfall of that one Empire, many Kingdomes began to arise, and to have their Rulers, Lawes, and Limits of themselves. Among the rest, this Iland Britaine shortly came to be divided into three severall Kingdomes, and each of them to retaine an absolute power in their owne dominions, and were knowne by their severall and proper names. The first was Scotland from Scotia, and that from Scythia, as the best suppose, whose Southerne bounds was the famous Wall from Carlile to Newcastle, and from thence the enorme tract of all that Northerne Promontory was called Scotia, or Scotland. The second was Cambria, of us called Wales, sited in the West of this Iland, inclosing those waste mountaines with a ditch drawen from Basinwarke in Flint-shire in the North, to the mouth of Wye neere Bristoll in the South, so separated by great Offa the Mercian King. And the third was Angle-land, the East, the most fruitfull, and best of the Iland, lying coasted with the French and German Seas, so named when the united Heptarchie of the Saxons was ruled by king Egbert, who by his Edict dated at Winchester, An. 819. commanded the same to be called Angle-land, according to the name of the place from whence his ancestors the Angle-Saxons came, which was out of the continent part of Denmarke, lying betwixt Iuitland and Holsatia, where to this day the place retaineth the name Engleen. And therfore Calepine is to be rejected, that would haue the name from Queene Angela, and Goropius, of sacred Anglers; either from Pope Gregory his attributing Angel-like faces; or from others that would faine it from Angula the Giant-like brother to Danus; or force it from Angulus Orbis.

This Iland now called Britaine divided into three kingdomes. The first, Scotland, whose partition Southward is from Carlile to Newcastle.

The second, Cambria, or Wales, whose partition is from Basingwarke to Wye.

The third, Angle-land coasted with the French and German Seas.

(10) Neither indeed was it called England before the dayes of Canutus the Dane; but with Angle-land, retained still the names both of Albion and Britaine, as in a Saxon Charter made by King Edgar, the tenth in succession from Egbert, and no lesse then one hundred fourty and nine yeares after this Edict is seene, where in the beginning he stileth himselfe thus: Ego Edgar totius Albionis Basileus, &c. And in the end of the same charter thus: Edgar Rex totius Britannia Donocaenem,

This Iland named Angle-land of a place in Denmarke, called Engleen.

(11) This laſt name this Iland still retained, though two severall Conquests of two severall Nations were made of the same. Neither did William the Conqueror attempt to alter it, it founding belike so Angel-like in his eares, accounting himselfe most happy to bee King of so worthy a Kingdome: the glory whereof is further inlarged by the ranking of Christian nations, assembled in their generall Councels, wherein England is accounted the fifth, and hath place of precedency before kingdomes of larger territories. This name of England continued for the space of seven hundren eighty and three yeeres, unto the comming in of our Soveraigne Lord King JAMES, in Anno 1602. who by the hand of God hath united all these Diademes into one Imperiall Crowne, and reduced the many Kingdomes in one Iland, under the government of one Monarch: and after the manifold conquests, irruptions, and dissensions, hath setled an eternall amity; and extinguishing all differences of names, hath given the whole Iland the ancient name of Great BRITAINE, by his Edict dated at Westminster, quartring the royall Armes of his severall Kingdomes in one royall Scutchion, and for his mott, as is most meete,

CHAPTER III.

Britaine replenished with people before Noahs flood.

IT is not to bee doubted, but that this Iland with the Vniversall was replenished with people, immediately after that men began to bee multiplyed upon the earth, euen in the dayes of the former Patriarkes, and long before the Flood of Noah, as sundry ancient Writers have related. And surely if we consider in those first ages of the world the long life of many (the onely meanes to multiplication) and the worlds continuance for one thousand sixe hundred fifty and sixe yeeres before it was destroyed, wee shall easily yeeld, that every Country and corner of the earth was plentifully peopled and inhabited. And so much doe the Sacred Scriptures intimate unto us, where, by the Prophet Isaiah it is said: Thus saith the Lord, that created heaven; God himselfe, that framed the earth, and made it: he hath prepared it, he created it not in vaine; he formed it to be inhabited.

(2) But when the wrath of God was executed upon the world for sinne, and all over-whelmed with a Flood of waters, the whole earth thereby became altogether unpeopled, eight persons onely with the breed-reserved creatures saved in the floting Arke: Whose Port or Haven was the mountaine of Ararat in Armenia; whence with the blessing of procreation, mankind againe began to be multiplyed upon the earth; and from the confusion of Babels building, to be scattered by Tribes and Colonies, according to the diversity of Languages, into divers parts and Countries of the world, giving names to the places where they seated, according to the names of their Princes or chiefe Commanders. Amongst whom the sonnes of Iapheth the eldest sonne of Noah (whom Moses declareth to have peopled the Iles of the Gentiles) betooke themselves into Europe, these westerne parts of the world: as Sem did into Asia, and Cham into Africa: whose posteriities accordingly dispersed, Iosephus in his first Booke of Antiquities hath both branched into their severall divisions, and reduced them to their first rootes and originals.

(3) Now that the Iles of the Gentiles mentioned by Moses, were these of Europe, all learned men confesse: and therefore those especially of Britanny and Sicilie, as Wolfangus Musculus is of opinion. And that Europe fell to Iapheths portion, Iosephus and Isidore doe agree: who affirme his off-spring to have inhabited from the Mount Taurus all Europe Northward, so farre as the British Seas, leaving names both to places and people. And Gildas, as Nubrigensis witnesseth, and Polydore Virgil granteth, will have this Iland inhabited even from the Flood. But of these ancient things, saith Sebastian Munster, no man can write certainely, it depending only upon conjecturals, and the same by hearesay, and flying reports of private men, as Origen speaketh.

(4) Gomer then, the eldest sonne of Iapheth, gave name to the Gomerians, who filled almost this part of the world, leading (as Villichius saith) in the 10. yeere of Nimrod, a Colonie out of Armenia into Italy, which of Gomer were called Combri, and afterwards Cimbri: whence such as departed Italy went into the North parts and gave name to Cimbrica Chersonesus: from whence it is certaine wee the English proceed, and of whom also it is likely the Britaines came. For so judgeth a learned Britaine himselfe, who saith his countrymen the Welsh which are unlearned, as yet know no other name for their land and people, but only Cumbri.

Gomer the eldest sonne of Iapheth. Villichius. A Colony of Gomerians called Cambri or Cimbri, of Gomer, came into Italy. Englishmen were of Cimbrica chersonesus, which came from Italy. Iohn Leyns in Reform. hist. l. 1. cap. 9. Gaules of the Gomerians.

(5) And that of these Gomerians were also the Gaules, learned Clarenceaux that brighteſt lampe to all Antiquities, out of Iosephus and Zonaras sufficiently had observed; who that they were also called Cimbri, he proveth out of Cicero, and Appian Alexandrinus; that those Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainely termeth Gaules, where he saith, C. Marius represt the armies of the Gaules, entring in great numbers into Italy: which, as all Historians witnesse, were the Cimbrians. And the Habergeon of their king Beleus digged up at Aquæ Sextiæ, where Marius put them to flight, doth shew the same: whereon was engraven in strange characters BELEOS CIMBROS; as also the testimony of Lucan doth no lesse, who calleth the Ruffine hired to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Livy and Plutarch in the life of Marius affirme to be a Gaule. They also who under the conduct of Brennus spoiled Delphi in Greece, were Gaules, as all writers with one voyce agree, and yet that these were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyrickes doth teftifie. And for Brennus their Grand-Captaine, our Hiftorians report him to be a Britaine: as likewife Virgil (though in taunting wife) termeth that Grammarian the Britaine Thucydides, whom Quintilian affirmes to be a Cimbrian.

(6) And if of the reft of Noahs nephewes, feated in feverall countries, the Nations proceeding from them, are knowne by their originall names, as the Turkes of Togorma, whom the Iewes to this day fo terme, the Ionesi from Iaven, the Medes from Madai the Thracians from Tiras, and fo of the reft, whofe names as yet found not much unlike to their firft planters; why then fhall not we thinke, that our Britaines or Cumerians, are the very of-fpring of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination, the name fo neere according? Sith granted it is, that they planted themfelves in the utmoft borders of Europe, as Isidore hath faid. For the Arke refting in Armenia, and the people thence flowing like waters from the fpring, replenifhed thofe parts firft that lay next their fite, as Afia the leffe, and Greece before Italy: Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. And if we confider the occafions that might bee offered, either for diftburdening the multitudes of people, for conqueft, deftre of novelties, fmalneffe of diftance, or commodities of the ayre and foile, we may eafily conceive this Iland to have beene peopled from thence. For it ftandeth with fenfe that every country received their firft inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather then from them that lay more remote: for fo was Cyprus peopled out of Afia, Sicile and Candie out of Greece; Corfica and Sardinia, out of Italy, Zeland out of Germany, Iſland out of Norway, and fo of the reft. Now that Britaine had her firft inhabitants from Gaule, fufficiently is proved by the name, fite, religion, manners, and languages, by all which the moft ancient Gaules and Britaines have beene as it were linked together in fome mutuall fociety; as is at large proved by our Arch-Antiquary in his famous worke, to which I referre the ftudious reader.

(7) And although the inner parts of the Iland were inhabited, as Cæſar faith, of fuch whom they themfelves out of their owne records, report to have beene borne in the Iland: yet the Sea coaſts were peopled by thofe, who upon purpofe to make war, had paffed thither out of Belgia, and Gaule, who ſtill carried the names of thofe cities and ſtates, out of which they came: as the Belgæ, the Atrebatii, Pariſi, and the like names of people both in Gaule, and in Britaine, that after the warres there remained. Which is the more confirmed in that both the Provinces were governed by one and the ſame Prince, as Cæſar in his owne remembrance knew, and nameth one Diviticacus to hold a good part of Gaule, and alſo of Britaine under his government. Yea and Tacitus the moſt curious ſearcher into Britaines affaires, in the life of Agricola thus diſciphereth them. Now (ſaith hee) what manner of men the firſt inhabitants of Britanny were, forraine brought in, or borne in the land, as among a barbarous people, it is not certainely knowne. Their complexions are different, and thence may ſome conjectures bee taken: for the red haire of the dwellers in Caledonia, and mighty lymmes import a Germaine deſcent. The coloured countenances of the Silures, and haire moſt commonly curled, and ſite againſt Spaine, ſeeme to induce, that the old Spaniards paſſed the Sea, and poſſeſſed thoſe places. The neereſt to France likewiſe reſemble the French, either becauſe they retaine of the race from which they deſcended, or that in Countries butting together, the ſame aſpect of the heavens doth yeeld the ſame complexions of bodies. But generally it is moſt likely, the French being neereſt, did people the Land. In their ceremonies and ſuperſtitious perſwaſions, there is to be ſeene an apparant conformity. The Language differeth not much: like boldneſſe to challenge and ſet into dangers: when dangers come, like feare in refuſing: ſaving that the Britaines make ſhew of great courage, as being not moliified yet by long peace.

(8) Whereby wee ſee, that theſe Cimbrians (of whom, as Appian Alexandrinus ſaith, came the Celtæ, and of them the Gaules, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus affirmeth, with whom both Plato and Ariſtotle agree) were the ancient progenitors of theſe our Britaines: and them, with the Gaules, to be both one and the ſame people, is allowed by Pliny, that placeth them both in the continent of France; for ſo Euſtathius in his Commentary underſtandeth Dionyſius Aſar, that theſe Britaines in Gaule gave name to the Iland now called GREAT BRITAINE, as Pomponius Lætus and Beda before him had done. Theſe things conſidered, with the neereneſſe of their ſites for eaſy entercourſe, made both Cæſar and Tacitus to conceive as they did. Neither were theſe things following ſmall motives unto them: for their religion was alike, ſaith Lucan and Tacitus: their boldneſſe in warres, and manner of armes alike, ſaith Strabo, Tacitus, Dion, Pliny, Herodian, and Mela: their building alike, ſaith Cæſar and Strabo: their ornaments and manners alike, ſaith Pliny and Cæſar; their wits alike, ſaith Strabo and Tacitus: their language alike, ſaith learned Bodine; and in all things the unconquered Britaines to the ancient Gaules alike, ſaith Tacitus. And all theſe doe warrant us (me thinkes) to come from the Cimbrians, whoſe ſonnes, and our fathers, were the Celts and Gaules: the bands of whoſe amities were ſo linked together, that the Britaines gave ayde, and aſſiſted the Gaules againſt Cæſar, which was no ſmall cauſe of his quarrell againſt them.

(9) Not to derive the truth of our Hiſtory from the fained inventions of a forged Berofus, that bringeth Samothes to people this Iland, about one hundred fifty two yeeres after the Flood, to give lawes to the Land, and to leave it to his poſterity, for three hundred thirty five yeeres continuance: although he be countenanced by Amandus Zirixeus in the annotations of White of Baſing ſtoke: and magnified unto us by the names of Dis and Meſhech the firſt ſonne of Iapheth, from whom this Iland with a Sect of Philoſophers tooke their names, ſaith Textor, Bale, Holinſhead, and Caius: yet ſeeing this building hath no better a foundation but Berofus, and he not onely juſtly ſuſpected, but long ſince fully convicted for a counterfeit, we leave it, as better fitting the pens of vulgar Chroniclers, then the reliſh or liking of judicious Readers: whileſt with Laertius wee judge rather, that thoſe Sophies were termed Semnothees, and they not from Samothea, as Ariſtotles would have us beleeve.

(10) Neither foundeth the muſicke of Albions legion tunable in our eares, whom Berofus with full note, and Annius alloweth to be the fourth ſonne of Neptune, and him the ſame that Moſes calleth Naphthahim, the fourth ſonne of Mizraim, the ſecond ſonne of Cham, the third ſonne of Noah, (becauſe his fictions ſhould be countenanced with the firſt) who being put into this Iland by Neptune his father (accounted forſooth the god of the Seas) about the yeere after the flood three hundred thirty and five, overcame the Samotheans, as eaſily he might, being a man of ſo great ſtrength in body, and largeneſſe of limmes, that he is accounted among the Giants of the earth. Him Hercules ſurnamed Lybicus in battle aſſailed for the death of Oſiris his father, and after for 5 foure yeeres tyranny (ſaith Bale) ſlew him with his brother Bergion in the continent of Gallia neere to the mouth of the river Rhodanus: whence Hercules travelled into this Iland, as Giraldus (from Gildas the ancient Briton Poet) conjecture th, whoſe fifth dialogue of Poetrie hee had ſeene; and the rather beleeved, becauſe Ptolemy calleth that head of Land in Cornwall, Promontorium Herculis, and left the poſſeſſion of the Iland unto them of Cham, contrary to the meaning of the Scriptures, that made him a Captive, but never a Conqueror over his brethren, whiles their firſt Policies were ſtanding.

(11) The laſt, but much applauded opinion, for the poſſeſſing and peopling of this Iland, is that of Brute, generally held for the ſpace of theſe laſt foure hundred yeeres (ſome few mens exceptions reſerved) who with his diſperſed Trojans came into, and made conqueſt of this Iland the yeer of the worlds creation

This Brute is brought from the ancient Trojans by deſcent, yea and from the perſons of the heathen deified gods: as that he was the ſonne of Sylvius, who was the ſonne of Aſcanius, the ſonne of Aeneas, the ſonne of Anchiſes by Venus the Goddeſſe, and daughter to Iupiter their greateſt in account. And if Pliny and Varro hold it praiſe-worthy to challenge deſcents (though falſely) from famous perſonages, whereby, as they ſay, appeareth an inclination to vertue, and a valorous conceit to perſwade unto honour, as ſprung from a race divine and powerfull: then by all meanes let us liſten to him of Monmouth, who hath brought his Nation to ranke in degree with the reſt of the Gentiles, which claime themſelves to be the generation of the gods.

And Ninius is ſaid by the writer of the reformed hiſtory, to bring theſe Britaines from the race of the Trojans, foure hundred yeeres before that Geffrey wrote: yea and long before Ninius alſo, Taliefin a Briton Poet in an Ode called Hanes, or Tajeſſ his courſe of life, in theſe words, Mia deythynyma at Wedillion Troja, that is, I came hither to the Remnants of Troy.

(13) That William of Malmesbury (who wrote in the dayes of King Henry the firſt) was before him of Monmouth, is moſt certaine; yet doth he make mention of Arthur, a Prince (ſaith he) deſerving rather to bee advanced by the truth of records, then abuſed by falſe imputation of fables; being the only prop and upholder of his country. And Beda, his ancient alſo, nameth Ambroſius Aurelianus to bee King of the Britaines, long before that Geffrey was borne: So was Brennus mentioned by Livy; Bellinus, (if he be Belgius) by Iuſtine; Caſſibelan by Cæſar; Cunobilin by Suetonius; Arviragus by Martiall; Lucius by Euſebius; Coel, Conſtantius, Caraufius, and others by Eutropius, and Paulus Diaconus; and Helena by Nicephorus, Ambroſe, and Socrates. Theſe are the affirmatives that give countenance to the Archdeacon of Monmouths tranſlation, and credit to Brutes conqueſts and ſucceſſours; yea and John Harding his Herauld, in his home-ſpun poetry, can eaſily emblaze his armes to be Gules, charged with two Lions rampant endorſed Ore, and the ſame to be borne by the Kings of Troy. And his banner diſplayed at his entrance is ſaid to bee Vert a Diana of gold fitchell, crowned, and inthronized, the ſame that Aeneas bare, when he entred the land of the Latines. But the cenſures of theſe relations I leave to the beſt liking of judicious Readers, onely wiſhing them to be unlike the inhabitants under the rockes of the Cataracts of Nilus, whereof Cicero and Amianus make mention, who were made deafe by the continuall noiſe of the fall of Nilus: leſt by the ſound and loud voyces of theſe writers, the exceptions of others cannot be heard, which from the fulneſſe of their pennes I will likewiſe declare, without offence, I hope, unto any.

The ſtory of Brute fabulous.

(15) Whereupon Gildas our ancienteſt homeborne writer, (cited and in whole ſentences followed by venerable Beda, who termeth him the Britaines hiſtoriographer) in this of Brute is ſilent, and in his lamentable paſſions never dreames of him but as one overwhelmed with griefe bewaileth the wickedneſſe of the time wherein he lived, who was borne, as himſelfe ſaith, in the forty fourth yeere after the Saxons firſt entrance, about the yeere of Chriſts incarnation 493. and dyed, as Bale citeth out of Polydore, the yeere of our redemption 580. Ninius alſo another ancient writer, who lived above eight hundred yeeres ſince, taking in hand the Chronicles of the Britaines, complaineth that their great Maſters and Doctors could give him no aſſiſtance, being ignorant of skill, and had left no memoriall of things paſſed, nor committed their acts unto writing, whereby hee was inforced to gather what he had gotten from the annals and Chronicles of the holy fathers. Beda likewiſe, whoſe hiſtory ended in Anno 733. beginneth no ſooner then with Iulius Cæſars entrance notwithſtanding he had the aſſiſtance of the Abbat Albinus, who was brought up under Theodorus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and had begun the hiſtory of this land with moſt diligent ſearch from the records of the Kingdome of Kent, and the provinces adjoyning; as alſo being further aſſiſted by Daniel Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, who ſent him all the records that were to be found of the ſame Biſhopricke, South-Saxons, and the Ile of Wight. The like helpes had he from Abbat Eſſius, for the country of Eaſt-Angles; from Cymbertus and the brethren of Leſtinge for the province of Mercia, and Eaſt-Saxons. And from the brethren of Lindisfarnum, for the country of Northumberland; beſides his owne paines in collections, knowledge and experience: all which he did diſgeſt and hiſtorically compile, and before the publication thereof ſent it to King Ceolulphe at that time raigning in Northumberland, to be approved or corrected by his moſt learned ſkill: yet in none of theſe found he that hiſtory of Brute nor his ſucceſſors, which as ſome would have it, was then unbegotten in the world.

(16) After him Elward, as William of Malmsbury calleth him, or rather (as he writeth himſelfe) Patricius Conſul fabius Queſtor Ethelwerdus, a diligent ſearcher of antiquities, a reverend perſon, and of the blood royall, wrote foure bookes, briefly compriſing the whole hiſtory of England, from the beginning of the world unto the time of king Edgar wherein he lived; of Brute nor his Britaines ſpeaketh a word; but paſſeth with ſilence to the Romans and Saxons. What need I to cite Ingulphus, who dyed Anno 1109. Florentius of Worceſter, that flouriſhed in the dayes of King Henry the firſt, or William of Malmsbury, that wrote unto the end of his raigne; all of them writers before Geffrey of Monmouth, but none of them mentioning this ſtory of Brute. This moved Williams of Newbourgh, borne (as himſelfe ſaith) in the beginning of King Stephens raigne, and living at one and the ſame time with this Archdeacon of Monmouth, too too bitterly to inveigh againſt him and his hiſtory, even ſo ſoone as the ſame came forth: as in the procme of

of his book is to be seen. And that the words are his and not our owne, take them from him as they lye. In these our dayes (saith he) there is a certaine writer risen up, deviſing fictions and tales of the Britaines out of the vaine humors of his owne braine, extolling them farre above the valorous Macedonians, or worthy Romanes; his name is Ieffrey, and may well aſſume the ſirname Arthur, whoſe tales he hath taken out of the old fables of the Britaines, and by his owne invention augmented with many untruths, foiling them over with a new colour of the Latine tongue, and hath inveſted them into the body of an hiſtory. Adventuring further to divulge under the name of authenticke prophecies, deceitfull conjectures and fore-deemings of one Merline (a wizzard) whereunto alſo he addeth a great deale of his owne. And againe, In his booke which he hath intituled the Britaines hiſtory, how ſhamelеſſely, and with a bold countenance he doth lye, there is no man that readeth therein can doubt, unleſſe hee hath no knowledge at all in ancient true hiſtories; for having not learned the truth of things indeed, he admitteth without diſcretion and judgement, the vanity and untruths of fables. I forbeare to ſpeake (saith he) what great matters this fellow hath forged of the Britaines acts before the Empire and comming in of Cæſar. Thus farre Parvus. But I know the anſwer to this ſo great an accuſation: namely, that this William making ſute unto David ap Owen Gwyneth, Prince of North-wales, for the Biſhopricke of Saint Aſſaphs, after the death of Ieffrey, and thereof failing, falſly ſcandalized and impudently belyed that moſt reverend man. Which ſurely had been a great fault, and might of us be beleeved, had not others of the ſame ranke and time, verified aſmuch.

A device to put by this William of Newburghs accuſation.

(17) For Sylveſter Giraldus, commonly called Cambrenſis, that flouriſhed in the ſame time with the ſaid author, made no doubt to terme it The fabulous ſtory of Ieffrey. The like is verified by John Weathamſtead Abbat of Saint Albanes, a moſt judicious man that wrote in Anno 1440. who in his Granary giveth ſentence of this hiſtory as followeth. The whole diſcourſe of Brutus (saith he) is rather poeticall, then hiſtoricall, and for divers reaſons is built more upon opinion then truth; firſt becauſe there is no mention thereof made in the Romane ſtory, either of his killing his father, or of the ſaid birth, or yet of baniſhing the ſonne. Secondly for that Aſcanius begat no ſuch ſonne who had for his proper name Sylvius by any approved Author: for according to them, he begat onely one ſonne, and his name was Iulius, from whom the family of the Iulii tooke their beginning. And thirdly, Sylvius Poſthumus, whom perhaps Ieffrey meaneth; was the ſonne of Æneas by his wife Lavinia, and hee begetting his ſonne Æneas in the thirty eight yeere of his raigne, ended his life by courſe of naturall death. The Kingedome therefore now called England, was not heretofore, as many will have, named Britaine of Brutus the ſonne of Sylvius. Wherefore it is a vaine opinion and ridiculous to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of the challenge: for it is manhood onely that ennobleth a nation; and it is the mind alſo with perfect underſtanding, and nothing elſe, that gaineth gentility to a man. And therefore Seneca writeth in his Epiſtles to Plato, that there is no King but hee came from vaſſals, and no vaſſall but he came from Kings. Wherefore to conclude, let this ſuffice (saith he) that the Britaines from the beginning of their nobility have beene couragious and valiant in fight, that they have ſubdued their enemies on every ſide, and that they utterly refuſed the yoke of ſervitude.

Deſcript. Cambr. cap. 7. He flouriſhed in Anno 1210. Giraldus Cambrenſis calleth Brutts hiſtory the fabulous ſtory of Ieffrey. John Weathamſtead. The diſcourſe of Brutus diſproved by John Weathamſtead.

Aſcanius had no ſonne whoſe proper name was Sylvius.

(18) Now that William of Newborough, had ſufficient cauſe (ſay ſome) to exclaime againſt the fantacies of Merline, and the fictions of Arthur, is made manifeſt in the ſequell, not onely by the decree of that obtruded Councel of Trent, wherein was inhibited the publication of Merlines bookes; but alſo (in effect) by the ſtature enacted the fifth yeere of our laſt deceaſed Queene Elizabeth of bleſſed and immortall memory, wherein is forbidden ſuch fantaſticall predictions, upon occaſions of Armes, Fields, Beaſts, Badges, Cognizances, or Signets, ſuch as Merline ſtood moſt upon; and likewiſe William of Malmsbury ſaith, that Arthur being the onely proppe that upheld his country, deſerved rather to bee advanced by truth, then abuſed with fables wherewith that ſtory is moſt plentifully ſtored. And alſo, that Weathamſtead had reaſon to account Brutes acts and conqueſts, to be rather poeticall then any wayes warranted by the records of truth, appeareth by the ſilence of the Romane writers therein, who name neither Brute nor his father in the genealogie of the Latine Kings: and if any ſuch were, (ſaith the contradictors) how could they bee ignorant of the untimely death of their king, ſlaine by the hand of his naturall (though in this act unnaturall) ſonne? or what ſhould move them, being ſo lavish in their owne commendations, to be thus ſilent in their Brutes worthineſſe, that with ſeven thouſand diſperſed Trojans warred ſo victoriouſly in Gallia, conquered a kingdome of Giants, ſubdued a moſt famous Iland, raigned gloriouſly, and left the ſame to his poſterity; none of them, either in proſe or poetry once handled, but left to deſtiny to be preſerved by a long enſuing meanes, or to periſh in oblivion for ever? And ſurely this moved the whole ſenate of great Clerks to give ſentence, that never any ſuch Brute raigned in the world; ſuch as were Boccace, Vives, Hadrianus Iunius, Polydore, Buchanan, Vignier, Genebrard, Molineus, Bodine, and others.

(19) Yea, and there are ſome Critickes that faine would take advantage from the defenders of Brutes hiſtory themſelves, as from Sr. John Prys, that produceth many uncertaine enſamples of the originall of other nations, which granted, (ſay they) doth no wayes confirme the truth or certainty of our owne; neither is it any honour to derive theſe Britaines from the ſcumme of ſuch coopered people as the Trojans were. Humfry Lhuyd likewiſe denying abſolutely the derivation of the Britaines name from Brute, and bringing it from two compounded words, (as wee have ſaid) doth thereby weaken the credit of his conqueſt of this Iland to their underſtanding, as alſo the catalogue of his ſucceſſors, which are ſaid to raigne ſucceſſively for many hundred of yeeres after him. And another induſtrious Britiſh writer, having the helpe of two moſt ancient Britiſh copies, the collections of Caradock of Carnarvan, their owne Bardies every third yeeres viſitation, and twenty ſeven Authors of good account, (all of them cited in the preface of his Chronicle) beſides his helpes had in the offices of records for this realme; yet aſcending no higher then to the perſon of Cadwallader, Prince of Wales, whoſe raigne was in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation 682. and no leſſe then one thouſand ſeven hundred twenty and ſixe yeeres, after that Brute is ſaid to come into this Iland, doth not warrant (ſay they) the ſtory that is included betwixt, but rather even the ſame is interlaced with many doubtfull uncertaineties, and ſo left diſputable by the ſaid compiler himſelfe, as namely whether that this Cadwallader whom the Britaines claime to bee their King, bee not the ſame Chedwald whom the Saxons would have theirs; both living at one time, both in acts alike, and names neere, both abandoning their Kingdomes, both taking the habit of religion, both dying in Rome, both buried in one Church, nay, ſay they, in one Sepulchre. The like he bringeth of the Britaines Ivor, and the Saxons Ive, in the like coherences of names, acts, devotions, and deaths: ſo that this hiſtory of Brute carrieth not ſo ſmooth a current for paſſage as is wiſhed, nor is that Gordians knot ſo eaſily unlooſed.

foure collaterals. And yet goeth further: Though the Scripture (saith he) alledge Iudah, Hezron, Salomon, and Ezekiah, to be but yong when they begat their ſonnes, which (as Rabbi Iſack ſaith) might be at thirteen yeeres of age: And although Saint Auguſtine ſay, that the ſtrength of youth may beget children yong; and Hierome bringeth inſtance of a Boy that at ten yeares of age begat a childe: yet this doth not helpe to excuſe the miſtaking of yeares for the Britiſh Kings above mentioned.

Thus far John Lewis: and for the exceptions made againſt Brute: wherin I have altogether uſed the words of others; and will now (without offence, I hope) adde a ſuppoſall of mine owne, ſeeing I am fallen into the computation of times, which is the onely touch-ſtone to the truth of hiſtories, eſpecially ſuch as are limited by the bounds of the ſacred Scriptures, as this for Brutes entrance is. And that the ſame cannot bee ſo ancient (ſuppoſing it were never ſo certaine) as the vulgar opinion hitherto hath held, the circumſtance of time, to my ſeeming ſufficiently doth prove.

(20) For Brutes conqueſt and entrance are brought by his Author to fall in the eighteenth yeare of Heli his Prieſthood in the Land of Iſrael, and ſo is faſtned into a computation that cannot erre. Now the eighteenth yeare of Helies government, by the holy Scriptures moſt ſure account, is ſet in the yeare of the worlds creation, 2887. after the niverſall flood, 1231. and before the birth of our bleſſed Saviour 1059. yeares. Brute then living in this foreſaid time, was foure deſcents from the conquered Trojans (as he of Monmouth hath laid downe) which were Æneas, Aſcanius, Sylvius, and himſelfe: ſo that by theſe generations ſucceſſive in order, the very yeare almoſt of Troyes deſtruction may certainly be pointed out and knowne: which in ſearching hath been found ſo doubtfull, that by ſome it hath been thought to be a meere fable. Yet with more reverence to antiquity obſerved, let us caſt and compare the continuance of theſe foure generations unto Brutes Conqueſt, not ſhortning them with Barach, to be but ten yeares to an age: neither lengthning them with Joſephus, who accounteth one hundred and ſeventy yeares for a generation: but with more indifference let us with Herodotus, who wrote neerer theſe times, allow thirty yeares for a ſucceſſion, as hee accounteth in his ſecond booke. Now foure times thirty, make one hundred and twenty, the number of yeares that theſe foure Princes ſucceſſively did live: by which computation likewiſe meaſured by Scripture, the ruination of Troy fell in the thirty eight yeare of Gideons government in Iſrael, and was the yeare after the worlds creation, 2768. But the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, alledged out of Menander, Pergamenus, and Letus, deſtroyeth that time of Troyes deſtruction, and placeth it fully two hundred and thirty yeares after, even in the Raigne of King Salomon: for in his firſt booke Stromaton thus he writeth: Menalaus from the overthrow of Troy, came into Phœnicia, at that time when Hiram King of Tyrus gave his daughter in marriage unto Salomon King of Iſrel. Where, by him we ſee, that Troyes ruines and Salomons raigne fell both upon one time. And ſo Brute hath loſt of his antiquity, by this account, 230 yeares; and entred not in Helies Prieſthood, but rather in the uſurpation of Iudahs Kingdome by Athalia, and in the yeare of the world 3118.

(21) To whom let us joyne Joſephus, an Author of great credit, and without ſuſpicion in this caſe, who in his Nations defence againſt Appion, in both his bookes, confidently affirmeth himſelfe able to prove by the Phœnician Records of warrantable credit, that the city Carthage was built by Dido, ſiſter to Pigmalion, one hundred fifty and five yeares after the Raigne of King Hiram, which was Salomons friend, and one hundred forty three yeares, and eight moneths after she building of his moſt beautifull Temple. Now we know by Virgil, from whom all theſe glorious tales of Troy are told, that Carthage was in building by the ſame Dido, at ſuch time as Æneas came from Troyes overthrow, through the Seas of his manifold adventures. If this teſtimonie of Joſephus be true, then falls Troyes deſtruction about the twentieth yeare of Ioas raigne over Iudah, which was the yeare of the worlds creation 3143 whereunto if we adde one hundred and twenty yeares for the foure deſcents before ſpecified, then will Brutes conqueſt of this Iland, fall with the twelfth of Iothams raigne in the Kingdome of Iudah, which meets with the yeare of the worlds continuance 3261. And ſo hath he againe loſt of his antiquity no leſſe then 375. yeares.

(22) And yet to make a deeper breach into Brutes ſtory, and to ſet the time, in a point ſo uncertaine, as from which neither circle nor line can be truely drawne; Manethon the Hiſtorian Prieſt of Egypt, in his ſecond booke cited by Joſephus, affirmeth that the

Two hundred forty ſix yeares in time too ſhort for the raigne of ſeventy two Kings.

(23) But unto theſe objections I know the anſwer will be ready; namely, the diverſities of Scriptures account, being ſo ſundry and different, that the ſtory of Brute cannot thereby bee touched, but ſtill ſtandeth firme upon it ſelfe. Indeed I muſt confeſſe, that from the firſt Creation, to the yeare of mans Redemption, the learned Hebrewes, Greekes, and Latines, differ much, and that not onely each from others, but even among themſelves ſo farre, that there can be no indifferent reconciliation made, as by theſe ſeverall computations may be ſeene, as followeth:

The great differences in computation of yeares among Writers.

And yet doe theſe diſagreements helpe little the objectors if this be conſidered, that the maine foundation of theſe diverſities conſiſteth chiefly in the firſt world, before the Flood, wherein it is manifeſt, that the reputed Septuagint addeth to the Hebrew Originall, five hundred eighty and ſix yeares. And from the Flood to Abrahams birth, is accounted eight hundred and fifty yeares more then Moſes hath. As likewiſe the like is done in the latter times: for from the Captivity of Babylon, to the death of Chriſt, one hundred thirty and ſeven yeares, are added more then the Sunnes courſe hath meaſured: ſo that it ſeemeth the differences were not great for the times of Heli, Salomon, nor Iudahs Kings, in whoſe raignes Brute is brought to people, and poſſeſſe this Iland. But leaving theſe diverſities, and to come to a certainty, let us calculate, the yeares of the holy Hiſtory according as Functius, Beroaldus, and ſundry other Theologick Chronologers

Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 2.

Functius Beroaldus.

The accounting of yeares by the Scriptures, is a moſt ſure manner of computation.

nologers have done, who from the Scriptures moſt ſure account ſo tye the ſtories of times together, that like to a golden chaine, the linkes are faſtned each to other, and the whole ſo compleate, that a yeare is not miſſing from the fall of man, unto the full time of his redemption.

From the creation to the flood. 1656.

(24) Firſt then from the Creation to the Flood are reckoned yeares 1656. gathered by a Triple account, from the ages, begettings, and deaths of the fathers. The like is thence obſerved for foure hundred twenty and ſeven yeares, that is, to the ſeventy fifth of Abrahams life, wherein God began to tie the times accounts in holier ſummes: for Terah, the firſt recorded Idolater, was the laſt in honour that had the Sunnes courſe meaſured by mans life. And now the bonds of time tie the Promiſe to Abraham, to be before the Law foure hundred and thirty yeares, as the Apoſtle to the Galathians affirmeth. From the Law to the building of Salomons Temple, and that in the fourth yeare of his raigne, were yeares foure hundred and eighty: and from that foundation, to his death, were thirty ſix yeares: for his whole raigne was fourty. From his death and Kingdomes diviſion, unto the burning of that Temple, which was executed in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babel, were yeares three hundred and ninety, as by the dayes of Ezekiels ſiege and ſleepe appeareth in the ſecond and fifth verſes of his fourth Chapter. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Iudahs captivitie, were yeares fifty and one, for the whole time of Babels bondage contained ſeventy yeares, as Ieremie 25. 11. whereof nineteene were expired; and fifty one remaining unto the firſt yeare of Cyrus their deliverer, whom the Lord in that regard calleth his anointed, Iſay 45.1. In the firſt yeare of whoſe Monarchie he publiſhed an Edict for the returne of the Iewes and new building of their Temple, as in the books of Chronicles and of Ezra is ſeene. And from this firſt yeare and proclamation of King Cyrus, unto the laſt yeare and death of Chriſt our Saviour, the great yeare of Iubile, the acceptable time, wherein hee trod the Winepreſſe alone; to the finiſhing of the ceremonies, the taking away of ſinne, the reconciling of iniquity, the bringing in of everlaſting righteouſneſſe, to the ſealing up of viſion and prophecie, and to the anointing of the moſt holy; were yeares foure hundred and ninety, as the Prophet Daniel from the Angel Gabriel received, and unto us hath delivered, Dan. 9. 24. all which added together, make the number to be three thouſand nine hundred and threeſcore yeares. And by this ſaid computation, I have accounted Brutes ſtory, as all others wherein I ſhall be occaſioned to ſpeake.

From the Promiſe to Abraham, till the Law, 430. Galat. 3. 17. From the Law to Salomons Temple, 480. 1 King. 6. 1. From the foundation of the Temple, to Salomons death, 36 yeares. 1 King. 11. 42. From Salomons death, to the burning of the Temple, 350. yeares 2 King. 25. 8. Eze. 4. 5. & 5. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Iudahs captivity, 51. yeares. Ier. 25. 11. Ita. 45. 1. 2 Chron. 36. 21, 22, 23. Ezra 1. 1. 2. From the firſt yeare of Cyrus, unto the death of Chriſt, 490. yeares.

Dan. 9. 24.

(25) Laſtly, if from among theſe miſty clouds of ignorance no light can be gotten, and that wee will needs have our deſcents from the Troians; may wee not then more truely derive our blood from them through the Romans, who for the ſpace of foure hundred threeſcore and ſix yeares were planted amongſt us: in which continuance it is moſt certaine, they tooke of our women to be their wives, and gave their women to be wives unto us, ſeeing that ſome of their Emperors did the like themſelves, and from whoſe blood, ſaith Beda, the Britaine Ambroſius lineally deſcended. And if beauty & parts be the inſtigators unto love, as in the firſt world we ſee it was, no doubt then the features of the Britaines were moving Angels unto the Romans, whoſe faces even in thoſe times were accounted to be angelicall, and whoſe perſonages as yet, are reſpected as the beſt (if not better) then any other in the world. But that the Romans themſelves deſcended from the Trojans, or Aeneas ſhould be the root of the Iulian family, howſoever the fictions of Poets as a Spring-tide, have flowed from the fulneſſe of their pennes, yet Tacitus their beſt Writer, accounteth thoſe things not far unlike to old fables, wherein he judgeth that Nero to win credit before the Conſuls, and to get reputation in the glory of eloquence, undertooke the pleading of the Ilienſes cauſe, declaring the Romans deſcent from Troy: and the Iuly from the loynes of Aeneas, which notwithſtanding he cenſureth as is ſaid. And Ioſephus in the diſperſion of Noahs ſonnes and families, affirmeth that Romus was the Originall of the old Romans and he of Chus, and Cham, if he meane as he ſpeaketh. To conclude; (by what deſtiny I know not) nations deſire their originals from the Trojans, yet certaine it is, that no honor from them can be brought, whoſe city and fame ſtood but for ſix deſcents, as under the raignes of Dardanus, Erithonius, Tros, Ilus, Laomedon, and Priamus, during which time they were three vanquiſhed; twice by Hercules in the daies of Laomedon, and the third time raſed by the rage of the Grecians, in the raigne of King Priamus, and the Trojans themſelves, made, as it were, the ſum of a conquered people. And therefore as France hath caſt off their Francio King Priamus his ſonne, Scotland their Scotia King Pharaoes daughter, Denmarke their Danus, Ireland their Hiberus, and other Countries their Demi-gods; ſo let BRITAINES likewiſe with them diſclaime their BRUTE, that bringeth no honour to ſo renowned a Nation, but rather cloudeth their glory in the murders of his parents, and imbaſeth their deſcents, as ſprung from Venus that laſcivious Adultereſſe: of whom ſaith du Pleſſis, I am aſhamed 'that the heathen were not aſhamed of this ſhamefulneſſe; but much more that Chriſtians bluſh not to name her in their verſes.

Britaines may more truely derive their deſcent from Troy by the Romans. Britaines tooke wives of the Romans, and they of the Britaines. Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 1. c. 16. Gen. 6. 2.

THE MANNERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT BRITAINES.

CHAPTER IV.

HAving thus farre ſpoken of the ancient Names of this famous Iland, and of the Nations acknowledged to be the firſt Planters and Poſſeſſors thereof; it remaineth that ſomewhat bee mentioned of the Manners and Cuſtomes of thoſe people and times, though not ſo pleaſing or acceptable as were to be wiſhed, for that the clouds of ignorance and barbarous incivility did then ſhadow and over-ſpread almoſt all the Nations of the earth: wherein I deſire to lay imputation, no further then is ſufficiently warranted by moſt authenticke Writers: and firſt from Caſar, who formoſt of all the Romans, diſcovered and deſcribed our ancient Britaines.

Of their Perſons. Caeſ. Comment. lib. 5. where he uſeth the word Luteus.

(2) Touching their perſons: All the Britaines (ſaith Caſar) uſed to die themſelves with woad, which ſetteth a blue colour upon them, and that maketh them more terrible to behold in battell. But Pomponius Mela therein moveth

Herodian.

Pliny alſo addeth another ornament, and ſaith that the Britaines were rings on their middle finger. The Britaines would not be clad, becauſe they would ſhew the gay paintings of their bodies. Pliny. Quibuſdam calles that herber tritum; and the Britaines call that colour glaſtu. Whence our Engliſh word glaſſe (called Glaſs Virtum in Latine) may ſeeme to bee taken, by reaſon of the colour thereof. Dio Niceus. Caeſar. Some Britaines clad in leather. Solinus.

veth a doubt. They dyed their bodies (ſaith he) with Woad; but whether to make a gallant ſhew, or for what other cauſe elſe is uncertaine. And yet Herodian herein abſolutely determineth, where he ſaith, that the Britaines knew no uſe of garments at all, but about their waſtes and neckes wore chaines of iron, ſuppoſing them a goodly ornament, and a proofe of their wealth: and their bare bodies they marked with ſundry pictures repreſenting all manner of living creatures, and therefore they would not be clad, for hiding the gay paintings of their bodies. To which painting Pliny alſo agreeth, and deſcribeth that hearb Woad, to bee like to the Plantine in Gallia, naming it Glaſtum, with the juice whereof (ſaith he) the women of Britaine, as well wives as young women, anoint and dye their bodies all over: reſembling by that tincture the colour of the Aethiopians, in which manner they uſe at ſolemn feaſts and ſacrifices to go all naked. And Dio Niceus out of the epitome of Xiphilinus ſaith, that the cuſtome of that Nation was, to abide in rents all naked and unſhod. Notwithſtanding, Caeſar doth elſe where report, that they clad themſelves in leather, which perchance is meant of the civiller ſort of them, and in time of battell. Solinus likewiſe ſpeaking of the Britaines, ſaith, their Country is peopled partly with Barbarians, who by meanes of artificiall inciſions of ſundry formes, have from their childhood divers ſhapes of beaſts incorporate upon them; having their markes deeply imprinted within their bodies, looke how their growth for ſtature, ſo doe thoſe pictured characters likewiſe increaſe. Neither doe theſe ſavage Nations repute any thing a greater teſtimony of their patience, then by ſuch durable skars to make their lims drinke in much painting and colour. Theſe skarres by Tertullian are tearmed Britannorum ſtigmata, The Britaines markes. And unto this skye colour, or bleiwiſh dyings, it ſeemeth Martiall had relation in his praiſes of Lady Claudia:

Claudia, cæruleis cum ſit Rufina Britannis,
Edita, cur Latia pectora plebis habet?
Stilb Claudia comes of azur'd Britaines race,
Whence comes her mind ſo deckt with Romane grace?

Tertullian. Britannorum ſtigmata.

Martiall.

And of this uſe of painting, as our great Antiquary judgeth, both the Britaines had their primitive derivation; and the Picts (abranch of Britiſh race) a long time after, for that their acouſtomed manner, were called Picti by the Romanes, that is, the painted people.

(3) The haire of their heads, ſaith Caſar, they let grow, and wore long, which naturally was curled, and of colour yellow (as in the Panegyricke Oration aſcribed to Mamertinus, and ſpoken in praiſe of Maximianus, is to be ſeene) all other parts of their bodies being ſhaven, ſaving onely the head and upper lip. Yet their complections were much different, as by Tacitus we ſee, who avoucheth that ſome of thoſe Ilanders were red of haire, as the Calydonians in the Northerne Promontories; the haire of the Silures coloured and curled, like to the old Spaniards; and thoſe neereſt unto Gallia reſembled their complections, though not altogether ſo yellow, ſaith Strabo. But their wit by Tacitus is preferred before them, and their ſtatures more tall, as Strabo affirmeth, whoſe lineaments ſhewed a good making of body; and meaſurable proportion in all parts anſwerable. Their women faire, and of exceeding good features, as is deſcribed by the Romane Writers. Such was Boudicea, ſaith Xiphilinus; Claudia and Helena, ſaith Martiall and Eutropius.

(4) That the ſtrength of nature wrought long in the Britaines, we read of out Plutarch, who reporteth that the people lived one hundred and twenty yeeres, for that, ſaith he, their cold and frozen Country kept in their naturall heat: whoſe conditions by Diodorus Siculus are commended to be plaine and upright, farre from the wilineſſe and craft of the Romans. And by Strabo their diſpoſitions are partly reſembled to the Gaules, but yet ſomewhat more rude and plaine; and thoſe moſt civill, who were the inhabitants of Kent, by reaſon of their often coaverſing with other Nations, as Caſar ſheweth. But the farther in the continent, the more rude, and leſſe acquainted with other kind of riches beſides cattell, as Pomponius Mela affirmeth.

(5) Now touching their domeſticke matters. Their buildings were many, and like to them of the Gaules ſaith Iulius Cæſar; notwithſtanding they give the name of Townes to certaine comberſome woods, which they have fortified with rampires and ditches, whither they retreat, and reſort to eſchue the invaſions of their enemies. Which ſtand them in good ſtead, ſaith Strabo: for when they have by felling of trees, mounted, and fenced therewith a ſpacious round plot of ground; there they build for themſelves houſes and cottages, and for their cattell ſet up ſtals and folds, but thoſe for the preſent uſe onely, and not for long continuance. Which, as Diodorus Siculus ſaith, were uſually thatched with reed; but the Cities without Wals, and the Country without Townes, as Dion deſcribeth the Calidonians and Meats.

(6) Their Wives were ten or twelve a peece, as Caeſar hath alleaged, which they held common among brothers and parents, yet the iſſue repured his, who firſt maried the mother when ſhe was a maide, and Dio indeed affirmeth no leſſe, adding withall, that the children thus begotten, were foſtred and brought up in common among them. And Euſebius likewiſe teſtifieth, that many Britaines together kept one wife in common to them all. This community in marriage mooved Iulia the Empreſſe of Severus, to twit the wife of Argetecaxus, that the faſhion of the women of Britaine in accompanying with men, was very impudent; to whom ſhee replyed and ſaid, wee Britiſh women doe indeed herein differ from you Romane Ladies; for wee ſatisfie our appetite, by accompanying with the worthieſt men, and that openly, but you with every baſe fellow, in a corner.

(7) For their diet; it was a hainous matter with them to eate either Hen, Hare, or Goose, ſaith Caſar, which notwithſtanding they bred for their pleaſures; neither fed daintily at full and rich tables, as Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, but rather in neceſſity could live upon barkes and rootes of trees, and with a kind of meat no bigger then a beane, after which for a good time they did neither hunger nor thirſt, ſaith Dio Niceus: who likewiſe teſtifieth, that the Britains did till no ground, neither eate fiſh, though their rivers thereof bee plenteouſly ſtored, but lived upon prey, veniſon, and fruits: to which alſo Caſar addeth milke, whereof (ſaith Strabo) they had not then skill to make cheeſe. And according to Solinus, their uſuall drinke was made of barley. But for tillage, Pliny ſeemeth to contradict Dio, affirming that the Britaines manured their grounds with Marle in ſteed of dung; which argueth no ſuch ſimplicity in gardning, planting, and in other like points of huſbandry as Strabo doth taxe them with: And this foreſaid temperance of dyet differeth much from that which St. Ierome chargeth their neighbours the Anthropophagi of Ireland, who uſed to feed on the buttockes of boyes, and womens paps, as their moſt dainty and delicate diſh.

(8) For their religion, or rather diabolicall ſuperſtition, it was as the reſt of the world (ſome few excepted) when Satan had clouded the truth of Gods doctrine, by the foggy myſts of confuſed darkneſſe. For Tacitus makes their ſuperſtitions, and ceremonies to be the ſame in conformity with the Gaules. And what that was, Dio Caſſius in his Nero, and Solinus in his hiſtory doe declare; who doe aſcribe to them the moſt inhumane offering of mans fleſh in their ſacrifices. And beſides their ancient Idols, ſuch as Dis, Iupiter, Apollo, Diana, and the like; they worſhipped Andates for their goddeſſe of Victory, unto all which they performed no ſmall adorations and honors, imputing their proſperities unto them: unto whom alſo they erected temples with ſuch magnificence as they then had; whoſe walls, as it ſeemeth, long after remained, whereon ſome of thoſe prophane porreitures with deformed lineaments were ſeene by mournfull Gildas, carrying a sterne and grim countenance, after wonted heathenish manner: here see wee (saith hee) upon these desert walles, the ugly features of the Britaines Idols, meerely diabolicall, and in number almost exceeding those of Egypt. So by Tacitus they are noted with the common custome of the Gentiles, which was, that they sought for the direction of their Gods by the looking into the entrals of Beasts; yea and of men too; and that they honored the Altars of their Gods with the sacrifice and blood of such as they tooke captive in warres. And Pliny writing of Magicke, saith, that in his dayes the art thereof in Britaine was highly honored, and all the people thereunto so much devoted, yea and with all such complements of ceremonies in the same to be performed, that a man would thinke the Persians had learned all their Magicke skill from them. Priests and instructers had they, whereof the chiefe were called Druides, whose office was imployed about holy things, saith Cæsar, for they had the managing of publike and private sacrifices, and to interpret and discusse matters of religion. Vnto them doe resort great numbers of young men to learne at their hands, and they be had in great reverence. For they determine almost all controversies, and matters in variance, as well publike as private. And if there happen any thing to be done amisse, if there be any murther committed, if there rise any controversie concerning inheritance or bounds of lands, they take the matter into their power, and award either recompence or penalties in the case. And if there be any, be he private person, or be it corporation, that will not stand to their judgement, they interdict him, which punishment among them is held most grievous. They that are so excommunicated, are accounted in the number of the wicked and ungracious: all men shun them, all men eschue their company and communication, lest by conversing with them, they should defile themselves and receive harme. If they demand law, they may not have it: neither may they enjoy any place of honor. Over all those Druides, there is one Primate, which hath chiefe authority over them. When he is dead, if there be any of the rest that excelleth in worthinesse, he succeedeth: or if there be any equall, he is chosen by voyces of the rest, and divers times they strive for the soveraignty by force of armes.

The Druides determine almost all controversies.

Excommunication of great force in the time of the ancient Britaines.

Among the Druides one Primate and chiefe over the rest.

These men at a certaine season of the yeere, in the borders of the Carnutes (whose country is counted the middle of all Gallia) doe sit together in a place hallowed, whereunto resort from all sides all such as have any controversies: and looke what is decreed and Iudged by them that they stand unto. This order of discipline is thought to have had beginning in Britaine, and from thence to have beene brought into Gallia. And at this day, they that are desirous to attaine this skill more exactly, doe commonly repaire thither to learne it. These Druides custom ably are exempted from the warres, neither doe they pay taxes and tallages with other folke; for they are priviledged as from the warres, so from all other burthens. Allured with so great rewards, many even of their owne accord, doe register themselves in that order, and divers are sent thither by their parents and kinsfolke. Where they are reported to learne a great number of verses by heart. Whereof it commeth to passe, that divers continue twenty yeeres in learning. Neither doe they thinke it lawfull to put them in writing, whereas in all other things, for their accounts, as well publike as private, they use the Greeke letters.

They assemble once a yeare at a place in France to hear controversies.

Here appeareth that Academicks were then amongst the Britaines, and from their example derived into other countries.

They are exempted from warre.

Their schollers must learne a great many verses by heart.

This order they seeme (in mine opinion) saith he, to have taken for two considerations: partly because they will not have their discipline published among the common people; and partly because they will not that they which shall learne, trusting too much to their bookes, should have the lesse regard of remembrance: in that it hapneth well neere to most men, that upon trust of the helpe of their booke, they are slacker in learning things by heart, and lesse care to beare them in mind. This is one of the chiefest things that they labour most to beat into mens minds, that

They use the Greeke letters left their skill should be too common.

Their Theology is, that the soule dyeth not, but passeth from one to another: and hereby they thinke men should bee most stirred unto vertue, when the feare of death is nothing regarded. Also they dispute many other things: as of the starres, and their oft movings: of the bignesse of the world, and the earth: of the nature of things: of the strength, and power of the goddesse immortall: and doe therein instruct the youth. Vnto these Druides and their doctrine had Lucan the Poet relation in his first booke towards the end, where he writeth thus of them.

(9) These Britaines being meerely barbarous, as most of the Westerne parts of the world then were, lived privately to themselves with scarce any commerce, or entercourse with any other nation: neither indeed were much knowne to forraine people for a long time. For the first notice of them extant, was by Polybius the Greeke writer, that accompanied Scipio in his warres about the yeare of the Worlds creation 3720. and two hundred and nine before the birth of our Saviour Christ. Which Author nameth their Iland to bee plenteously stored with Tynne: but of other things therein is silent, saying that al those parts which lay betwixt Tanais and Narbon bending Northward, in his dayes were unknowne and uncertaine, and therefore the reporters of them he held as dreamers. So doth Cambden another Polybius account it a prodigall humor of credulity, to be perswaded that Himilco from the estate of Carthage to discover the coasts of Europe, in the said expedition entred this Iland: or that Hannibal should warre in this Iland, because Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth booke saith, that he was inclosed within the streets of Britain, which place is mistaken for the Brutii in Italy, or that Alexander came from the East Indians, to Gades, and from thence into Britaine, though Cedrenus say so, seeing all other writers are against it; or that Vlysses, (ancient enough if he bee that Elishah the sonne of Iavan, the fourth sonne of Japheth) should visit Britaine in his travels, whereof Brodeus maketh doubt; though Solinus report that an Altar in Caledonia was erected, and Vlysses in Greeke letters thereon inscribed. Which might very well be: for who doubteth but that the Greekes, in their vaine devotions, did both build and sacrifice unto their Gods, which they made of their worthiest men? and saith Vlysses, (in regard of his farre sea-travels) was had in speciall account among all navigators, why might not such monuments bee reared, and his name inscribed, as farre as the Grecians travelled, though his person never came there?

ent times, as that neither Thucydides nor Herodotus made mention of them: yea and with much adoe at last were heard of by the Grecians themselves: as Iosephus affirmeth; And if the Gaules and Spaniards, (inhabitants in the continent) for many yeeres together were utterly unknowne to the worlds historiographers; shall we then thinke, that this remote Iland, and people then farre from civility, were noted forth with markes of more certainety? surely to my seeming, nothing lesse: seeing that their next neighbors the Gaules knew not so much as what manner of men they were: none resorting thither, except some few Merchants, and they no further, then upon the Sea coasts, neither able to describe the bignesse of the Iland, the puissance of the inhabitants, their order for warre, the lawes that they used, the customes of the people, nor their havens for the receit of ships; all which Cæsar by diligent inquiry sought after, but could find no satisfaction till he had sent some purposely to search it out.

(10) Neither is this their want of knowledge to be wondred at, seeing the entercourse of their trafficke was upheld by so meane commodities: for Strabo saith, that their merchandizing chiefely consisted in Ivory Boxes, Sheeres, Onches, Bits, and Bridles, Wreathes and Chaines, with other conceits made of Amber and Glasse; for which notwithstanding they were compelled to pay customes and imposts unto Octavian Augustus, as elsewhere shall be shewed.

(11) And as their commodities were very meane, so were their meanes either for exportation or importation very slender in those times; I meane their shipping. It is true, that some are of opinion, that Ships were first invented in these our Seas: but that this should be true, I have cause to doubt, that Art being long before inspired by God himselfe into the heart of Noah for making the Arke: and no doubt practised by that patterne of many others. But that the ancient Britaines had ships of reasonable use, though of simple Art, Cæsar testifieth, saying, that the keeles and ribs of their ships were of light wood, and covered over with leather: which kind the now Britaines call Corraghs: and with them (saith Polybistor) they did saile betwixt Brittanny and Ireland, (which Sea for roughnesse and danger may be compared with any other whatsoever) though the bulke of their vessels were but of some flexible wood, covered with the hides of Buffles: and as long as they were sailing, so long did they abstaine from meat; whereby it seemeth they never sailed any great journeys. And of this their shipping Pliny also speaketh, and Lucan singeth, thus:

Primùm cana salix, madefacto vimine, parvam
Texitur in puppim, cæsoque induta juvenco,
Vectoris patiens tumidum super emicat amnem:
Sic Venetus stagnante Pado, fusoque Britannus, Navigat Oceano.
At first, of hoary sallowes wreathed boughs, the ships
Small bulke is trimly twist, and clad in bullockes hide:
Then, patient to be rul'd, on swelling waves she skips.
Thus on the spacious Poe the Venice Merchants glide,
And Britaine Pilots saile on surge of Ocean wide.

Their shipping very meane. Ships first invented in Britaine, is a matter to be doubted.

But aftertimes brought the Britaines to more exquisite skill in navall affaires, insomuch as the royall Navy of this Kingdome hath beene reputed (and so is at this day) not onely the invincible walles of our owne, but the incredible terror of all other kingdoms which have or shall envy our happy peace: and the adventures likewise of Merchants, and the skill of our Seamen, hath left no corner of the world unsearcht.

(12) And their trafficke amongst themselves was not of much worth, in that, as Cæsar saith, the Coynes which they had were either of Brasse, or else Iron-Rings fixed at a certaine waight, which they used for their monies. Of which kind I my selfe have seene found, and lately taken up in little cruses or pitchers of earth. But as times grew more civill, and trafficke more frequent, they shortly after stamped both silver and gold; and thereon the faces of their Kings, even in the dayes of Iulius Cæsar, who was the first that had his owne stampe on the Romane Coynes. Many of these are amongst us remaining, whereof I have inferred some few, as in their due places shall follow, which I received from the liberall hand of that most learned Knight Baronet, and worthy storer of Antiquities, Sr Robert Cotton, of Cumington. These Coynes are commonly imbossed outward and shield-like, whereon the inscription or face, is seene; the reverse hollow, and therein their devise set: and by these formes are they knowne to be the Britaines, no other nation stamping the like, except some few among the Grecians.

(13) Wee come lastly, to speake of the manner of their warfare, which Cæsar thus describeth. First (saith he) they ride round about all parts of the battell, casting their darts: and often times with the terrible noise of their horses, and the ratling of their chariot wheeles, they amaze the enemy and breake their array. And when they have wound themselves in among the troopes of horsemen, they leape forth of their waggons, and fight on foot. In the meane while the waggoners withdraw themselves somewhat out of the battell, and set their waggons in such order, that if they be overcharged by the enemy, they may have speedy and easie recourse unto them. By meanes whereof they are both as ready to remoove as the horsemen, and as stedfast to stand in the battell as the footmen, and supply both duties in one. And they are come to such perfectnesse by daily practice and exercise, that even in steepe and falling places they will stop their horses running a full gallop, and guide and turne them in a short roome, and run upon the vergies, and stand stedfastly upon the beames, and quickly recover themselves backe againe into the waggons.

Of their warres Cæsar com. 5.

These would often give ground to egge their enemies from their maine battell, and then would leape out of their chariots and fight on foot. And they kept also such an order in fighting on horseback, that whether the enemies chased, or were chased, they were alwayes in danger. For they never fought in great companies together, but scatteringly a great way distant the one from the other, and had stals lying in divers places one to supply another, having ever fresh and lustly men in the roomes of them that were weary. Of this their manner of fight in chariots, Strabo also declareth; and Diodorus Siculus saith, that the Britaines lived after the manner of the first age of the world, using chariots in their fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greekes at the Trojan warres. Pomponius Mela also describing these Britaines, affirmeth that their fight was not only with horsemen and footmen, but also with waggons and chariots, harnessed, and armed at the ends of the Axle-trees with hookes and Sithes, after the manner of the Gaules; but with apparance of greater courage, as Tacitus saith; as being not yet mollified by long peace. Their strength in field consisteth most of footmen, yet some countries there are (saith he) that warre in waggons, the greatest persons guiding the same; and so much doth Iuvenall intimate, who in shew of prophecy, but indeed in flattery of the Emperor Domitian, salutes him after this manner:

They fight not in great companies together.

They have ever fresh men in the roomes of them that are weary. Strabo. Diodorus Siculus Ius.

Dio Nicæus from Xiphilinus more particularly declareth their strength; Their horses (saith he) are but little, yet therewithall swift of pace: their footmen also runne very speedily, but in their standing are the strongest: their armor are shields, and short speares, in the nether end whereof is fastned a round bell of brasse like unto a ball, which at the first onset of incounter they shake with great courage, supposing that such a ratling noise doth much amate the enemy. And Herodian saith, that their shields were narrow and speares short, wearing swords hanging downe their naked loynes, having neither knowledge nor use either of corslet or helmet.

(14) Some have thought that their women also were not exempted from the wars; but certaine it is that many of that sex were renowned for their valour amongst them. Which made Tacitus to say, it was usuall

Many British women renowned for valour.

Tacitus.

usuall for the Britaines to fight under the conduct of women, (which the Romans found to their smart) nor to make any difference of sexes for government. A more noble patterne whereof, never had any age, then in our late glorious Virgin Queene, (the wonder of her sexe; and of all future ages,) who, as she was inferiour to no Prince ever living, for her admirable government in upholding of her Kingdomes peace, so was shee a match (to say no more) to the proudest monarchs, in her managing of her warres; as (when occasion was offered) shee was ready to make good, in her owne royall person in the field. But besides the use of armes, the ancient British women had another imployment in the field, which I will onely set downe in Tacitus his words, speaking of Paulinus Suetonius his affailing of Anglesey: The British Army (saith he) stood on the shore, thicke of men and munition, and women running up and downe amongst them, like furies, carrying burning firebrands in ruffull attire, and with their haire hanging about their shoulders. The Druides meane while went with their hands lift up to Heaven, powring out prayers and imprecations. The strangenesse of which sight so amazed the Roman souldiers, that they stood still like stockes, whiles the other wounded them at their pleasure; till Paulinus encouraged them, and they excited one another, not to bee so daunted by an army of Women and Wizards, &c.

The British womens ruffull attire and the Druides behaviour in prayer amaze the Roman souldiers.

(15) In the relations of these things, let no man thinke, that the glory of this ancient and warlike nation of Britaines, is any wayes disparaged, or made inferiour to them that would be more famous, whose beginning have beene as meane, and state as rude, if not more. For let us consider the Romans so lavish in their owne worths and greatnesse; who notwithstanding, bring their name and originall from Romulus, a bastard by birth, nourished by a beast, educated among a sort of rusticke shepheards: and growne to the ripenesse of his owne affections, he became ringleader of a damned crue, that lived by robberies and without lawes: besides the shedding of his naturall brothers blood, as Titus Livius their owne historian witnesseth: and both himselfe and followers, had in such contempt and derision by their neighbour nations, that they both disdained and refused to give them their daughters in marriage, left in time they also should become lawlesse, untill that by subtilty and force, they had ravished their virgins, and thereby made them unworthy of other matches. Yet when their after fortunes and successe had mounted them upon the wings of glory, and seated them on the neckes of their subdued neighbours, their Cæsars would needs be more then mortall, and their pedigrees must lineally be brought from the gods.

The Romans derive their name from an infamous person.

Titus Livius, &c.

(16) And, to let passe many others, the like may be said of the beginners of the Scythian and Turkish Empires, two golden pillers raised upon leaden bases: howsoever now, the power of their command, circles three parts of the earth. Nay, what more is, that precious, royall, and Gods onely people, from whom the eternall King of Kings descended, in their offerings made in time of their highest glory, were by the Lord thus commanded to acknowledge and say: A Syrian was my father, who being ready to perish for hunger, went downe into Ægypt, and sojourned with a small company. And the richest stone of that most beaureous building in his highest pride is counselled by the Prophet, to looke backe to the rocke whence it was hewne, and to the hole of the pit whence it had beene digged.

THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAINE.

CHAPTER. V.

The British government.

WEE come, at length, to speake of the government and political estate of the Britaines, which doubtlesse (the times then considered) was as honourable in their rulers, and as manageable in the subjects, as any other nations in these West parts of the world: their temperance, religion, learning, and noble resolution shewing no lesse. But in this point I must crave pardon of our British Heraulds, and some learned Antiquaries, if I bring not a lineall succession from Brute, and a Monarchicall government in those times of obscurity, through whose mists no Eagles eyes could pierce, before the dayes of Geffrey ap Arthur, as before was touched. And therefore following his counsell, who is best able in these things to give direction; I will begin the succession of Great Britaines Monarchs, at the entrance and person of Iulius Cæsar; at which time, it seemeth by him and other Latine writers (the best Recorders of Kingdomes affaires,) this Iland was governed rather after the manner of an Aristocratie, that is, by certaine great Nobles and Potent men, then under the command of any One as an absolute Monarch: though herein is a difference, in that in the Aristocraticall regiment, the rulers are all Peeres of one Common-wealth; whereas here, as many Princes, so many severall Publike weales. For so

Their successi-on doubtfull.

Not meerely monarchicall.

How in Cæsars time and after.

Cæsar himselfe found the state of Britaine to bee divided into Provinces under the names of her inhabitants; and to bee ruled by divers Peeres, or petty Kings.

Tacit. An. 14. 33.

(2) And such a Governour was Cassibelan, over the Trinobants: Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, all foure Rulers together in Kent: Comius supposed to be King of the Atrebatii, and to bee the same Comius of Arras, whom Cæsar imployed to tease and worke the Britaines to his subjection: Caractacus the warlike King of the Silures, Galgacus the worthy King of the Caledonians; yea and women also, without exception of sex, held government among them, such was faithlesse Cartismandua Queene of the Brigantes, and famous Boudicea Queene of the Iceenians. Whereby it seemeth that every severall Province owed service and allegeance onely to their owne Prince. And as their governements were confined unto certaine bounds and limits, so were the Inhabitants divided and distinguished by divers Names: of whom because we shall have occasion hereafter often to speake, it shall not therefore be amisse in this place once for all, table-wise to lay downe the same, whereby our narrations may passe untroubled without more explanations, and the readers minde carried with lesse incombrances. Those ancient names of people, and places for abode, thorowout the whole Iland, from Ptolemy were as follow.

(3) These

Their emulations and ambitions.

(3) These States ambitiously banding each against others, to raise their owne Prince to a more soveraigne supremacy, and to enlarge their Provinces upon the borders of the next, were ever ready, the least occasion ministred, saith Pomponius Mela, to enter quarels, and seldome held amity, or were quiet. This was the cause, as Tacitus tels us, which brought that puissant nation into bondage: and was the onely helpe to the Romans victories: for seldome it chanced (saith he) that two or three States met in counsell, and concurred in opinion to repulse the common danger: so that whilst they resisted and fought one by one, all at length were subdued. But this was not at once performed by Iulius Cæsar the first Roman enterer, who (as he saith) rather shewed the place to posteritie, then gave them the possession thereof, supposing it his glory sufficient, to have done what he did. For unto the dayes of Domitian, they held play with the Romans, and that with such valour, that the subduing of some small part of this Iland was accounted by themselves to match the conquests of other mightier countries, and more notes of honour shewed in their publike triumphs for one Britaines misfortune, then usually was solemnized for whole kingdomes subdued.

(4) That such people possessed, and that many Kings together raigned here in Britaine, Pomponius Mela doth shew: Britaine (saith he) bringeth forth Nations, and Kings of nations, though they be all without civility and barbarous. And Cæsars intendments being knowne unto them, it is said that many of their Cities sent him by their Embassadors proffers of submission: whereby appeareth their diversities of States, whereof onely two held promise, and the rest failing was the occasion of his second expedition for Britaine. And Tacitus, speaking of the shipwracke suffered by the Romans in the raigne of Tiberius, saith, that many of their souldiers then distressed and torne, being cast upon the coasts of Britaine, were by the people curteously relieved, and by their petty Kings sent backe unto Germanicus their Generall into Germany; which Princes or petty Kings, were drawne (as else where he saith) by emulation into many partialities and factions; which was indeed their owne destruction. And by Gildas these were termed cruell Tyrants, taking his authority out of Saint Ierome.

(5) Let thus farre suffice, in generall, of these ancient Britaines; whose particulars wee will further prosecute in the places of their resistances, lest otherwise they should seeme to fight onely against themselves. And therefore so many of these Governours, as either yeelded their subjections to the Romans, or stood their opposites till their owne strengths were spent, I will briefely touch, untill such time as the land was made a Province, by the valour and industry of Iulius Agricola the first Roman that found it an Iland, and left it more civill, and in subjection to the Romane Empire; and by the way I will inserte some of such ancient Coynes, as among them were then used, expressing their names, and places of coynage.

THE KINGS AND GOVERNORS OF GREAT BRITAINE WITH THE ANCIENT COINES VSED IN THEIR TIMES.

Chapter VI.

THE first British Coyne (as is supposed) both by the fashion thereof being shieldlike, and Name thereupon inscribed Rex Com: denoteth Comius, (if he be a Britaine) King of the Atrebatii in this Iland: whom some judge to have fled thence unto Cæsar, as a Traytor to his Native Countrey; and in Gallia vanquished those parts, that lay coasted against the Wight, wherein (by Ptolomy) the people called likewise the Atrebatii inhabited: over whom hee received the governement by the gift of Cæsar, and was by him employed to worke the Britaines to his obedience. And that hee was King of the Atrebatii in Britaine, may bee strengthned by that which Cæsar in his second booke of Commentaries affirmeth, where, by his owne knowledge hee saith, that one Diviciacus raigned over a great part of Gallia, and some portion of Britaine also: and so likewise this Comius is reported to bee of great respect among our Britaines, and able in that Countrey to doe much. Neither is it altogether unlikely, seeing the Britaines distasted his loyalty to Cæsar, and his Ambassage for their subjection, with such dislikes, that they laid violent hands upon him, and cast him in prison, using no such rigour against the rest of their owne Ambassadours. Notwithstanding when successe altered, they set him at liberty, and made him their meanes to pacifie Cæsar.

Ptolomæi Geographi.

Cæsar. comment. lib. 4.

Other Coynes I have inserted to such British Princes as by their inscriptions are knowne to bee theirs. And whereas some are not yet noted by that honour to the world; I have unto such added onely blankes, if happily more be revealed hereafter, and the bowels of the earth deliver to others her treasures hid, as formerly (and in these our searching dayes) she hath already done.

(2) Cassibelan

(2) Cassibelan, as the most worthy among the Britaines Kings, to withstand the common danger now ready to light upon them all, by the invasions and warres of the Romanes, was by a generall consent chosen their Chiefetaine, though in times past, he had molested his neighboring provinces to the inlargement of his owne. Whose signiories, as Cæsar saith, were severed from the Cities towards the sea coast by the river Thames, about fourescore miles from the same. He had obtained the governement of the Trinobantes, by the slaughter of Imanuence, and the expulsion of Mandubrace his sonne. And, with great valour, held opposite to the Romans, untill the revolt of his chiefe City, the Cenimagues, Segontians, Ancalits, Bibroces, Cassians, and other States, which drew backe, and yeelded to the enemy; his confederates, the foure Kings of Kent, overthrowne, his owne towne won, and himselfe forced to yeeld unto Cæsar, and the land to pay a tribute of 3000. pound yeerely to Rome. A British coyne of gold with the inscription Cas in scattered letters we have inserted; as also another wheron is instamped the word ver, supposed to be his, because it is thought to have beene coyned in ancient Verolam, the City of Cassibelan, in his dayes, before the Romans wone it.

Cæsar. comment. lib. 5.

Verolam a famous City neere to the place where now Saint Albons is.

(3) Cingetorix: Carvill: Taximagull: Segonax: } whom Cæsar calleth Kings that raigned in Kent, were instigated by Cassibelan suddainely to set upon, and to assault the Roman forces, that lay incamped upon the sea shore whilst he kept Cæsar occupied further in the mayne: which thing they attempted, but failed of their hoped expectation, their men being slaine, three of them chased, and Cingetorix the chiefest taken captive. This heavy newes and unfortunate successe, forced Cassibelan to sue unto Cæsar, and by the meanes of Comius obtained his peace.

(4) Mandubrace a Prince of the Trinobantes, but a traytor to his countrey; whose father Imanuence being slaine by Cassibelan, and his owne life likewise sought after, and in danger, fled unto Cæsar into Gallia, and followed his fortunes in the warres; wherein, hee was a great spurre unto Cæsars forwardnesse for Britaine, both to be revenged upon the murtherer of his father, and to recover the government of the Trinobantes usurped by Cassibelan: preferring his owne ambitious desire, and the revenge of one mans death, before the freedome of his native Countrey, or the deaths of many his countrymen, that daily stopt the Romans passage with streames of their blood. He recovering his chiefest City with the protection of the Romans, yeelded subjection, & forty hostages to Cæsar: whose example drew others to sell their owne liberty, and to buy many miseries at too deare a rate, and with too late repentance: him doth Beda call Androgorius.

These people or States, seeing the proceedings and happy successe of Cæsar, after the example of the Trinobantes, whose chiefest City had yeelded him obedience, and were thereby secured, and protected from the harmes of his souldiers, sent him likewise their submissions, and were accepted into subjection: so ready were they to save their owne stakes, that they left the whole to the hazard of losse, which soone after followed as an overflowing flood, wherein was lastly drenched the whole Ilands liberty.

(6) Cunobeline (for ſo upon his Coynes his name is inſtamped) was the ſon of Theomantius and hee the ſonne of Lud (as ſay our Britiſh hiſtorians, by whom his name is corruptly written Kymbeline) he lived at Rome, and in great favour with Auguſtus Ceſar the Emperour, by whom hee was made Knight, and by his meanes the peace of Britaine was continued without the payment of their Tribute, as Fabian out of Guido de Columna hath gathered. In the foureteenth yeere of his raigne, the Day-ſtarre of Iacob appeared, and the rod out of Iſhai did flouriſh from the wombe of a Virgin, when the wonderfull Counſellor, the mighty God and Prince of Peace, the Emmanuel, God with us, was borne at Bethlehem of his Maiden-mother the bleſſed Virgin Mary, and was made man like unto us in all things, ſinne onely excepted. Theſe were the times that great Kings and Prophets deſired to ſee, but ſaw them not, when the Wolfe and the Lambe, the Leopard and the Kid, the Calfe and the Lyon fed together; for warre was not heard of then in the world, but rather their ſwords were made into mattockes, and their ſpeares turned into ſithes, as the Prophets, Sibyls, and Poets from them have affirmed. In Rome the temple of Ianus was ſhut, and in Britaine Cunobeline enjoyed peace with the reſt of the world, and his fame was made more famous by the many Coynes inſtamped of him, and whoſe face thereon among all the Britiſh Kings was firſt inſcribed, as by theſe here inſerted doth evidently appeare, one with two faces, like unto Ianus, and ſixe more with his own, beſides three others wherein is read his name, one of them with a womans head, another with a horſe, and the third with a wreath; all theſe (if not more) are knowne to be his, which ſheweth his wealth, his fame, and his civill reſpect. The chiefeſt city for his princely reſidence was Camalodunum, now Malden in Eſſex, wonne by Claudius from the ſonnes of Cunobeline, as by the inſcription of the Coyne next enſuing appeareth, and wherein many of the Britiſh monies alſo received their impreſſe. This City with the free towne Verolam afterwards felt the heavy hand of mercileſſe Bodvo in her revenge againſt the Romanes; who laid the beauty and gorgeous buildings thereof ſo levell with the earth, that thoſe walles and mounted turrets never ſince aſpired to halfe their wonted heights.

(7) Adminius the firſt ſonne of Cunobeline, King of the Britains, by Suetonius his report upon ſome offence was baniſhed the Iland by his father; and with a ſmall traine fled over the Seas into Belgia, where Caius Caligula was in making his ridiculous expedition againſt the Ocean. And yeelding himſelfe to his protection, added matter to his vaine-glorious humours, as of a great victory and conqueſt; ſending the newes hereof to Rome; with an eſpeciall command that his letters ſhould be delivered in the Temple of Mars, and that in the aſſembly of a full Senate. It is judged by learned Cambden that the Roman Coyne above prefixed, upon whoſe reverſe is inſcribed Metropolis Etiminij Regis, to be meant of this Adminius the ſonne of Cunobeline, whoſe Citie Camolodunum, Claudius Ceſar the Emperour afterwards wonne, and wherein a Temple was built, and conſecrated unto him, attended by the Prieſts Auguſtals: which heavily burdened the poore eſtates of the Britaines.

(8) Caractatus another ſon of Cunobeline, immediatly after the death of his father, found himſelfe agreeved at the Romans, for the retaining of certaine fugitives the betraiers of their native countrey; whereof one Bericus was a chief and a great firebrand of Claudius his attempts againſt the Britains. This Caractatus maintained reſiſtance againſt Aulus Plautius the Emperors Deputy, with ſuch noble reſolution and warlike encounters, that often he endangered both his perſon and army. But Fortune and Victory attending the Romans, brought at length Caractatus their captive into bands, with great ſlaughters of his Britaines, himſelfe led ſhortly after in great triumph through Rome in honour of Plautius his ſo fortunate ſucceſſe. The miſeries of others thus made the Romans to mount the chaire of their triumphs; and the chaines of their captives, the records of their preſent aſpired pride. But the bordering Dobuni ſeeing his fall, made their owne ſtandings ſurer by yeelding themſelves ſubjects to Rome.

Dio calls him Caractatus.

(9) Togodumnus the third ſonne of Cunobeline, and ſucceſſor to Caractatus, proſecuted his countries quarrell with the like boldneſſe and reſolution as his brother before him had done: & was the only touchſtone that gave Veſpatian his luſtre, whoſe interpoſition (as Tacitus ſaith) was the beginning of that greatneſſe whereunto afterwards he aſpired. And with ſuch manhood followed the chaſe of the Romans, that in a bloody battell hee ended his life, and brought Plautius their Lieutenant unto a ſtand, where ſtraitned in dangers both of place and people, he was forced to ſend to Claudius the Emperor; whoſe conceit was then grounded, that in Britaine was greateſt glory to be gotten, and therefore came to his aſſiſtance in perſon himſelfe, the firſt ſince Iulius Ceſar that attempted their conqueſt. His recorded compoſitions made with Arviragus, the marriage of his daughter, and building of Glocester, I leave to be read out of Geffrey of Monmouth, and to be allowed at the choice of his hearer; only noting that the poſſeſſion of ſo faire a land drew the affection and aged perſon of this Emperor to undergoe ſo farre diſtant and dangerous a journey, as this of Britaine lay from Rome.

For when they had conquered the neereſt part of this Iland, and reduced it into the forme of a Province; according to their ancient policie, it was their cuſtome, (ſaith Tacitus) to vse Kings themselves for instruments of bondage, both in admittance of their Authority, and in protecting them against their oppolites. Other memoriall of him none remaineth, but that he is reported to have rested ever most faithfull to the Romans, and was of them accordingly esteemed, albeit his owne people bare him no such good will, but rather accounted him and others his like, to bee Romes onely instruments, and Britaine Vipers, that brought in strangers to eat up the home-bred Inhabitants, and fettered the freedome of their land, with the heavie chaines of a forraine subjection.

(11) Caractacus the most renowned Prince of the Silures, in nine yeares resistance waded through many adventures against the common enemie. For when as the Icenians, Cangi, and Brigantes began to faint and give over, he onely with the Ordovices held out with such fervice and fame, that thereby he grew both famous and fearefull to the Romans. But Destinies determining the downfall of Britaine, the props that were set to stay it still up, proved too slender, and brake under the waight. For this bold Caractacus overthrown in battell, his wife, daughter, and brethren taken prisoners, and his forces defeated, committed himself to the protection of Cartismandua the Brigants faithlesse Queen: who by her was delivered to the Romans; and by P. Ostorius brought to Rome; where beholding the riches and glory of that Citie, he openly and boldly checked the avarice and ambitious humors of the Romans, who being owners of so great and glorious things, were (notwithstanding) covetous and greedy for the poore possessions of the Britaines. And there being led in triumph, with admiration hee was beheld of all the spectators, and for his undaunted spirit and magnanimous resolution released of bands, and taken into favour by Claudius the Emperor. And the Lords of the Senate assembled together, made glorious discourses touching Caractacus captivitie, affirming it to be no lesse honorable then when P. Scipio shewed Syphax unto the people, and L. Paulus Perses, or of any other exhibited, vanquished and overcome. The Britisih Coine here above shewed, by the scattered letters therein inscribed, is by the judicious observers of such ancient monies supposed to be his.

(12) Venutius, a famous King of the Brigantes, and husband to Cartismandua, (a woman of an high and noble linage, but of a base and unsatisfied lust:) finding his bed abused by Vellocatus his servant and harnesse-bearer, raised his power against her, and her paramour. With him sided his Brigantes, and the neighbour Countries adjoyning, whose good will went generally with the lawfull husband, fearing the ambitious authority of a lustfull woman. With her went the Romans, at the command of Didius their Deputie: and these striking battell won the day: yet so as the war continued to the Romans, the kingdome to Venutius, and the infamy with Cartismandua, both for betraying the pledge of her trust reposed by Caractacus in his distresse, and her truth to Venutius her noble Lord and husband: preferring the licentious pleasures of a vassall, before the bed of chaste mariage, or the nuptiall imbracements of a worthy King; and hath to ages following left her name noted with the scarres of infamy, that time nor continuance shall ever were away. His ancient Coyne is thought to bee as thou seest here above described.

(13) Prasutagus } King and Queene of the Icens.
Bodua } ans, a people unshaken by war, and themselves rich; (as Tacitus reporteth;) the only cause of their ruines, for which the Romans then watred; were brought to destruction upon this insuing occasion. King Prasutagus dying, by Will left Nero his heire (supposing by this meanes to leave his state the safer,) together with the protection of his two daughters. These, contrary to trust, were abused and despoured, the mother Bodua turned out of all, and against all manly civilitie, or womanhood respect, contumeliously and despitefully whipped. In the revenge of which unsufferable wrongs shee so opposed and oppressed the Romans, that at one battell seventy thousand, (or as Dion Cassius saith) 80000. of their slaughtered bodies shee sacrificed to her dead husbands Ghost; and hath left the fame of her proceedings registred, even by her enemies themselves, to her immortall and never-dying memory. The strong Cities, Camaledunum, and Veralanium, lanium, she sacked with the rage of mercilesse warre; Petilius, Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, the discomfited, Catus the Procurator she drove over the seas, Posthumus the Campe-master durst not resist her, and all indeed feared the valour of this heroicke Lady: whose lawes were not martiall to save upon ransome: whose revenge was not pacified with yeeldings or submission, nor did she thinke there was bloud enough in the Romans to imbrue the altars of her assisting gods, or to wash off the staine of their ignoble and unmanly injuries. But when successe altered, after losse, and valorous resistance, shee made an end of her life by poyson, lest living she should see either her owne miseries in their triumphs, or leave her remembrance in the records of their lavish and selfe-pleasing historians. Her Coyne of gold we have here expressed, the forme shield-like, and upon the embossement thus inscribed: B o p v o.

(14) Arviragus, the valiant british King, whom Humfrey Lhuyd confidently affirmeth to be the same man that is called Meurigus, and is said to withstand Claudius in his enterprises for Britaine, untill a composition of marriage was concluded betwixt the Emperors daughter and himselfe. Notwithstanding by Iwienal it is plaine, that this Arviragus was in his fame in the dayes of Domitian, unto whom the Poet, as a Prophet, would foredome his happy successe in the disposition of his government over the Britaines, as in these his verses are seene:

Is bodes great honour to thy selfe, some King thou shalt deprive;
Or else Arviragus from the rule of Britaines waine shalt drive.

An ancient British Coyne of silver is here inserted, and a mans head thereon instamped, which is supposed to be his, the letters alluding so neere to his name.

(15) Galgacus, a worthy and most valiant Prince of the Caledonians, for vertue, and birth, preferred before any other in the Northerne parts of this Iland, and made their Generall against the invasions of Iulius Agricola, was the last Britaine, that against the Romans stood out: accounting those onely happy, which were free from the contagion of that Roman tyranny, and themselves the flower of all the British nobility, that yet had not subjected their neckes to their yoake. The resistance which he made was great and warlike, but against the decree of God no man can stand; for the Romans, risen to their greatnesse, bare downe all that withstood them; and in a bloody battaile subdued him, and his forces; making all silent before them where they came, and leaving desolation in the places where they had beene. Thus then was the whole Iland subjected to the Roman Emperours, about one hundred thirty and sixe yeeres after Cesars first entrance, and the land that had beene ruled by many petty Kings, was brought now (as most parts of the world besides were) under the government of one absolute Monarch. Grievous, no doubt, was the losse of their liberties, but a greater gaine was gotten not many yeeres after; for from the rude and savage manners of the barbarous, they were reclaimed, and became most civill. And hee that had given their Iland to his Christ, prepared their hearts to receive him their King; unto whose subjection also they were motives to the Romanes themselves. Two ancient British Coynes stamped in silver wee have here set downe, attributing them both to this Galgacus of Caledonia. Notwithstanding in these (as in the rest) I must submit my selfe to the more experienced, and the censures of these ancient things to the learned and more judicious. Psalme 2.

(16 These then were the resisters of the Romans proceedings, that rather yeelded their brests to the sword, then their neckes to the yoake of a forraine subjection, and made their assaulters more famous in their conquests, and themselves more renowned to following posterities: neither in these relations have wee followed the records of our owne, but the approved testimony of their best writers, who have delivered what wee have said, and no doubt felt the like repugnancy of many others, both in the South and North of this Iland, though their names dyed with their valiant resistance. And as these Britaines held the Romans at even hand the space of one hundred thirty and sixe yeeres; neither then were subdued without themselves, that ever sided with the enemy against themselves, and whose factions made way for the feet of their conquerors, as from Tacitus we have declared: so their successors the Saxons found as warlike withstanders, till God, for the Britaines sinnes had cast downe their strength, whereof more shall follow (Christ assisting) in the due place of their stories, that from the raigne of Vortigerne the scourge of his country to Cadwallader the last Prince of the Britaines, spent their lives in the quarrell of liberty, and hath left their memorials famous for their countries defence.

(17) But the state of Kingdomes (how largely so ever extended, or by what humane wisdome strengthned with defence) doe find their periods not to exceed much the number of sixe hundred yeeres, as by common experience among most nations is seene. In these times therefore when the world was shaken with warres, first by the Romans that strove to mount hye the spires of their intended glory, and were by Gods decree appointed to overrunne and afflict the earth, when Kings of people (I say) were inforced to lay the Crownes from their heads at their conquering feet; and free nations loaded with the yoakes of their bondage: then was fulfilled the resolution of this question demanded, Alas who shall live when God doth this? And then among the rest, Britaine gave place to necessity with as manlike resistance as did states more stronger, or kingdomes confined with farre more larger compasse. And Cæsar himselfe bought his entrance with such losse to the Romans, that no Emperour after assayed the like, before aged Claudius, whose opinion was, that thence the remembrance of his succeeding glory should wholly arise.

Num. 24. 23.

But when the props of that Empire began for to faile, as nothing can bee firme in this still-wearing world, the Saxons, for their valour a second triumphant nation, began as it were where the Romans left: for besides the continuall possession of their owne Countrey, as in that case unpartiall Tacitus doth tell us; their legions were transported into all parts of the world, and without whom almost no victory was wonne: of whose power and prowesse in the expeditions of warre both Dionysius, Arrianus and Seneca, doe speake. To these then likewise if the Britaines gave place, the lots came forth with the like price of the rest, and in this Iland they bought their conquests as deere as they had done in any other part of the world. Neither was Britaine subdued by either of these nations, or their inversion and exchange of policy altered, but with as unwilling subjection and streames of bloud as had beene sluced out of the sides of their mightier nations, or by them had beene tamed to follow their triumphall chariots. And more honour attributed to passe these British Seas, with more admiration onely to see the Iland it selfe, then was usually conceived of Kingdomes more larger, or that lay jacent as farre from Rome. And the conquest of some small parts of Britaine in no small selfe-glory to be inscribed as trophies of their victories upon their Coynes, and to give surnames to the Emperours and their sonnes: as shall bee shewed, when the age of this history shall be increased with the times of the Romans affaires in this Iland. Free from subjection before the attempts of Caius Iulius Cæsar by the testimony of Diodorus Siculus, and never had yeelded to any forraine power, as not provoked by Dionysius or Hercules, nor inforced by any to maintaine their liberties by the feates of warre.

Tacitus in his description of Germany.

But Cæsar in Gallia thirsting after novelties, or his conceited humor to purchase renowne, made the Sea seeme safe from dangers in passage; and himselfe resolute to venture his person amongst those bold and barbarous Britaines: wherein he left no meanes unassayed for their conquest and subjection, nor his successors omitted any provident care to retaine and keepe the land in their possessions, which whilest it stood a province in their obedience was held and accounted the faires plume in their triumphant Diadem, and the losse thereof (if no more but onely in name) as was publikely affirmed, would proove a great detriment to the Empire. This made the Romans to desire it as they did, who besides the great glory they conceived in the conquest, made it the granary for the Westerne garisons; besides the delicate provisions for their Emperors owne Tables.

And the German Saxons straitned in their owne Countries through increase of their people, or haply to supply their owne wants, infested with piracies these West parts of the world, and among all others set the eye of their affections upon this most beautifull Iland, and never left their attempts unassaulted till they set the glorious Diadem thereof upon their owne heads. Changing the name Britannia into Anglia, a terme most fit to expresse that subject, and pleasing in sound as Angelicall like, neither have themselves prooved unworthy of so rich a possession, that in warres have maintained, and by voyages made knowne her fame as farre as the Sunne hath his beames, or the endlesse Ocean her ebbes and tides. But of these things wee shall have occasion hereafter.

And now addresse our selves to describe our ancient Britaines, and to shew their true pictures as they are reported. At first rude and uncivill (I taxe them no further then all others then were in the world, some few excepted that were onely taught by God) and with the first were reclaimed to a more civill respect, both in their apparell and apprehension of literature; whose pictures in the Chapter succeeding wee will demonstrate as they are described by Cæsar, Pliny, Dio, Herodian and others; at first altogether naked, cut, and painted as thou seest; afterwards partly clad in imitation of others which frequented their Countrey either for trafficke or conquest; in both which manner take them as they are reported to bee by these Authors, and impute no liberty in the draught to the workemans best liking, nor thy selfe any whit disparaged to bee brought from such parents, which here are set as the pillars spoken of by Iosephus, that after the flood did preserve the invented science of the celestiall bodies, lest time or elements should consume that knowledge, or devoure those rules before demonstrated: So the true portraiture of our ancient progenitors may by these bee preserved from the ruines of time, and made our motives to bee thankefull unto him that hath brought us forth in these most civill times, and not onely clad us with the garments of humanity, but by his spirit hath guided us unto a celestiall knowledge.

CHAPTER VII.

THE understanding and apprehensions of men clouded in ignorance, are by a great Philosopher compared to the eye sight of such men, as stand and behold things afarre-off; because both of these, though they apprehend some general shapes and notices, yet can they not discerne of the true proportions and proprieties of their Objects. The like happeneth in the search and survey, as of all other Nations, so of our owne, of our first beginnings, our antike customes, behaviors, habits, &c. the true circumstances whereof are the more difficill to find, in that those things are not onely remote many degrees beyond the kenning of our Eye, (yea so many ages from the times wherein we live,) but are also shadowed and enwrapped in manifold uncertaineties and contrarieties, wherewith even those Writers have perplexed our way, who undertooke to bee both our guides and our lights. Notwithstanding, our purpose being to propose unto the eye of our now glorious and gorgeous Britaines, some generall draughts of our poore and rude Progenitors, (that as King Agathocles in his chiefe feasts used onely Earthen dishes to put himselfe in minde that his Father was but a potter, so we may remember that true British Nobility is more in Vertue then in Ancestors;) let us first see what the principall notes and markes are, whereby the persons of those first Britaines were made so remarkeable among all other Nations.

Aristotle.

The reason why Nations Originals are so hardly found out.

The three chiefe notes of the Britaines.

(2) These notes were chiefely three; First, their going naked; Secondly, their staining and colouring of their whole Bodies; thirdly, their cutting, pinking and pouncing of their flesh with garnishments (for so they thought them) of sundry shapes and fashions, as the two first ensuing Icones or Portraitures doe represent. Touching all which, the reports of Authors are very discrepant: and therefore fith light is gotten out by collision of flintes, wee will essay, whether out of those writers contradictions (brought to the stroke, and confronted together) we may strike some glimering light to direct us how to paint them forth, who so delighted in painting themselves.

1. The first note of the Britaines, their Nakednesse.

(3) First touching their going naked, the authority of Cæsar must oversway (as being ancientest) the too generall reports of such others, as seeme to relate that the Britaines generally used no Coverture, as neglective either of weathers injury, or of civill modesty; for he saith, interiores plerique pellibus sunt vestiti: the In-land men for the most part were clad with skinnes. And yet these In-landers were the rudest of all the rest, the Kentish and Sea-borders being full of humanity, and little differing from the French civility: So that when Herodian saith, Vestis usum non cognoscunt, nec induuntur quidem, They neither know the use of Garments, nor put any on: either he speakes on hearesay, or his large report must bee restrained to some certaine Persons, times, and places. And for certaine Persons and times indeed Pliny somewhat limits it, saying; that their married women, both elder and yonger, (coniuges, nurusque,) in certaine festivals used to goe starke naked: so doth Dio also for certaine places: in their Tents (saith hee) they lived naked and unshod, where hee seemeth to allow them some coverture abroad. The like may be supposed in time of winter or warre; were Herodian himselfe saith onely, pleraque corporis nudi, A great part of their body was bare.

(4) It may seeme hereby, that those originals of particular Nations were not much unlike that first beginning of the universall prosemination of mankind, when our first parents innocency walked in naked simplicity: the foundations of all things being, as farthest from our sight, so more simple and farre from those artificiall frauds, which some call wit and cunning. And though an * ancient Father bee mistaken, in conceiving that by the foure letters of the name of Adam, were signified the foure quarters of the world, (that being an Hebrew name of three letters, and not a Greeke of foure) yet all those quarters of the world participate somewhat of Adams dispositions; and as all naturall things returne by course to that whereof first they were framed, so if Lawes, discipline, and customes, did not restraine men, they would in time, of themselves revolve to that first neglective condition, and carelessnesse of those outward respects whence men are now named Civill.

* Saint Cyprian interprets. Anatole, East. Dysis, West. Arctos, North. Mesembria, South.

(5) But in our Britaines, three reasons there seeme of this their going uncloathed. First their hardnesse, which was partly naturall, and partly acquired by practise of their bodies to durance: of whom Dio records that all of them had an excellent habit in tolerating hunger, cold, and labours, insomuch as they could endure to abide many dayes together in the water up to the chinne without any food at all; that they would live in the woods on rootes and barkes of trees; though one kind of food he there mentioneth unknowne in our times, whereof using to take as much as a beane onely, they were not subject either to hunger or thirst. No marvaile, if those, who would endure this, could endure the want of garments: especially in a soile whereof we find this Euloge. Tu nimium nec frisita gelu, &c.

Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art,
Twixt both thou hold'st the meane and pleasing'st part.

The like patience wee find even now not onely in the wilder Irish, and Virgineans, but in rogues and wanderers of our owne Countrey, who often pittilesse of themthemſelves voluntarily deprive their Bodies of this Protection againſt the Aires offence, to procure pittie of others. And what ſpeake we of theſe? ſeeing even children for Cuſtome, and Women for pride, will ſuffer their Breaſts, and moſt tender parts of their Body, to be expoſed not only to offence of weather, but of modeſty alſo? yea generally, the hands, and faces, being of moſt ſubtileſt ſence, yet by cuſtome are enabled now to endure that, which by the like cuſtome the old Britaines endured in their whole Bodies; whereby Plutarch thinkes they uſually lived ſo long even to the age of fiue ſcore, the externall cold keeping in and augmenting their internall heate.

Plutarch.

(6) Abilitie to endure cold, ſo ignorance (in many) of meanes to prevent it, may ſeeme another occaſion of theſe Britaines nakednesſe. The Romans (it ſeemes) in their old Conſuls times, and after, had not the skill nor uſe of Hats, Breeches, &c. That Britaine abounded with Woll and other materials for cloathing, is paſt all doubt, for which cauſe, by one in a Panegyrick it is named Fiche in Paſturage, which by another is thus explicated, that therein was an infinite multitude of tame cattell both with Vdders full of milke, and loaded with fleeces to the ground. So then Woole was not wanting, but Will or Skill; the latter in moſt likelihood: for, as Strabo ſaith, that though thoſe ſtruting Vdders yeelded great ſtore of milke, yet ſome of them had not skill to make cheeſe, and having ſo rich grounds, yet had not the art of tillage, ſo their ſheepe might have ſuch heavy fleeces, yet ſome of their Owners no cunning to keepe themſelves warme therewith. Some of them, I ſay; for otherwiſe, as Pliny, touching Tillage, gives light to Strabo, witneſſing, that others of them were ſo good Husbands as to manure their grounds with Marle, as likewiſe doth Dioſcorides, ſaying they had skill to make drinke of Barley: ſo probable is it that thoſe other who were by Cæſar and Tacitus ſaid to be ſo like the French in conditions, had alſo ſome part of their Art in fitting the Burthen of their Sheeps backs to cover their owne.

(7) The laſt reaſon of ſuch their going naked ſometimes, was out of an opinion that no cloathing ſo adorned them, as their painting and damasking of their Bodies, for which cauſe (ſaith Herodian) they would not cover themſelves, leſt then their gay painting ſhould not be ſeene: but Pomponius Mela makes doubt, whether their thus painting themſelves were for ornament or for ſome other uſe; which doubt Cæſar ſeems to reſolve, as if the men did it becauſe it made them looke more terrible in warre.

(8) And thus wee are now orderly falne on the ſecond of thoſe three notes appropriated by Authors to our Britaines, which is their painting and ſtaining of their Bodies, which appeares by Cæſar to have beene more univerſally uſed then going naked, for all the Britaines (ſaith he) die their bodies with ſtaining. As Authors differ in the reaſon of this their painting, (as we ſhewed) ſo in the name, perchance alſo in the ſubſtance of that wherewith they ſtained themſelves, and ſomewhat alſo in the colour it ſelfe. The ſubſtance Cæſar calles luteum, which yet in vulgar acception is thought to be ſome yellow ſubſtance, as Pliny calles luteum ovi, the yolke of the Egge; Pliny himſelfe ſaith the Frenchmen call it glaſtum, deſcribing it to be an herbe like Plantaine, which Oribaſius (as learned Cambden ſheweth) doth terme Vitrum, in which ſenſe Mela is underſtood to ſay that they were ſtained Vitro (and not Vltro) it being generally taken to be Woad, from thoſe ancient times hitherto uſed for the ſureſt ſtaine. But for the colour which is made, Cæſar and the reſt agree, it was Cæruleus, blewiſh or azure, which colour the Cambro-Britannes doe yet call glaſt, whence our glaſſe for windowes (called alſo vitrum) ſeemeth by reaſon of the colour, to have taken name. Onely Pliny leaveth ſome ſcruple, in ſaying, that the naked painted women imitated the Aethiopian colour; which muſt be underſtood either comparatively, in reſpect of People white and unpainted, or becauſe blew a farre off hath the appearance of blacke.

this painting, hath beene already ſhewed out of Iſidore, who writes, that they had that name from a word of their owne language, wherein Breath ſignifieth as much as painted or ſtained; but whether thoſe other Inhabitants of the more Northerne parts of this Iland, called alſo Picti or painted, had their name upon the ſame ground, & whether they were ſome branch of the Britiſh ſtocke, or of ſome tranſmarine Colony; it is a queſtion not yet decided. Pomponius Lætus, and ſome other, derive them from Germany, ſome from the Pictones in France; but Beda, from Scythia, whence ſaith he, they are reported to have come into Ireland in a few long bottomes, and finding no ſeating there, to have entred into Britaine. Though Beda his authoritie be venerable, yet the learned finde reaſons to induce them rather to beleeve, that they were the remaines of thoſe ancient Britaines, which either inhabited the North-part of this Iland, before the Romans entrance, or which (upon their Conqueſt) fled thither to avoid the Romiſh yoake, where the difficulties of the aire and ſoile protected them from the Romans ambition and invaſion. Whereto Tacitus well accordeth, ſaying, that Agricola drove the Romans Enemies (he means the more untractable Britaines) into thoſe parts, as it were into another Iland. And it is thought incredible, that thoſe Enemies of the Romans, who ſent forth againſt Agricola, an Army of thirty thouſand ſtrong, and who ſo vexed Severus, that in one expedition he loſt ſeventy thouſand of his Romans, and their Aiders were ſo utterly extinct, as that none of them remained; but that rather they wonderfully multiplied, being thoſe who afterward much perplexed and over-ran the Roman Province, and to whom (not unlikely) ſome other, ſuch as Beda mentioneth, did afterward joyne themſelves.

* Beda makes them divers tongues, but they were only different Dialects. See Cambden.

(10) If we would adde Reaſons unto Authorities, to prove that theſe Picts were no other then that multiplied of-ſpring of thoſe Britains, we could produce their * Language, their manners, their kind of Government (all bearing Britiſh Reſemblance) to confirme the ſame. But what need? ſince the ſelfe-manner of painting, is an undoubted marke in the Children repreſenting of what Parents they were borne. That they were painted, Claudian ſhewes, calling them, The Picts, ſo truely named; which Iſidore well expounds, The Britiſh Nation had their name from their Bodie, depainted with the juyce of an herbe, growing amongſt them. When therefore the Romans excluded them from their other Provinciall Britaines, this name (Picts) for diſtinctions ſake was in uſe amongſt them; before which times, yea, and long after, they were knowne to Writers by no other name then Britaines, and the Roman Emperours, Commodus, Severus, Baſianus, Geta, and upon the Conqueſts of them, inſtiled themſelves Britannici, Britiſh (not Pictiſh) Conquerors. But after the Roman tongue had prevailed with the Roman ſword, the Britaines themſelves uſed to name any thing painted by the name of Picte; as may bee gathered out of Vegetius, who ſaith, that the Britaines called certaine Sallops, Picts, becauſe their Sailes, Tackle, and Mariners apparell, were coloured blue, the very colour, wherewith theſe Britiſh Picts (as * ſomewhere they were truely called) uſed to ſtaine themſelves. When afterward the Iriſh-Scots had confederated themſelves with theſe againſt the Romans, they all began by degrees to be more civillized: the more Southerly of them being by Ninian the Britaine converted unto Chriſt, about the yeare of Grace, 430. thoſe other more Northward, by Columbanus, Anno, 565. by which time, it is likely, that Civilitie increaſing, their painting, and other like ruder Cuſtomes were well-nigh forgotten, both among them, and alſo amongſt thoſe other Britaines under the Romans Government. In which regard we have beſides thoſe præfixed Icones, and Patterns of their firſt and moſt ſavaged times, heere added alſo their Habits, when they began to put on, with conditions, a little better cloathing alſo.

colouring of their bodies: for besides it, some other bellishments they had, which they esteemed much more gracefull, then either their painting was, or any Cloathes could be. Which of the Britaines, Solinus thus delivereth: The Countrey is in part (note that he makes it not generall) inhabited by people barbarous, who by artificiall formes of incision have from their Childhood sundry shapes of Beasts depourtrayed in their bodies, and as their limmes increase in growth, so doth the pictured worke together therewith, neither doe these wilde people boast of any greater kinde of patience, then in bearing long-lasting scarres, where the paint had deepely sunke into their sliced flesh. The very parallel whereof is also by Isidore set down touching our Picts, whose bodies sliced and pinked by an artificiall punchion, did sucke in the iuyce of the staining herb, carrying these Rasures on their pictured limbes, as badges of their Noblenesse, thus endamasked. Neither onely the shapes of Beasts, but of all other things, were so printed in their flesh; which Herodian takes to be the prime reason, why they delighted to goe naked, lest they should hide these their pleasing garnishments. Where also by the way may be observed, since Solinus saith that the barbarous onely used so to doe, and Herodian, that those who did so, used therefore to goe naked; that therefore not the Britaines in generall, but the most barbarous of them used to goe naked. And very answerable to Solinus (who elegantly calleth such their figuring of themselves, inscriptis visceribus, a writing on their bodies) is that of Claudian, Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras, On dying Picts he reads the breathlesse shapes, as if the Beasts so lively portraited on them, seemed to lie dead together with the murdered bodies of the Picts.

(12) By these varieties of picturing, (if * some have not misinformed us out of their alleadged ancient Authors) those people so distinguished themselves, that the married women were knowne by having pictured on their shoulders, elbowes, and knees, the heads of some foure beasts, as Lions, Gryphons, &c. On their belly, the Sunne spreading his beames: on their Pappes, Moones and Starres, &c. On their Armes thighes, and legges, some other fancies of their owne Choice. But for their Virgins, their whole body was garnished over with the shapes of all the fairest kinds of flowers and herbes; which (to speake indifferently) could not but yeeld, though a strange, yet no unpleasing aspect. Whereas the Men were (as Cæsar speakes) very horrible to be looked on, having all their breast and body disfigured with ugly Beasts, Serpents, ravenous Birds, scales and finnes of Fishes, &c. in which relation yet, this scruple will not easily be removed (if it be true, that from their childhood their prints increased with their bodies) how those, who being Virgins, had no prints but of herbes and flowers, becomming Wives, were so easily transformed either into Beasts or heavenly Creatures.

(13) The later Women (as you see by the later portraiture,) became farre more modest, that is indeed more womanly; having learned that then they openly shew most beauty, when openly they shew not their beauty: much lesse should they expose to the view, that which Nature most endevoured to hide, as knowing it least worth the viewing: yea, * some observe that women being drowned, naturally swimme with their face and fore-parts downward, whereas Men doe contrary; as if the impression of modesty were not to leave a Woman even after death. Agrippa, who mentioneth it, reporteth also of some Matrons, so roo-modest, that they chose rather to die, then to expose some hidden diseases to their Chirurgians view: A point unfortunately inferred into his witty booke, in praise of women, which hee dedicated to Margaret, wife to Maximilian (afterward Emperour): the, of womanly bashfulnesse, choosing rather to die, then to have her thigh cured, which was broken with a fall from a horse. The picture of this Brittish woman here last deportraied, is framed to that description of the most valiant Brittish Lady Boudicea, of whose brave attempts on the Romans, you shall reade more hereafter in the seventh Chapter of the sixth Booke.

(15) For their other habiliments of warre, and the manner thereof, we have described it in the same fourth Chapter; their fight being (as Diodorus saith) after the fashion of the Heroes in the first Age of the World, who fought in Chariots; yet on foot also they were most strong (saith Dio) and also most swift; which makes me marvaile why Strabo should say, they were pedibus male suffulti, not strongly underpropped; Who also addes, that they were (as himselfe observed at Rome) much taller then the Gaules, but yet of no very elegant shape and timber; Vsing as (Cæsar saith) to weare their haire very long and curling, otherwise shaven all their bodies over, except onely the upper lip. Their weapons (saith Herodian) were narrow shields, and short speares, at the end whereof (saith Dio) was a little bell like a ball, which they shooke at their first encounter in Warre, for terrour of the Enemy. Swords also had they, but short, hanging at their naked sides; but helmes and Corslet they used none, as esteeming them burdens rather then helps in warre. But about their necks they wore a round circle of Iron, (as an ornament no lesse esteemed then gold with other Nations) as also about their waste, whereat they hung their skeines: being (doubtlesse) a most warlike Nation, (as their posterity have ever since proved) and most desirous to spill blood, wherein yet their Of-spring by divine blessing are now most different from their Ancestors.

THE SIXTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER. I.

THE next Nation to the Britaines that obtained possession, and soveraignty of this Iland, were the Romans, and of them Caius Iulius Cæsar the first, what time their State had undergone all kinds of governments, and now aspired almost to their highest pitch of glory. This Cæsar bearing the office of Questorship in Spaine, and naturally disposed for great assayes, was thereto the more incited at the sight of Alexanders portraiture, standing in the Temple of Hercules at * Gades, where beholding it with great admiration fell into a sudden dislike of himselfe, and (as Alexander in seeing Achilles Tombe) with an ambitious, yet honourable emulation, sighed and said: Hast thou at my yeeres atchieved the conquest of the whole world, my selfe hitherto having done no memorable act? Ever after which hee disdained that his petty charge, and made suite to the Senate to be dismissed; holding that the cloude which overshadowed his following and (soone after) flowing fortunes. And forthwith returning to Rome observed every occasion that might make him gracious in the peoples eyes, having the advantage of the time which then was swayed with most dislikes: and entring into many factions, yea and some of them not without suspition of conspiracy, did notwithstanding so manage his proceedings, that their constructions were ever made honourable, and himselfe the man by all assents that did support the glory of their State; unto whom offices of high dignities were assigned, which daily increased his credit and power. And in the time of his Consulship, tooke upon him the government of Gallia, where he remained ten yeeres together, and forbare no occasion for warre, were it never so unjust or dangerous: insomuch that framing a bridge of wood over the broad and swift River Rhene, he entred the country of the Swevians, being the first Romane that assailed the Germans: and thence with victory returning, found his charge the Gaules in quiet: both which fortunes were as spurres to his aspiring mind, and set his thoughts to worke upon other attempts.

(2) For now intending a voyage into Britaine, he prepared thitherward, as well to inlarge the extent of his ambition and glory, as to satisfie himselfe with the sight and feate of the Iland, as for a further knowledge of those people the inhabitants, after whom he had most diligently inquired, yet by no relation could find content. But his pretence was revenge against the Britaines, for that thence (as himselfe speaketh) the Gaules had received most of their supplies against him in all his warres; or as some have written, for the desire of Pearles that therein plentifully grew, whose beauty and weight he had oft observed.

But because the Summer was almost spent, and that the voyage seemed dangerous through want of knowledge, either for place of entrance, or safety in harbour (for our learned Countryman Roger Bacon was doubtlesse in an error, who thinketh that Cæsar set up perspective glasses on the coasts of France, and thence saw all the ports and creeks in England) he thought good to send one Caius Volusenus a military Tribune in a Galley before him, giving sufficient instructions for so great an enterprise in hand, himselfe drawing towards those parts of Gallia, that lay neerest coasted unto Britaine, thence expecting his successe.

(3) These things were not so secretly done, but that the Britaines received notice thereof, and thereupon some of their private States sent Ambassadors with proffers of submission under the assurances of their hostages. Which Cæsar accepted and sent backe againe with liberall promises, joyning in commission with them Comius a King of the Atrebatii (for so he is stiled upon his Coyne) a man well reputed, and respected among the Britaines, that he might perswade the rest of the States to imbrace Cæsars amity. In effecting of which businesse, some five dayes being spent, Volusenus returned, having wafted upon the coasts of Britaine so farre, as with safety he might, which was no further then to view it with the eye, his foot not daring to tread the shoare replenished with those barbarous people, as it hath pleased the Romans to terme the Britaines. His discovery and relation gave small encouragements to Cæsars hoped successe, and had not the Morines yeelded him their obedience, it may be thought his voyage at that season had beene stayed.

(4) But now composing his affaires in Gallia, and having ready an hundred ships (wanting but two) besides many Gallies also for transporting his army, he loosed from the shoare, having a good wind, about the third watch of the night, taking order for his horsemen to imbarke with all speed and follow after him; himselfe early in the morning attained the sight of Britaine, whose cliffes he found covered with armed men, and place for entrance so naturally beset, being strengthned with steepe hils and rockes, that he there cast anchor, and called to counsell the Legats and Tribunes, declaring unto them the danger of the haven that gave such advantage to their enemy, whose darts from the higher ground might much impeach their arrivage, and therefore determined their landing elsewhere.

(5) Their Councell was no sooner dismissed, but Cæsar (both tide and wind fitting him) not foreslowing the occasion, gave signe of remoove, and some eight miles distant came to * a plaine and open shoare, and made preparation to land his men. Thither also the Britaines had removed part of their forces, and so valiantly withstood the enemies, that Cæsar himselfe, though wholly addicted to honor himselfe and his Romans, yet confesseth that his army was sore overlaid and terrified with that incounter: and had they not beene assisted from the Gallies with an unusuall kind of Engines, which did beare backe the Britaines (unexpert of that strange manner of assault) the Romans had not set foote on British soile, neither durst they then adventure it, untill the Standard-bearer for the tenth legion desperately leapt forth of the ship with his Eagle, calling on the danted souldiers and asking whether they would dastardly forsake their ensigne and betray it through cowardize to the enemy: which opprobry provoked them to follow his example, and so they got the shoare after an encounter fierce and terrible on both parts, as Cæsar acknowledgeth. But the first of all (even before the Stander-bearer) who put courage into the Romans and taught them how to deale, was (as testifieth Eutropius) one Sceva a Britaine (who formerly had fled to Cæsar) and guiding foure other souldiers in a boat to a rocke neere the shore, where the tide leaving them, his fellowes slunke backe in the boat, but hee most boldly defended himselfe from the rocke against the Britaines, like a Beare at a stake among a multitude of mastives, till having all his armour broken in peeces, and himselfe all wounded with darts, he swamme to the fleet; and begging pardon for his foole-heady forwardnesse, Cæsar both forgave him, and rewarded his valour with the honour of a Centurion: and hee did Cæsar afterwards noble service at Dyrrachium in the civill warres. Cæsar confessing, that hee alone saved the fortification against Pompey, at which time his targe was shewed to Cæsar, having 230. holes pierced in it by the enemy, whereof Iosephus Iscanus that ancient Poet of Excester writeth thus:

Hinc & Sceva satus pars non obscura tumultûs
Civilis, Magnum solus qui mole soluta
Obsedit melioraque stetit pro Cæsare murus.
The Britaine Sceva in civill warres well knowne,

Was Cæsars wall more strong then wall of stone.

The first attempt assayed, that is warranted by any true Record for the conquest of this Iland: which happened in the yeere of the worlds creation 3873. and before the birth of our Saviour Christ, 54.

(6) This enterprise for landing thus atchieved, Cæsar charged so fiercely upon the enemy, that he put them to flight; but wanting his horsemen to follow the chase, (which as yet were not arrived) he proceeded no further, but encamped his hoast upon a great plaine, not farre from the Sea, and not without likelihood thought to be Barham Downe: for so neere lay it upon the shoare, that thence he beheld the dispersion and losse of his 18. Ships (comming under saile with his horsemen to his assistance) through the violence of a storme, and rage of Sea.

At Barham Downe Cæsar seeth the dispersion of his Ships.

(7) In the meane time the Britaines, that after flight had againe recovered head, and in their assemblies advisedly considered their imminent dangers, concluded their submission for the safest remedy, and to that end sent their second Embassadors unto Cæsar, with whom Comius before remembred was employed, whom they had retained in strait prison for Cæsars cause, but now made him a meane to worke their peace; which was granted after some soft and gentle reproofes, with hostages received for performance of Covenants, and resort of their Nobles to Cæsars campe, to yeeld themselves and Cities to his will.

The Britaines second ambassage to Cæsar.

(8) These Britaines, although rude in regard of the Romans, and unmatchable to them in educated civility, yet were so skilfull in the affaires of warre, and so ready to discerne the least advantage, that they easily perceived the weakenesse of Cæsars power, both in want of horsemen to equall their wagons, wherein chiefely stood the strength and order of their fight, as also of ships for service and safty, as occasions should be offered: whereby their minds touching their promised submission began to waver, and the matter with better advice to be pleaded in their assemblies; for that not onely these foresaid ships for Cæsars supply were disperséd and hindred, but even his owne fleet, which lay then in harbour, by the rage of wind and Sea, (being then spring-tide, and the Moone in the full) was not onely filled with waves, but also their Tacklings, Sailes, and Anchors spoiled or lost, the violent storme so dashing the bulkes one against another, that their bruised bottomes were thereby made unfit for burden.

Cæsars ships distressed.

(9) This losse was so great, that it is accounted the first of the three adverse fortunes which ever happened to Cæsar in all his proceedings: and it was so well observed by the Britaines, that immediately they intended a revolt, and in Counsell urged this, as the materiall point that breathed hope and life to their former liberties, condemning themselves as impious, if they should refuse to joyne consent with the Heavens, whose Elements had thus farre fought for their freedome and full deliverance, assuring themselves (if on this advantage they might cut off these new guests) that never any afterward would adventure to enter Britaine in hostile manner.

Suetonius in vita Cæsar.

Britaines revolt.

And thereupon they began both to slacke the performance of Covenants, and daily to withdraw themselves from Cæsars Campe, which gave him just occasion to suspect whereat they aymed. And to prevent their proceedings he as wisely wrought: for first repairing his Navy with the Huls Timber, and Tackling of the most bruised Ships, with the losse of twelve Ships onely, the rest were made able to brooke the Seas. And providing against the advantavantage of the enemy, he sent forth the seventh Legion for forrage to supply any occasion.

(10) This Legion taking the coast cleare, and little surmising so suddena revolt, fell to the Sickle and Sithe like harvest labourers, and laid their weapons aside, mistrusting no enemy. Now the Britaines as forward to put in practise what they had determined, closely had laid themselves in ambush, for thither they knew the enemy would come, a peece of Corne there standing, whereas in all other parts harvest was past: and so having these workemen in their danger, suddenly fell upon them, slaying some, and forcing the rest out of their array, who not knowing the order of their fight, cast themselves in a ring (the best defensive forme of embattelling) and stood on their guard as they might: but had they not happily beene rescued, Cæsar had lost one whole Legion at that time.

The Britaines suddenly assaile the Romanes.

(11) For though the skirmish thus in acting was altogether unknowne and unexpected to the rest of the Romans, yet by the rising of the dust, appearing to the Cohorts that warded before their Campe, the same was mistrusted, which caused Cæsar in all haste to make thitherward with part of his hoast.

(12) The Britaines thus prevented, seeing more supply to maintaine the battle, stood still, without further stroke: and the Romans as much amazed at this sudden attempt, and order of their fight, made a stand, not venturing any further. Which order in fight so often mentioned, and so much admired, in Cæsars words we will declare, the rather because some have thence collected, that the Britaines were the off-spring of the Trojans, who with other Easterne Nations only used this kinde of fight in Chariots.

Clem. Edmonds his observations on Cæsar Comment. Lib. 4. cap. 22. obser. 2.

Cæs. Comment. l. 4.

The manner of the Britaines fight.

(13) They used (saith he) to ride in waggons against the approch of the enemy, and to circulate them about with a whirling compasse, and rattling noise, each waye casting their darts as they did drive, and ever as they saw advantage would winde themselves in amongst the Horse and Foot, to breake the array; which done, they would forsake their Wagons, and on foot most dangerously assaile the enemy. In the meane while the Waggoners would with-draw themselves somewhat out of the battle, and place their Waggons in such ordor, that if their Masters were overcharged, they might have speedy accesse, and opportunitie of retrait, by which meanes they were ever as quicke to moove as were Horsemen, and as stedfast to stand the battle as were the Foot, whereby they did supply the duties of both at once, and by daily exercise grew so expert in managing their Horses, that running them forcibly downe a steepe hill, they would stop, and turne them in the mid-way, and they would run along the beame, and stand firme upon the yoke; whence with like facilitie they would againe returne into their Chariots.

This order Cæsar so well observed, as that notwithstanding his desire of revenge, yet wanting his Horsemen (as he pretended) wherein consisted the chiefest resistance, hee durst attempt no further on them, but was content to keepe the field without proffer of battle.

successe at that present, departed without any impeachment, intending to prosecute their cause with a greater and more generall supply: and thereupon sent messengers to their severall States, with notice of their hopes against so small a power, whose Campe by them if any way might be vanquished, the purchase of spoile, besides their freed liberties, would require the paines.

(15) These States, though maintaining civill factions among themselves, yet seeing the intended danger of this generall enemy, presently assembled a great power, purposing yet once againe to try the hazard and fortune of warre. Cæsar, whose vigilancy did ever equall his valour, prepared his army, wherein now only 30. horsemen were present, and those brought to him by Comius the King. The battle joyning continued not long, but that the Britaines gave backe and fled, whom the Romanes pursued as farre as strength indured, and returned with the slaughter of many, burning the Countrey where they came.

(16) Thus the Britaines once againe vanquished, foorthwith sent their third Embassage unto Cæsar, desiring Peace, with promise of quict subjection; whom he with hard termes now reprooved, and imposed a double number of hostages to bee brought him into Gallia, whither he made all possible preparation, for that the Aequinoctium drew neere, doubting his crazed ships would hardly brooke the Winter stormes, that usually rage upon these Seas. And having gotten a faire wind, imbarked all his forces about mid-night, and so brought most of his Fleet safe to the continent. This enterprise so fortunately accomplished, Cæsar by his Letters made knowne to the Senate, who decreed and proclaimed to his honour a generall supplication or thanksgiving to their Gods, for the space of twentie dayes together, wherein all the Romans, clothed in white garments, and crowned with garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and offered sacrifices for so glorious a Victory.

CAESARS SECOND EXPEDITION INTO BRITAINE.

CHAPTER. II.

Moſt of the Britaines breake covenant with Cæsar.

CÆSAR expecting the performance of Covenants agreed upon in the Treatie of Peace with the Britaines, received hostages from two of their Cities only, and no more: the rest drawing backe, refused his subjection: whereupon intending not to lose so rich a prey, nor to suffer that Sunne to bee eclipsed, whose glory thus farre in his Horizon had ascended, he appeased some troubles in Gallia, and in the Winter season began his preparation to that enterprise. And having had experience of his former wants, hee furnished himselfe accordingly, and the next Spring following drew his forces towards Calis, the shortest cut into Britaine. There committing the charge of Gallia to T. Labienus his Lieutenant, himselfe with five Legions of souldiers, 2000. Horsemen, and 800. Ships, about the going downe of the Sunne looked from the shoare, and with a soft Southerne gale were carried into into the streame. But about midnight the winde failing, and their sailes becalmed, the tide diverted their course: so that in the dawning he well perceived his intended place for landing to be passed.

Cæsar againe landeth at the place of his first arrivall.

(2) Therefore falling againe with the change of tide, and endeavours of their Oares, about noone the same day hee recovered the shoare, even in the same place (and that without any shew of resistance) where he had found best landing the Summer before. There in convenient manner he encamped his Host, and by certaine Fugitives got notice of the power and place of the enemy.

(3) And lest delay should afford them advantage, he committed the government of his ships at anchor to Q. Atrius, and his campe on land to the guard of ten Cohorts, besides the strength of three hundred horsemen; and himselfe with the rest about the third watch of the night tooke their march towards the enemy, proceeding with such celeritie, that by the day dawning they were entred twelve miles higher into the Continent: where seeking to passe a river, which is supposed to be the water Stowr, the Britaines with their darts and chariots began in most terrible manner to assault the Romanes. But being at length by them repulsed, tooke into a wood strongly fortified both by nature and mans industry. For in the time of their owne dissensions they had formerly made this place one of their strongest fortresses, and had cut downe many trees, which overthwart the wayes of entrance they had bestowed.

Cæsar refitted at the river Stowr.

(4) In this they secretly kept, and where they saw advantage, would by companies sally out upon the enemy to their no little annoyance. Whereupon Cæsar commanded the seventh Legion to raise a banke, and to build a Testudo of boards, covered with raw hides, by which meanes the place without much adoe was wonne, and the Britaines forced to forsake the woods. Whose chase Cæsar forbade both in regard the day was neere spent, as also that the countrey was altogether unknowne to the Romans. But the next day the pursuit being begun, sudden newes was brought from Q. Atrius, that most of his ships the night before by a violent tempest were cast on Land, their bulks shaken, their cables broken, and anchours lost. Cæsars experience in like mishaps the Summer before, made him so much more ready to prevent the worst. And therefore recalling his forces, in all haste returned to his Campe, finding the relation too true in their wracke, wherein forty of his ships were quite lost. Wherefore hee wrote to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gallia for supply of ships, thence to be sent in all haste. Then gathering his shipwrights out of the legions, with the ruines of the bruised bulkes, he repaired the whole, and now having twice felt the dangers of these seas, caused his whole Fleet, (a strange attempt) to be drawne on land, even into the midst of the fortificaitions of his campe, so to secure them from the like mishap, and that one strength might defend both.

The Britaines driven from their fortresse.

He draweth his fleet on shoare.

(5) In which admirable toile ten dayes and nights were altogether spent, before hee could returne to the place from whence hee came; where now the Britaines through great confluence of people had increased their power, and entred againe their fortresse and wood. The chiefe command of these affaires was committed to Cassibelan, whose coine we have heere likewise set, a Prince of good repute for feats in warre, whose Seignory was severed from the Cities towards the Sea by the great and famous river Thamisis, and extended into the land full fourescore miles.

This Cassibelan present Governour of the Trinobants, had attained to the possession of their chiefest Citie by the slaughter of Imanuencetheir former Ruler (a man well respected, and much lamented after death) whose sonne Mandubrace, a gentleman of great hope, fearing the like danger, by the new established authority of Cassibelan, had made over into Gallia, craving Cæsars assistance to set him in his right.

Flor. Hister. Fabian.

(6) Cassibelan (if amongst these authentike Authors the British Writers may be heard) was the *brother of King * Lud*, and in the nonage of his nephewes governed the Trinobantes, whose bounds he fought to enlarge upon the bordering Countries of his neighbours, and in his fortunes had so borne himselfe, that he was much maligned, and more feared. But now all their dangers yoaked alike in a common perill, they laid aside private grudges, and held him the only man to support the ftrength of their troubled and declining estate, and by a common consent made him Generall of their warres. The expectation of whose proceedings he long delayed not, but with a fierce and hot encounter did assaile the Romans, and so manfully discharged the parts of his place, that in the sight of the whole Campe Quintus Laberius a military Tribune was slaine (in memory wherof the place as yet, though somewhat corruptly, is called Iul-laber) and Cæsar himselfe professeth he learned many points of martiall policy by their brave and running kind of encountering.

Cassibelan falleth for peace

(7) But his next dayes service prooved not so fortunate; for the Romans having learned their owne defects by the former dayes experience, laid aside their weighty armour, that with the more facility they might both assaile the enemies, and with like nimblenesse avoyde their fury, they having now bestowed their powers dispersedly, and scattered their troupes into companies, whereby the Romans were still matched with fresh supplies. A policy no doubt of no small consequence, had not destiny determined the fatall subjection of the Britaines, and Fortune now raised the Romans almost to the height of their Monarchy.

A great Tribute. So saith an old written Chronicle, the Author not named.

(8) For this failing, the Britaines never after shewed themselves with any united resistance, but having lost the day departed, thinking it better to secure every private by his owne meanes, then by a generall power to hazard all, as hopelesse any more to uphold that which the heavens (they saw) would have down. And Cassibelan himselfe despairing of happy successe, drew into his owne territories, keeping with him not above 4. thousand wagons. And fearing the Romans further approch, fortified the river Thamisis (then passable onely in one place) with sharpned stakes bound about with lead, and driven so deepe into the bottome, that Beda and Asser report them so to remaine in their times. All which notwithstanding, the Romans passed with the repulse of their enemies, and Cæsar, who grew now to the height of his honour, marched further into the Continent, and comming forward, was met by Ambassadors from the chiefest City of the Trinobants, which first of all the States proffered submission, and promised subjection, with this intreaty also, that Mandubrace (who being Cæsars follower, and doubtlesse the contriver of this submission) might be Governour of their City.

The Governors of Kent joyne with Cassibelan against Cæsar.

Thither Cæsar came, and with little losse or labour won the place, and many of the miserable Britaines, were both taken and slaine. Cassibelan now despairing of his owne power, farre unable to match, and much lesse to overmatch his Enemies, instigated the Governours of Kent, being foure in number, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximangulus, and Segonax, (whom Cæsar ter-meth Kings) to raise all their strengths, and suddenly to set upon the Romans Campe that guarded their ships; which enterprise was accordingly attempted, but with such successe, that the Britaines were on each side slaine, and Cingetorix taken prisoner, the rest saving themselves by flight.

(10) Cassibelan beholding these unfortunate proceedings, feared the end of unhappy successe, for he saw his Country wasted, his owne designes defeated, and himselfe forsaken by the traiterous revolt of many Cities and States on every side. Therefore as boorlesse to bandy against fortune, he sought to hold his owne with others, and sent Comius King of the Attrebatii to be his meane to Cæsar for peace, which was the willinglier heard and granted, for that Princes great valour, and that Cæsar determined to winter in Gallia, his affaires so requiring it.

(11) The conditions were hard, but necessity must be obeyed: for Cæsar imposed a grievous Tribute to be raxed of the Britaines, of no lesse then three thousand pounds yeerely to be paid, and moreover included the safety of Mandubrace, with his Trinobantes taken into friendship, and protection of the Romans; and lastly, that these Covenants should be faithfully observed, he commanded hostages for assurance forthwith to be delivered. These things thus compounded, hee tooke the Seas, about the second watch of the night, which then began to equalize the day in length, and safely arrived in the continent of Gallia; having rather shewed the place to posterities, then delivered to the Romans the possession thereof, as Tacitus saith, supposing it his glory sufficient to undergoe a matter so rare and difficult, and at his comming to Rome, to have presented his British Captives; whose strangenesse for attire and behaviour, filled the peoples eyes both with wonder and delight. He offered also in the Temple of Venus genitrix, a Surcoat made all of British pearles, as a Trophey and Spoile of the ocean. And now his fortunes comming to the highest, the title of perpetuall Dictator (then which the state of Rome could affoord nothing greater) sufficed him not, but a King he will be, and sole governour over all, though contrary to the Law and liking of the Romans; whereof in short time grew such heart-burning and hatred, that seventy principall men conspired his death, and after his many dangers of enemies in battels abroad, was in the Senate-house amongst his supposed friends, and in peace, cruelly murdered, receiving in his body three and twenty wounds, whereof he dyed, after he had sate Emperour onely five moneths.

(12) I am not ignorant that the British Writers doe vary from Cæsar in relating these his proceedings, and speake more honourably of their owne resistance then himselfe hath set downe, namely, that by the valour of Cassibelan their King, in his first attempts he was twice driven backe without his purpose, and forced to take the Seas, to the great hazard of his ships and men, yea and with the losse of his owne sword, which with great prowesse was wonne from him in a single encounter by Nenion, Cassibelans brother. And surely howsoever Polydore accounteth their Story new, and Cæsar carrieth himselfe gloriously in his owne affaires; yet by sundry other renowned Writers it seemeth, that the currant of his Conquest went nothing so smooth and untroubled, or with so little losse of the Romans, nor the Britaines liberties forgone by so easie resistance: which may be collected even out of some covert passages of Cæsars owne words, where it appeareth, that hee durst not at sundry times give the Britaines battell, though they were onely harnessed in Leather, and his Souldiers were all old Legionaries of long service, called for their huge armour, Milites gravis armaturæ, as having helmet, corslet and boots, all of massy brasse or iron, with a large target, a strong two edged sword, and a great staffe or clubbe headed with an iron pike; which oddes notwithstanding had not Cassibelan been undermined by Mandubrace, and traiterously forsaken (which Cæsar himselfe confesseth) by the Princes which promised him assistance, perhaps Cæsar might have missed this parcell of his glory: for all these helpes. Lucan saith expressely of him.

Territa quæsitis ostendit terga Britannis:
He Britaines found, but left them soone by flight.

Eutropius saith, He was wearied out and quelled both with the fierce battels of the enemy, and crosses of tempests, Tacitus saith, Hee found out Britanny for the Romans, but could not winne it for them: which was the very cause why (as Dion witnesseth) for twenty yeeres after Cæsars entrance, Britanny kept their owne Kings and their owne lawes, and had no forraine Prefects to command them. And Beda sheweth, that Cæsar in this Land was both received with sharpe and fore fight, and weakened by the losse of his ships, and with the most part of his men at armes. Tacitus also, using the speech of Caractacus to his Soldiers, hath these words: Hee called (saith hee) upon the names of his Ancestors, which called Cæsar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whom and by whose valour they were delivered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enjoyed freely their wives and childrens bodies undefiled. Againe, in the consultations of the Britaines intending a revolt, hee alledgeth their arguments, whereof one was the sudden departure of Cæsar out of this Iland, little better then a flight. With whom Dion Cassius also agreeth, affirming that Cæsar got nothing in Britaine besides the honour and renowme of that voyage, and flight of that Country, untill then unknowne to the Romans. And againe (saith hee) Cæsar departed thence having done no memorable act, which caused the Britaines to be secure and carelesse to provide themselves against his second arrivage. Whereby is apparant (even by Roman writers) both the bold resistance that the Britaines made, and the deare subjection that the Romans bought. But in matters so farre past, it is hard for mee to avouch any thing resolvedly, unlesse I could meete with that aged Britaine whom M. Aper conferred with here in Britanny (as Quintilian writes) who avowed that hee was in the British Campe when they did beat Cæsar from the shoare.

(13) Neither will I urge that for truth, which Authors have left us in their repores, concerning the many prodigies before going, and forewarning his death: things rather to be accounted the superfluities of their owne pens, and vaine imageries, ever working upon accidentall events, and ascribing issued successe to a supernaturall cause. Such conceit had Cæsar of himselfe, that for his fortunes hee would be stiled amongst the gods: and his deity to that credulous generation was further strengthned by the appearance of a blazing starre, which mooved (no doubt) an overlarge opinion of his humane power, and caused his glory much to surmount it selfe. And therefore lest ignorance should any way blemish his immortality, they have fained the manner of his dying best pleasing to himselfe, and many ominous signes to foreshew the same: all which he either lightly despised, or carelessely neglected, as they would have their Readers beleeve.

Cæsar would be stiled amongst the gods.

He was well learned, and therewithall very eloquent: and although so great a warriour, thirsting after fame, yet would he bee easily reconciled to his enemies, yea and often times seeke the meanes first himselfe. And he held it no lesse valour to subdue his wrath, then his enemy; as likewise in his disasters hee was of great temper and moderation, insomuch that Seneca writeth of him, that whiles hee was in Britaine, hearing newes of his daughters death (which was lamented as a great losse to the whole State) hee conquered that sorrow as easily and as quickly as he subdued all things where ever he came. And of his other moderateness, Cotas (who then held the second place of honour and command in the Army) writeth, that though Cæsar was then so great and glorious a Commander, yet he was so farre from outward pompe, as that when he came into Britaine he had onely three servants to attend him.

And therefore with lesse dishonor did nations subject themselves unto him; and this of Britaine with them, whose lot being cast amongst the hazards of the world, was drawne with an equall chance, as the rest, and yeelded their freedomes with as hard conditions, as did countries of more extent, and Kingdomes of greater account. But most especially the decree of God could not be gaine-stood, who had foreshewed by his Prophets the rising of these Chittims, and them a meanes to make the metalline image dust.

Chapter III.

AFter the death of Cæsar, thus slaine in the Senate, Octavian (the grand-child of Iulia, Cæsars Sister) whom hee had adopted, and declared his heire, returned unto Rome from * Apollonia, where he studied Philosophy, intending to prosecute the revenge of Cæsars death; where falling at oddes with Marcus Antonius, a man of great spirit and power, and setting himselfe against Brutus and Cassius, with their complices, for the murder of his uncle, secretly wrought the friendship of the Citizens, before whose eyes also Cæsars wounds seemed yet to bleed.

(2) These factions thus begun, grew to such height, that in the Senate-house their causes were pleaded, and by the instigation and eloquence of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Antonius was proclaimed enemy to the State: against whom Octavian was sent, with Ensignes of Consul, and title of Proprætor, being yet not twenty yeeres of age; which duty and office hee so well discharged in the parts of a valiant Captaine, that Antony was forced out of the field, albeit in this battle the one Consul was slaine, and the other deadly wounded. For which service so effected, he entred Rome in Triumph; though the glory thereof was much blemished, being obtained but in an intestine and civill warre. Marcus Antonius, to recover himselfe, and to make good his cause, joyned friendship with Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, Captaine of the horse, who together interposed themselves against Octavians proceedings; but by mediation of friends all three were reconciled, and joyntly erected that forme of government which thence was named the Triumvirat: for the establishment whereof they had severall jurisdictions assigned them: to Lepidus Africa, whereof he was present Governour: to Antony, the Countries as well of Greece as Asia, that lay betwixt the Ionian Sea entring at the gulfe of Venice, unto the River Euphrates: and unto Octavian all these West parts of Europe, amongst which this our Britaine was one.

(3) In these civill broiles, and bandings of great men (as Tacitus termeth it) the State of Britaine lay long forgotten, and stood in peaceable termes, Augustus thinking it wisdome (saith he) to restraine the infinite desire of inlarging the Roman Empire, whose extent was growne to that vast greatnesse, as it seemed even burdensome unto it selfe, whereby this remote Iland lay overshadowed from their sight: whereunto may be added, that the presence of Kimbeline the British King (as their history recordeth) in great favour with Octavian, was a great furtherance to the peace, even without payment of the former imposed Tribute. But yet the truth is (as Dion Cassius hath it) that Octavian desirous in all things to bee like unto Cæsar, seeing their tribute neglected, had intended a voyage towards Britaine; but having set forwards into Gallia, he had there tidings of the sudden revolt of the Pannonians, against whom he diverted his prepared power, and left his first desingement for that time. Notwithstanding, he still retained the desire of their subjection, and foure yeeres after made a second very great preparation thitherward, proceeding with his power againe into Gallia.

(4) The Britaines that had felt the force of the Romans, and in regard of their owne distractions at home, were hopelesse of ttrength to withstand them, sought the favour of Augustus by their submission, and to that end sent over their Ambassadours, who presenting themselves before him in Gallia Celtica, appeased his wrath, with promise of obedience and full satisfaction for their Tributes detained: whereby Cæsar was againe stayed, and the Britaines taken into favour and protection. Notwithstanding, the minds of their Magistrates were so unconstant, or else the money so hardly drawne from the people, who naturally hated all such obliged servitudes, having ever lived a free Nation, (as Ægisippus speaketh of them) that they againe failed their payment; whereat Augustus was sore offended, and the third time prepared his voyage that way, which yet a while was hindred by the revolt of the Byscayans, and some other Provinces.

(5) The Britaines seeing themselves thus still sought after, sent unto Cæsar their excuses, with presents to be offered in the capitoll to the Roman gods, having now learned with the rest of the world to appease Princes by gifts and rewards, yeelding part of the Iland, and swearing him fealty in the temple of Mars, and so were registred subjects to the Roman Empire. At which time also they agreed to pay tols and customes for all wares which they transported into other parts, their merchandize chiefely consisting of Ivory boxes, and Iron chaines, and other small trifles of Amber and Glasse. All which agreements and compositions were afterward so loyally observed, and the Land so composed to quietnesse, that one band of souldiers, with a small troope of horse (as Strabo saith) or foure Legions (as Iosephus writeth) were sufficient to containe so great a multitude in a settled forme of obedience.

(6) Over the Trinobantes, the greatest and most potent State of the Britaines, then raigned the happy Prince Cunobeline (for so in his Coynes yet remaining wee find it) corruptly written Kimbeline, the sonne of Theomantius nephew to Cassibelan before spoken of, whose abode and principall seate was Camaladunum, as by the reverse of the said Coynes may appeare. This Prince to make his estate more respective, caused his owne Image to be stamped thereon, after the manner of the Romans, (who now had newly taken up that fashion) his payments before consisting for the most part in rings of iron, and plates of brasse, seized at a certaine waight, which usually passed for currant amongst the Britaines, as Cæsar reporteth, and as those rings are yet witnesses, whereof we have seene some.

This man trained his people to a more civill life then formerly had beene accustomed, and enjoyed peace with the rest of the world, which then stood universally in quiet, as waiting the comming of that Prince of peace, whose going forth had beene from everlasting, and of whose kingdome there shall bee no end: even Christ the anointed Emmanuel and sonne of the living God: so long before expected, and now in the fulnesse of time manifested: at whose birth warre went downe, as Virgil speaketh, or rather to use the words of the Prophet, When swords were made into mattocks, and speares broken into sithes: And as in the building of Salomons Temple neither noise of axe, nor the sound of hammer was heard; so his body being the true Temple, he came and was incarnate at such time, when the sound of warre did not awake the world, but a calme and quiet peace incompassed it, as by the Angels was proclaimed amongst the Iewes, and now was more publikely made knowne amongst the Gentiles by the shutting of Ianus Temple in Rome. This universall peace was so famous and so admirable, that it found matter for the finest wits amongst the Heathens to enlarge themselves: whereupon Virgil framing the perswasions of Iupiter to his daughter, foresheweth the happy succesfe of her seed, and in what tranquillity they should sit, when the hands of Mars were thus restrained from fight, as hee thus expresseth:

And yet further in his Ecloge (from the Sibyls, who in all likelihood had it from the divine Oracles) hee useth the very words of the Prophets in speaking of a Maid, and a Child of a new progeny borne and sent downe from heaven, by whom the brassy and iron-like world should cease, and a pure golden age succeed. Thus he sweetly singeth:

Of stature he was but low, and of a good complexion; gray-eyed, his haire somewhat yellow, and his body freckled with spots, which as his flatterers would have the world beleeve, were in forme like starres. Predictions foreshewing his government and death are alleged, the which I willingly overpasse, holding most of them rather fantasies then truth. At his death hee demanded of the standers by, whether he had well acted the enterlude of his life upon this stage of this world: and dyed fourteene yeeres after Christ his incarnation; leaving after him so honourable an estimation of his glory, that as the succeeding Emperours in remembrance of Iultus Cæsar gloried to be called Cæsars, so they ever held the name of Augusti to be sacred, and only befitting persons destinated to imperiall Majesty. TIBERIVS.

Chapter IV.

Avgvstvs Cæsar thus gloriously raigning, and peaceably dying, had ordained for his successour Tiberius Nero, the sonne of Tiberius the Patritian, and of Livia his wife, whom (as we said before) hee had taken for his Empresse, and by whose incitements and continuall instigations it was procured: though Suetonius attributeth it unto Augustus his owne ambitions, to make himselfe the sooner misled, and the more lamented, in leaving his unlike to succeed: whose conditions as they stood upon their owne basis, hee knew to bee reproveable, and contemptible.

(2) But before the death of Cæsar could be divulged, to write his imperiall stile as it were in blood, he began with the murder of young Agrippa, the sonne of Iulia, daughter to Octavian, and once his own wife, and continued his raigne with such tyranny and murther, that many he slaughtred, without respect of person or cause; and in his looseſt lasciviousnesse, thought of nothing but how to subvert the Nobility; for rare it was in his dayes that any such dyed a naturall death: and maintaining a race of men (Promoters, as Tacitus tearmes them, found out for a common overthrow and destruction of others) allured them by rewards to accuse the rich, though guiltlesse; only this favour granted to the condemned, that if they slew themselves before the day of execution, their bodies should have burial, their goods at their owne disposse, and their testament stand good in law.

(3) A great dissembler he was, seeming ever to hate those vices which in truth he loved, and to love those vertues which he did most deadly hate: and for life and libidinous filthinesse so extreme, that a Christians pen may not expresse, when the Heathen themselves doe blush to name such things as he shamed not openly to commit: his publike drunkennesse, and continuall banquettings, whereat hee spent whole dayes and nights together without intermission, caused exchange of names from Tiberius Nero to Biberius Mero.

Britaine without forraigne garrison or government.

(4) In this state, amongst others neglected, Britain stood, wherein Tiberius neither maintained garrison, nor attempted alteration, and whereby (as it may bee thought) their owne Lawes and Princes bare sway among themselves, howsoever the cause for Tribute was ballized betwixt them. And most certaine it is, the Britaines, if not in subjection, yet were well affected to the Romans, as appeareth by Tacitus in the kinde entertainments, and in releeving their shipwracked souldiers, that in crossing the Seas were by tempests driven upon their Coasts, and courteously sent thence by their petty Kings unto Germanicus their Generall. Notwithstanding, Jeffrey Monmouth seemeth to affirme the contrary, that bringeth the raigne of one Guiderius, and the valour of Arviragus, the sonnes of Cunobeline (of whom more hereafter) to withstand the Romish Command, and utterly to refuse the paiment of Tribute, banding both against Tiberius, as also against Caligula and Claudius the Emperours succeeding.

Tacit. Annal. 2. cap. 5.

(5) Other remembrances of these times concerning us, finde we none, besides that which is common to all, namely the death of our Saviour Christ, which under this Tyrant, and in his eighteenth yeare was accomplished by the proceeding of his (as wicked) Deputy Pontius Pilate, who both adjudged him to die, and to be guiltlesse of deserving death: whereby was wrought the mystery of our Redemption, with such signes and evidences of his Deitie, that the wicked Judge himselfe wrote thereof to Tiberius, and hee to the Senate, to have him consecrated among the Roman Gods: Which they refused to doe, that the wisdome and divine power of God in the doctrine of Salvation should not need the allowance and commendation of men, as Eusebius hath well observed.

(6) Finally, when he had raigned (hated of all men) the space of three and twenty yeares, with no better liking then is read of Joram King of Judah, that lived without being deplored, hee was smothered to death (as is thought) by Caligula, the seventeenth Kalends of April, the yeare from Christs Nativity, thirty nine, and the seventy eight of his owne age. Hee was of personage tall, and of body strong, broad chested, and used both his hands alike, faire of complexion, but great and goggle-eied, whereby he saw so cleerely, as is incredible to report.

CAIVS CALIGVLA.

Chapter V.

Caius Caligula his parents. Tacit. Annals. cap. 9.

Next unto Tiberius succeeded his nephew Caius Caligula, the son of Germanicus the sonne of Drusus. His mother was Agrippina, the daughter of Iulia, Cæsars wife; and his Coines as thou seest above, being rather liked for his fathers vertues, (who was for learning, vertue, valour and courtesie, the most admired man of that age) then for any parts of his own answerable to so high a place, as being neither naturally framed for good presence in Throne, nor qualified in minde for an Imperiall Command. Ever in condition opposite to all, (& which is more) most times to himselfe. One while lasciviously prodigall, in excessive banquets, and admirable Sea-workes, with needlesse levelling of mountains, and filling up their vallies: Another while extremely covetous, imposing taxes upon the Provinces, and exacting gains out of the base earnings of pollutions of harlots: Alwaies cruel and libidinous. His owne mother he defamed to be incestuously begotten; his grand-mother he poisoned; his brother Tiberius he murdered; his three naturall sisters hee polluted incestuously, and upon Drusilla the second so incredibly doted, that he used to sweare by her sacred name, and deified her for a Goddesse by the name of Panthea, commanding divine honors to be done unto her. The like deity conceited he of himselfe, causing his Statue to be worshipped, and placed in his usuall roabs amongst the Roman Gods, and would have set it in Jerusalems Temple (as Josephus recordeth) had not that Great God cut him off by death. His Imperiall government was without either inlargement of circuit, or inforcing by armes a dutifull subjection, rather seeking to make

(2) How the other Provinces stood affected, I leave to themselves; but by Tacitus it should seeme the Britaines and Germans were not his best subjects: for these are his words, that Caius had a meaning to invade Britaine, it is certainely knowne: but his rash running head, and hasty repentance in his attempts against Germany, turned all to nothing. And Suetonius ascribes the foolish erection of that admirable bridge over a creeke of the Sea in Campania (whereof Dion writeth at large) to his vaine-glorious conceit, that by a brute blazed abroad of so huge and monstrous a worke, hee might terrifie Germany and Britaine, upon which Countries he meant to make warre. The issue whereof was as fruitlesse as his great cost was ridiculous. For having set forward for the conquest of Britaine with no small preparation, hee proceeded no further then to those parts of Holland that confront against Northfolke, where he suddenly pitched his Tents and stayed.

Adminius banished, flieth to Cæsar.

(3) At which time, Adminius the sonne of Cunobeline King of Britain being banished by his father, fled over Sea with a small power, and submitted himselfe unto Cæsars protection: whereupon Caligula wrote vaunting letters to the Senate, as if the whole Iland had beene yeelded into his hands: commanding the messenger that his letters should be carried in a Chariot into the Curia, and not delivered but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent and full assembly of the Senate. And having no further matter to worke upon, hee caused certaine German prisoners secretly to be conveied into a wood, and word to be brought him in great feare and amazement of the sudden approach of the enemie; against whom with shew of great manhood and noble resolution in all haste and warlike manner he marched, and in chaines openly shewed them as his captives taken in warre, forbidding the Senators the wonted celebration of their Feasts, or to enter their Theaters to take solace, seeing their Cæsar exposed himselfe to so many perils, and fought so great battels with hazard of his life. Last of all, as if he had meant to make a finall dispatch for ever of the warre, hee drew his forces downe to the Sea-coast of Belgia, and embattailed his army upon the Ocean shoare, planting his ballists and other Engines of artillery in their severall places, no man witting what he meant: which done, himselfe in a Galley launched into the Sea, and immediately returning, caused the Trumpets to sound the battle, and commanded his Souldiers forthwith to fall a gathering of cockles and muscles into their helmets, terming them the Spoiles of the conquered Ocean: Against which hee also built a Tower, as a Trophey of his victory, the ruines whereof as yet remaine in Holland to this day, and is called The Britons house in memory of that fantasticall service vpon which exploit he made a glorious Oration to his souldiers, commending and requiting their valours with rewards, and avowing their shell-spoiles worthy offrings to be presented in the Capitoll, writing letters to Rome of this his great Conquest, and demanding Triumph, and divine honours to be affigned him: which when the Senators made some question of, he threatned them with death. But this Sea-service (as it seemeth) so ranne ever after in his minde, that one night hee dreamt that the Sea in dreadfull shape came and expostulated with him, which cast him into an incredible horrour and affright.

(4) In his last yeare of life and raigne, Pontius Pilate, under whom christ Iesus suffered, was apprehended and accused at Rome, deposed and banished to the Town of Lions in France, where in despaire he slew himselfe in the yeare from Christ his incarnation, forty one, and from his death, the seventh, as Eusebius hath noted.

Euseb. lib. 2. c.7.

(5) And now both the Ambition and cruelty of Caius was grown so intollerable savage, as that he often lamented that some rare and unusuall disaster (as either some horrible slaughter of huge Armies, or some universall plague, or famine, or fire, or opening of the earth, or over-flowing of the Sea) happened not in his time, whereby his raigne might be made memorable to posterity. And hee wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that he might have the glory of giving the bravest blow that ever was given, whereby so infinite multitudes of men might be killed by him at one stroke. But this his wish was prevented by a blow on himselfe, his death and downfall being complotted and executed by certaine Tribunes, whereof Cherea was chiefe; who following him from the Theater with resolution of the fact, tooke the time when Caligula turning suddenly aside into a narrow Cloister to see certain boyes sent him out of Asia, lost the defence of his forewarders, and the straitnesse of the place permitted not his guard to follow, on which advantage Cherea demanded his watch-word, which he (according to his usuall manner) gave in great disdaine and scorne, whereunto Cherea replied, and with his sword wounded him in the necke, and jaw; and then the rest of the Conspirators comming in, with thirty wounds made an end of his life, after hee had most impiously raigned three yeares and tenne monethes.

(6) He was of stature tall, of complexion pale and wan, of body somewhat grosse and unfashionable, his necke and legges exceedingly slender, his eyes sunke into the hollow temples of his forehead, and that also frowning and full of wrinkles: his haire was thin and shaggy, but bald on the crowne, though otherwise so hairy of body, that all the time of his raigne if a man did but name a Goat, it was held a touch and offence of Læsa Majestatis against his imperiall person. His Countenance naturally sterne and grimme, which by composing and gesture he purposely made more ugly and terrible. His apparell always costly, but not always Court-like, neither civill: his beard he wore of gold like Iupiter or Æsculapius. In his hand for a Scepter, a Mace three-tined, as Neptune or God of the Sea, and upon his body the Curace of Alexander the Great, taken from his Sepulchre and Monument. Hee died aged twenty nine yeares, whose memory was so hated all unto all, that all the Copper Coines or Modals stamped with his picture were melted downe by decree of the Senate, whereby (if it were possible) his name and feature might be forgotten unto future ages.

CLAVDIVS DRVSVS.

CHAPTER. VI.

Claudius Drusus Emp.

BVt Claudius Drusus a man of better spirit and temperature, immediately upon the death of Caligula, and even in the height of those disturbances, by the Pretorian Souldiers (who were encamped neere the walls of Rome) was nominated, and chosen Emperour; whereas the Senate had decreed and determined to reduce the Citie into her ancient libertie, without admission of any Cæsar or subjection to such absolute and sole authoritie; notwithstanding, the power of this Armie so prevailed, that the election was confirmed, and the Imperiall dignity by him affumed, as the next, and onely man to whom it muft of right belong: whofe father Drufus was the fonne of Livia, wife to Octavius, from whom the Emperours fucceeding held it a glory to be any wayes allied.

Claudius Drusus chosen by the Pretorian Souldiers.

Ioseph antiquit. l.19.c.3.

(2) In his first proceedings with the Provinces affaires, hee determined warre against the Britaines, whose Tribute had beene a long time neglected, and whose subjection was now to bee feared: all of them being raised in a tumultuous uprore. The cause pretended was certaine fugitives, (the betrayers of their State and liberties) lately departed, and by the Romans received with protection of the Emperour: a matter that moved them to great discontents, and served as a shew for their just revolt.

(3) Claudius, as ready to prevent the worst, being thereto further incited by Boricus, one of those British fugitives as Dion reporteth, in the second yeare of his Empire, and from Christs Nativitie, forty five, sent Aulus Plautius, a Roman Senator, well experienced in the affaires of warre, to take charge of the Army remaining in Gallia, and with those old trained Souldiers to make over into Britaine to retaine their obedience. Which service upon them thus repofed, was generally distasted, as apparantly was shewed by their unwillingnesse thitherward, muttering and complaining, that they must now be inforced to make warre out of the world, and protracting time, could hardly bee drawne forward, though the Emperour sent his second command.

(4) But being at last imbarked and crossing the Seas, their ships were beaten with contrary winds, which still added discouragements unto their proceedings, and had not an accident the same time happened, the edge of their courage had beene more abated: for even in this distraction suddenly a fiery flame shot it selfe from East to West, the same way that their shippes made saile: which presently gave hopes to their despairing hearts, being heathenishly interpreted for a signe of good lucke, and so sent from their Gods; whereupon without any resistance, they came to shoare and tooke land.

Encouraged by a signe from heaven.

(5) The Britaines that mistrusted no such sudden invasion, and now thus surprised unawares, dispersedly secured themselves in woods and marishes, thereby to detract time, and the more to weary the Enemy by delaies: which thing Plautius well perceived, and with much labour, and hazzard followed so extreamly, that many he slew and tooke prisoner Caratratus their Captaine, the son of Cunobeline but lately deceased, which brought such terrour amongst the Britains, that thereupon the BODVNI, the Inhabitants of Oxford and Glocester-shires, yeelded themselves to Plautius devotion: for which service thus effected, the Senate decreed his Triumphs; & it is probable that this defeat of the Britaine forces, and surprise of their King, fell out in the sixt yeare of this Emperours raigne, by the reverse of his money then minted

Tacitus in vita Agric.

(6) But he following ſtill the Enemy, being ſeconded by Flavius Veſpaſian (afterward Emperour) the leader of the ſecond legion (the foundation of whoſe ſucceeding fortunes was firſt laid here in Britaine) gave them againe another overthrow. The chiefeſt meanes whereof was a policie they had gotten to gall the Chariot horſes, whereby their riders were maſtered, and their whole powers diſordered: many Britaines in this battaile were ſlaine, and more in danger, had not the night ended the ſkirmiſh.

C. Sidius Geta his valour.

(7) The next day the battaile was againe begun and maintained on both parts with equall advantage, till C. Sidius Geta enforced the Britainer to retire, whereby the victory reſted in the Romans: for which exploit Triumphall honours were aſſigned him, although he had not yet attained to the Conſular degree. In this Conflict Veſpaſian hardly eſcaped, being ſore oppreſſed by the Enemy, and in ſuch fort, that had not Titus (his renowned ſonne) come to reſcue, he had beene ſlaine, whoſe valour afterwards was tried in one and thirtie battailes, & in the Conqueſt of the Ile of Wight.

The Britaines retire to places of advantage.

(8) After this conflict, the Britaines withdrew themſelves into places of more advantage, and in the mouth of Thamiſis neere her fall into the Sea, paſſed the ſhallowes and firme grounds in ſafetie, whereas the Romans ignorant of both, brought many into danger, and in their diſtreſſed paſſage, were ſharpely aſſailed by the Enemie, in which turmoile, a bloody battaile was begunne, wherein Togodumnius a Britiſh Prince, brother to Catacratus, and ſonne to Cunobeline, was ſlaine: Notwithſtanding, the courage of the Britaines was nothing abated, but rather exaſperated to a further revenge: for effecting whereof, new forces were gathered, and confluence of people aſſembled from each part of the Ile. Plautius the Lieutenant ſeeing daily the increaſe of their power, Veſpaſian imploied in other parts, and himſelfe ſtreitned in a place of danger proceeded no further, but ſent word to the Emperour of the doubtfull eſtate of their affaires,

Togodumnius ſlaine.

(9) At that time (ſaith Suetonius,) the Senate had by decree allowed Claudius his Triumphall ornaments. But he ſuppoſing that ſuch a bare title of honour was inferiour to the Maieſtie of an Emperour, and willing of himſelfe alſo to enterpriſe ſome exploit whereby he might win the glory of a compleat Triumph, made choice before all other Provinces, of Britaine, attempted by none ſince Iulius Ceſar of famous Memory. And with great ſtrength entred into the iourney, having with him a mighti*e Armie* both of horſe and foote, as alſo Elephants, a beaſt of great bigneſſe and burthen, whoſe ſtrangeneſſe then amazed the Britaines, and whoſe Carcaſes falling in this Land, their late found bones (no doubt) have bred our errour, being ſuppoſed to be of men, and not of beaſtes.

Claudius the Emperor, commeth into Britaine with a great Army.

Dio Caſſius lib. 60. Elephants firſt brought into Britaine.

(10) With very great danger he paſſed the Seas, and joining ſtrength with his Lieutenant and Veſpaſian, they all together croſſed the River Thamiſis, where preſently they were encountred by the Britaines, who a while maintained the battaile very deſperately, but in the end gave place & fled, whom the Romans purſued even to their ſtrong Camulodunum, then the ſeate of Adminius, Cunobelins ſonne, as may aptly be conjectured by the Medal of Britannicus the Emperours darling, figured in the front of this Chapter; which City they ſurpriſed and fortified with their owne Garriſons, & the Emperour afterwards in the eleventh of his raigne (as appeareth by the other coine) turned to a Colony of Romane Citizens. Claudius now diſarming the Britaines, remitted further puniſhment either vpon their bodies or confiſcation of their goods: The which his favorable clemencie moved thoſe diſtreſſed Britaines to ſuch liking and love, as they erected a Temple and Altar in his name, and gave him divine honour, as a God: The reſt, as unable to reſiſt proffered their ſubmiſſions, and promiſed a peaceable ſubiection under the Romans government.

Claudius ſurpriſeth Camulodunum.

He ſurpaſſeth Cæſar in ſtretch him to be honoured for a God.

(11) Theſe things thus atchieved, at the end of ſix moneths Claudius in his ninth yeare returned and entred Rome in triumph with more then uſuall manner, ſtamping againe upon his monies his arch of victory, as appeareth in the face of this Chapter, a perpetuall trophie of his victories and memory of our ſervitude. After whoſe Triumphant Chariot rode Meſſalina his wife, the Monſter of her ſexe for impudencie & laſciuious life: and upon the top of his Palace he placed a Navall Coronet in memoriall of the Ocean by him ſailed over, and therefore by his flatterers ſaid to be ſubdued; withall aſſuming to himſelfe, & ſonne, the Sirname Britannicus: And honoured Plautius with his preſence in his Triumphs for Britaine, giving him the right hand, aſcending the Capitoll, & beſides graced divers Captaines that ſerved under him in that warre with Triumphall ornaments. So great an eſteeme was held of the Conqueſt of ſo ſmall a part of this Iland.

Claudius returneth to Rome, and entreth in Triumph. Suetius in vita Claud. Tacit. 13.

(12) The Britiſh Hiſtorians relate theſe things farre otherwiſe, reporting that their King Arviragus, the youngeſt ſon of Kymbeline, withſtood Claudius in his enterpriſe, with whom (ſay they) he came to compoſition by giving him his daughter Geniſſa in marriage, in memorie whereof, he built the Citie Glauceſter, according to his name; which now is called Glocester: But Suetonius writing the life of Claudius, his wives and children, nameth his daughters onely to be Claudia, Antonia, and Octavia, without mention of Geniſſa at all, and therefore not likely to have any ſuch. And Dion Caſſius reporteth, that Claudius himſelfe ſtaied not above ſixteene daies in Britaine, a time too ſhort for the ſending to Rome, and thence for the returne with his daughter, or for the building of ſo great a Citie as Glocester is. Neither indeede was Arviragus knowne in the daies of Claudius: But rather lived in the time of Domitian the ſeventh in ſucceſſion after him, as plainely appeareth by Iuuenal the Poet, in thoſe his verſes ſpoken to Domitian, wch elſewhere we cited. Whereby appeareth that the ſtirres of this King could not accord with Claudius raigne, and that the trueth of this report is much weakned from more ſufficient authorities. But to proceede, Aulus Plautius (the firſt Lieutenant authoriſed over the Britaines) upon ſome occaſion was thence revoked, the warres not quieted, and with a ſmall Triumph (as Tacitus ſaith) entred Rome. Vnto him ſucceeded P. oſtorius Scapula, for reputation in martiall affaires nothing his inferiour, who at his firſt landing found all in an uprore: Of whoſe proceedings let us heare Tacitus ſpeake: The Britaines (ſaith he) that were yet unconquered, ranged the countries of the confederates, preſuming both vpon the approach of the winter, and the Propretors unacquaintance with his Army: But he knowing that the firſt ſucceſſe breedeth either feare or confidence, gathered the Cohorts, and made towards the Enemy, playing all that made head againſt him, and diſarming thoſe whom hee moſt ſuſpected. And to retaine Cogidunus the King in ſtricter aſſiurance and fidelity to the Emperour, granted divers Cities and States to him by way of Donation.

Ex hiſtor. magn. Britan.

His vndaunted reſolute.

The more to animate their mindes, the Leaders went about exhorting and encouraging the Souldiers, taking all occaſions of feare from them, and putting them in hope, with all inducements of reſolution: eſpecially Caractacus, who courſing hither and thither, proteſted that day and that battle ſhould bee the beginning either of a recovered liberty, or elſe a perpetuall ſervitude and bondage: and ever hee called upon the names of his valiant Anceſtors, who formerly had chaſed Cæſar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whoſe valour they were delivered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enjoyed freely their wives and childrens bodies undefiled. The Souldiers alſo themſelves ſhewed as great forwardneſſe, and as Echoes redoubled his words, vowing according to the Religion of their Country, never to yeeld for wounds or life, which they all were ready to ſacrifice in the cauſe of their liberties. This their apparant reſolution much appalled the Romans cheerefulnes, and moſt of all the Captaines and Leaders, who before their faces ſaw the River, on both ſides of them had the hanging hills, and the Fort commodious for the enemie, but deadly unto them: all which notwithſtanding the common Souldiers deſpiſed, and demanded the battell; Oſtorius, whoſe ſtudy was chiefly to performe the parts of a Generall, paſſed the River with ſome little difficulty, and leading his Army up to the Rampire, was met with ſuch a ſhowre of darts, that many therewith were wounded and ſlaine. Yet at length breaking downe thoſe rude compacted ſtones, joyned battell with the enemie, and afront came cloſe to handy ſtrokes; wherein the Britaines having better courage then armour (for they had neither headpeece nor coat of defence) were ſore galled with their Iavelings and two-handed ſwords, and ſo diſordered, that they betooke themſelves to flight.

The Britaines put to flight.

(14) This victory, as it was almoſt unexpected, ſo was it made famous by the taking of Caractacus his wife, daughter, and brethren, and himſelfe flying for ſuccor and protection to the Brigantes, was (as we have before ſhewed) by Cartiſmandua their Queene betrailed, and delivered into the hands of th Conquerours after his nine yeares moſt generous reſiſtance. Whereupon his fame being carried over the Ilands, and ſpread abroad thorow the Provinces, was alſo renowned in Italie, and they deſired to ſee him that ſo many yeares had contemned their forces. Neither was his name meanly eſteemed of at Rome; for whileſt Cæſars worth and power was there commended, a more glorious conceit was held of the conquered Caractacus: and againſt his comming to the City the people from all parts were aſſembled, as to behold ſome notable and moſt rare ſpectacle. The Emperors Guard in armes and good order were placed in the field before the Campe, thorow whom the Captives and Trophies were carried, and preſented after this manner: firſt the vaſſals of Caractacus going formoſt, bowed their bodies to the people as they paſſed, and ſeemed by their ruefull countenances to diſcover the ſenſe of their calamity. The capariſons, his chaines, and other ſpoiles gotten in the warres, were carried after them. Then Caractacus, his brethren, wife, and daughter followed, and laſt of all himſelfe, whoſe attire and ſtout behaviour filled the peoples eies with wonder and delight. His bodie, for the moſt part, was naked, and painted with figures of divers beaſts. Hee ware a chaine of iron about his necke, and another about his middle: the haire of his head, hanging downe in curled lockes, covered his backe and ſhoulders, and the haire of his upper lip parted on both ſides, lay upon his breaſt. Neither was his behaviour leſſe noted then the ſtrangeneſſe of his habit: for he neither hung downe his head as daunted with baſe feare, nor craved mercie, as the reſt; but with a confident ſpirit, and bold countenance, held on till he came before the Imperiall Seat, where making his ſtand, and a while beholding Cæſars Maieſtie, at laſt with great courage ſpake to this purpoſe,

His Oration to Claudius Cæſar.

"(15) If my moderation in proſperity had beene "anſwerable to the greatneſſe of my birth and eſtate, "or the ſucceſſe of my late attempts to the reſolution "of my minde, I might have come to this Citie rather as a friend to be entertained, then as a Cap"tive to be gazed upon; neither wouldſt thou diſ"daine to have received me on termes of amitie and "peace, being a man of royall deſcent, and a Com"mander of many warlike Nations. But what cloud "ſoever hath darkened my preſent lot, yet have the "Heavens and Nature given me that in birth and "minde, which none can vanquiſh, or deprive mee "of. I well ſee, that you make other mens miſeries the "ſubject & matter of your triumphs; and in this my "calamitie, as in a mirrour, you now contemplate your "owne glory. Yet know that I am, and was a Prince "furniſhed with ſtrength of men and abliments of "warre; and what marvell is it if all bee loſt, ſeeing "experience teacheth, that the events of warre are "variable, and the ſucceſſe of policies guided by un"certaine fates: As it is with me, who thought that "the deepe waters, like a wall incloſing our land, and "it ſo ſituated by heavenly providence, as in an ano"ther world, might have beene a ſufficient priviledge "and defence for us againſt forraine invaſions: but "I now perceive that the deſire of ſoveraignty admits "no limitation; and if you Romans muſt command "all, then all muſt obey. For mine owne part, while "I was able I made reſiſtance, and unwilling I was to "ſubmit my necke to a ſervile yoke, ſo farre the law "of Nature alloweth every man, that he may defend "himſelfe being aſſailed, and to withſtand force, by "force. Had I at firſt yeelded, thy glory and my ruine had not beene ſo renowned. Fortune hath now "done her worſt: wee have nothing left us but our "lives, which if thou take from us, our miſeries end: "and if thou ſpare us, we are but the objects of thy "Clemency.

(16) Cæſar wondering to ſee ſuch reſolutions and ſo free a minde in a Captive eſtate, pardoned Caractacus, his wife and brethren, who being unbound, did their reverence to Agrippina the Empreſſe, that ſate aloft on a Throne Royall. This conqueſt and Triumph umph over Caractacus, miniſtred matter of diſcourſe and admiration thoroughout all Rome, and the Lords of the Senate held it no leſſe honourable, then that of P. Scipio, who triumphed over Syphax the Numidian King, or that of Perſes, whom Paulus Aemilius vanquiſhed, or then any other King that had beene taken in warre, or exhibited to the view of the people. Then were alſo publike Triumphall honours decreed for Oſtorius; whoſe fortunes untill then had beene very proſperous, but now began to be doubtfull, or rather to decline, either becauſe Caractacus (the foile of his glory) was removed, and thereupon (as though all had beene ſubdued) a more careleſſe ſervice entertained, or elſe the courage of the Britaines was more inflamed to revenge, through the fervent compaſſion of the fall of ſo mighty a King.

Tacit. Annal. lib. 12. cap. 8.

Oſtorius and his fortunes decline.

The Britaines take heart againe.

(17) For immediately they invironed the Campe-maſter, and the Legionary Cohorts, which were left to build fortreſſes in the Countrey of the Silures, whom with eight Centurions, and the forwardeſt Souldiers, they ſlew, and had put all the reſt to the ſword, if reſcue had not ſpeedily come from the villages and forts adjoyning. The Forragers alſo and troope of horſe that were ſent to aide them, they put to flight. Theſe affronts touched Oſtorius to the quicke, and left their aids ſhould grow to a greater head, he ſent forth certaine light-harneſſed companies, which with the Legionary Souldiers, undertooke the battle, and with ſmall oddes was it continued till the night came, and parted them: divers other skirmiſhes afterwards the Britaines made, though for the moſt part in woods and mariſhes, whence taking their advantage in ſallying forth, they may times prevailed, ſometimes by ſtrength, ſometime by meere courage, and ſometimes by chance; neither were they always commanded by their Captaines, but many times fought voluntary and without preſſe.

Their victory.

(18) The principall motive that induced the reſt to take Armes, was the example of the Silures, who were moſt reſolutely bent, as being exaſperated by certaine ſpeeches that the Roman Emperour himſelfe had uſed, which was, that the name of the Sugambri was deſtroyed, and the people tranſported into Gallia, ſo the memorie of Silures ſhould utterly bee extinguiſhed: And in this heate, as men deſperate (whoſe deſtinies were read & lots caſt already) they intercepted the ſcattered troopes of the Romans that uncircumſpectly waſted and ſpoiled the Country, taking of them many priſoners, and recovering rich booties, which they ſent and diſtributed amongſt their neighbours; whereby many other were drawn to revolt: Theſe proceedings fare ſo neere Oſtorius his heart, who with long cares and travels had wearied his ſpirits, ſpent the ſtrength of his body, and thereunto had now added the diſcontentment of his minde, that in theſe vexations hee gave up the Ghoſt, the Silures rejoycing that ſo worthy and victorious a Captaine was fallen in their warres.

Cæſars threates make the Britains more reſolute.

Oſtorius dieth.

(19) But Claudius Cæſar, left the Province ſhould make head, preſently ſent Aulus Didius for his Lieutenant into Britaine; where notwithſtanding all his haſte he found all out of frame. For Manlius Valens with his Legion had encountred the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe, yet not ſo bad as the Ilanders gave foorth, thinking thereby to terrifie their new eſtabliſhed Governour: which report himſelfe alſo in policy was contented to augment; Thereby to purchaſe more praiſe in appeaſing ſo dangerous ſtirres; or if he could not, to retaine his own credit without his valours impeachment. Theſe reſiſters had made many inroades into the ſubdued Countries; againſt whom upon his firſt arrivall, Didius entred the field, and for a while kept them in awe.

Tacit. Annal. lib. 12. cap. 8. Manlius Valens encountred the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe.

Didius for a whole yeer, eeth them in awe.

(20) But Venutius a very expert man in Militarie affaires (truſty to the Romans, and defended by their power ſo long as the mariage betwixt him & Cartiſmandua continued) began a new rebellion: for Cartiſmandua (in ſpeciall favour with the Romans for the delivery of Caractacus) abounding in wealth, peace, and pleaſures (which commonly are the Nurſes of licentious living) fell in love (as before was touched) with Vellocatus her husbands ſervant, and harneſſe-bearer, and forgetting her owne honour, preferred him before Venutius, and laboured to make him King. The good-will of the Countrey notwithſtanding went generally upon the lawfull husband: who being deepely touched with this open injurie, raiſed a power againſt her and her Paramour. At the firſt this quarrell was onely betwixt them, untill that Cartiſmandua by policie had taken her husbands brother, and ſome of his neereſt kindred, priſoners. Whereupon the next Inhabitants fearing her purpoſes, and diſdaining to be brought under the yoake of a Woman ſo defamed, declared themſelves for Venutius, and with a choice bond of youthfull Soldiers invaded her Territories: whereof Didius having intelligence, ſent certain Cohorts to ſecond her and encounter them. In which conflict, the Romans for Cartiſmandua did prevaile; yet the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warres ſtill unto them.

Tacit. hiſt lib. 3. cap. 9.

(21) For the Silures were not altogether quieted, and a Legion commanded by Ceſius Naſica, fought luckily againſt the Britaines. In all which ſtirres Didius in perſon was abſent, as being ſtricken in yeares, and having received many honours, held it ſufficient to execute his charge by the aſſiſtance of others. The State of Britain thus ſtanding, let us ſo leave it during this Emperors raigne, which now began to draw towards his laſt period, by the working of Agrippina his wife, and by her upon this occaſion.

Tacit. Annal. 12. 8.

(22) It chanced, Claudius in his Wine, to caſt forth a word of great ſuſpicion, in ſaying: *That it was fatall unto him firſt to beare the lewdneſſe of his * wives; and then to puniſh them.* She knowing her ſelfe guilty in diſinheriting of Britanicus, who was Claudius his owne ſonne, for the adoption of Nero, who was hers, beſides other inſolencies wherewith ſhee might bee taxed, ſought therefore to cleare her owne way by taking him out of the way: and with Locuſta a woman skilfull in poiſoning, and Zenophon a Phyſitian, as large of conſcience, conferred for the manner of his death: who, in fine, concluded that poyſon was the ſureſt and the leaſt in ſuſpect, or at leaſt wiſe the moſt difficult to be proved againſt her.

* Meſſalina was his firſt wife, a woman of inſatiable lechery, who was put to death.

(23) This then reſolved, they temper poiſon in a Muſhrom, whereof he greedily did eate, and ſhortly after ended his life the 13 day of Octobar, when hee had raigned 13 yeares, 8 moneths, and 20 dayes, the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation 56, and of his owne age, 64. He was of ſtature tall, and of a pleaſing countenance, full of Majeſtie and comely gray haires, his Head continually ſhaking, ſomewhat ſtammering in his ſpeech, very learned, but therwithall very forgetfull, and altogether ruled by his wives, and domeſticall ſervants, the two ordinary banes of moſt men who are advanced to any eminent place of government and command.

(24) This Emperour (ſaith Seneca) might make his boaſt that he was the firſt Conquerour of the Britaines, for Iulius Ceſar did but ſhew their Iland unto the Romans, whereas Claudius made their neckes yeeld to the chaines of their captivities. And Aegiſippus ſaith thus of Claudius, His witneſſe is Britain, which lived without the world, but now by him reduced under the Romans Empire, and thoſe whom the former ages knew not, neither themſelves any ſervitude, are now by him both made knowen, and ſervants to the Romans. And againe: As great a matter it was to paſſe thoſe Seas, as to have triumphed over thoſe Britains, wherein (ſaith he) even the elements have done homage unto Claudius. In joy whereof, and reverence to the Gods, in his triumph he mounted the ſtaires of the Capitoll, upon his aged knees, being ſupported and lifted up by his ſons in Law on either ſide, the glory of this Ilands conqueſt had ſo poſſeſſed this old Emperours minde.

NERO.

NERO.

Chapter VII.

THis violent and unexpected death of Claudius, gave breath and life unto Neroes further hopes: for whileſt the Conſuls were aſſembled to make ſupplications for their Prince, (not knowing him already dead) Nero ſuddenly ſet open the Palace gates, and accompanied with ſhouts and acclamations, entred the Cohorts that kept the watch, where of them and the reſt of the ſouldiers hee was ſaluted Emperour, the Senate as men affrighted with amazement, not once contradicting the ſame.

Nero aſſumeth the Empire.

(2) Hee was the ſonne of Domitius Nero, and of Iulia Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, brother to Claudius the precedent Emperor, vitious by nature, as ſprung of thoſe parents from whom (as his owne father Domitius ſaid) no goodneſſe could proceed: and the ſame vile diſpoſition was perfected and augmented by his owne affected ſtudy, and purſuit of all poſſible leudneſſe, as one who could well fit his wanton and laſcivious humours to the unripeneſſe of his yeares, being not paſſing ſeventeene when he aſſumed the Empire. All Religion hee had in contempt, and all lawes violated, letting looſe the reine to all unnaturall luſts, and licentiouſneſſe of life.

(3) For bloud and libidinouſneſſe hee was held a moſt unſatiate fury, and amongſt men a very monſter of Nature. His father he poyſoned: upon his mother he committed both inceſt and murder; upon males, pollutions againſt Nature: deflowred the Veſtals (a matter ſacrilegious and impious) ſlew his brother Germanicus, and his ſiſter Antonia, his wives, Poppea and Octavia, his aunt Domitia, his ſonne in law Ruſinus, and his renowned Tutor Seneca; With ſuch ſavage ſlaughter of the Roman Nobility, that Tacitus (their beſt Remembrancer) was wearied to record their names, whileſt with a ſervile patience (as he termeth it) they died honourably.

Tacit. Annal. 16 cap. 3.

(4) The City Rome hee ſet on fire, charging the Chriſtians with the fact, and inflicted ſuch torments and death upon them, that they were pitied of their enemies, and his owne cruelties thereby made more notorious. Whoſe Religion, through Suetonius tearmed new, and a wicked ſuperſtition: and Tacitus (as it were in contempt) nameth the Author thereof to be Chriſt, who in Tiberius raigne (as he with the Evangeliſts agree) was put to death under Pontius Pilate, Procurator of Iudea, where that religion firſt began; yet by the ſaid author it is confeſſed, that theſe men were innocent of the fact, and their doctrine to burſt forth further into many other parts, inſomuch that Rome it ſelfe did affect the ſame. Yea, and in Neroes Court alſo ſome embraced that faith, as by the words of the Apoſtle is manifeſt, who from the Saints in Cæſars houſe ſent ſalutations to the Brethren, Phil. 4. 22.

(5) And laſtly, to fill up the meaſure of his bloudy cruelty, he crucified Peter upon the Croſſe, and beheaded Paul with the ſword, two principall Apoſtles of Ieſus Chriſt, and worthy inſtruments of the worlds ſalvation; and forgetting the Majeſtie of his eſtate, fell into the ſinke of contempt and all ſinnes, giving his minde leave to digeſt all uncleanneſſe, and his bodie over to worke any baſe exerciſes, attending nothing beſides his Harpes and Harlots, whereby a careleſſe (but yet a cruell) goverment was intertained, and the Senate faſhioning themſelves to feed his looſe humours, ſtrove each to outſtrip other in their baſe flatteries.

(6) In this ſtate the Provinces ſubjections began to ſtand doubtfull, and the greateſſe of the Empire to over-charge the foundation; for the Parthians under Vologeſes gave Patus the Roman a great overthrow, and that in ſuch wiſe, that thoſe which eſcaped were tearmed the unfortunate army. And in Britaine their affaires proceeded with no good ſucceſſe; for aged Didius could do no more then keepe that which hee had already gotten: and Verannius his ſucceſſor, only with ſmall inroads aſſailing the Silures, was in his firſt yeere cut off by death, inſomuch that Nero having neither wil, motion, nor hope to propagate and enlarge the Empire, minded once to have with-drawn the Roman forces out of Britaine, had it not been for very ſhame.

(7) But Paulinus Suetonius attaining the government of that Province, in skill for ſervice, and opinion of people comparable to any, ſought to match his concurrent Corbulo, who with daily victories proſpered in Armenia, himſelfe wanting neither courage nor diſcretion to atchieve the like, only matter and occaſion the Iland affoorded none. Therefore determining an expedition into further parts, hee made preparation to invade the Ile of Mona, now Angleſey, ſeparated from the Continent by the River Menai, and fronted upon the midſt of Ireland, both ſtrong with inhabitants, and a receptacle of Fugitives.

But the very Spring or Head, from whence the cauſe of this ſudden Rebellion iſſued, was the preſent abuſe offered to * Boduo, Queene of the Iceanians, late wife to Praſutagus, deceaſed upon the inſuing occaſion.

Tacitus vit Agricolæ cap. 190.

(11) Whereupon the Iceanians began ſeriouſly to diſcourſe of their preſent miſeries and bondage, made ſubject not onely to a Lieutenant that ſucked their bloud, but likewiſe to a Procurator, that fought their ſubſtance, while with a ſervile feare they yeelded to pleaſe the meaneſt Souldier; As though the Heavens had framed them onely for ſervitude, and the Earth appointed to beare their injuries unrevenged, whereas contrariwiſe, they faw both heaven & earth flexible to their deliverance: For (whether by policy or chance) the Image of victory at Camulodunum fell downe reverſed without any apparant cauſe knowne: the women diſtempered with furie, ranne in the ſtreets, ſinging, and prophecying deſtructions: ſtrange noiſes were heard in the Court, and howlings in the Theater, and ſtrange apparitions and Edifices ſeene in the River Thamiſis: the Ocean it ſelfe betweene Gallia and them ſeemed all bloody, and the prints of dead bodies left in the ſands at the Ebbe. Againe, weighing the preſent eſtate, they faw Suetonius abſent, and buſied to enlarge the Confines, the midſt but ſlenderly guarded, and by thoſe who were readier for private gain, then diligent to diſcharge the offices of warre. The examples of other Provinces alſo whetted the edge of their encouragements: for Germany (they ſaw) had well ſhaken off the yoke of ſubiection: The Parthians had revolted, and Armenia held play with Corbulo, as famous as Paulinus: Their cauſe was as juſt, their land as well defenced, their anceſtors as valiant in reſiſting the firſt King-leader Ceſar's: and themſelves better experienced of their adverſaries powers, and their owne abilliments. So now having attained the hardeſt point, which was their aſſembled conſultations (a matter of as great danger to be taken with, as in acting their intendments) in fine this was reſolved, that libertie was to be preferred, though bought with their lives; and bondage to be avoided, if not otherwiſe, then by their deaths.

(12) Theſe their often and noted aſſemblies brought ſuſpitions of ſome deſignements, and the prodigies daily happening, as they were motives of encouragements unto the Britaines: So were they ominous ſignes to the Romans, of either part, framed in their owne imaginations, and conſtrued according to their hoped or feared events.

(13) The Confederates in this buſineſſe were not to ſeeke their Leader: their Queenes diſhonours ſo aparantly knowne, (and for matter of government they made no difference of Sexe) her birth extracted from their Royall blood, her hearts affection approved to her Countrie, her indignities received of the proud oppreſſors, and her haughty ſpirit threatning revenge, aſſured them of her uttermoſt endevors: which accordingly ſhe effected to her dying day, and to her never dying fame.

This commotion in Britaine by Suetonius Tranquillus is accounted one of the moſt infortunate loſſes to the Empire, happening under Nero, and the more ignominious to the Romans (as Dion obſerveth) in that it was performed under the Command of a woman, neither experienced in the feats of warre, nor uſing the victory according to the Law of Armes: for not any priſoner taken, in regard of ranſome was ſaved, nor intercourſe of exchange admitted, but kill, hang, burne, and crucifie, as though the meaſure of their revenge could never be ſufficiently heaped, or the wrath of their Gods ſatisfied with the bloud of their Enemies.

first onset had spent all their darts which with good successe they had bestowed: but then failing and wearied in their first comming on too hotly, the Romanes sallied out upon the plaine, the Auxiliaries and Horsemen with long launces making their way, and beating downe all that stood before them. The Britaines unable to endure or withstand such fierce assaults, were forced to give backe, and at length sought to save themselves by flight, but were hindred by their owne Waggons placed in the rere-ward of the Army, which gave the more impediment to their retrait, in that they were then full of their women who in confidence of the victory came thither to behold the fight, which were among the rest all slaine, without regard of sexe or mercie. This day was famous and comparable in renowne for victory to any other of former times, for therein were slaine of the Britaines to the number of eightie thousand men: And the Land brought under an unrecoverable subjection.

(21) Boduo seeing the overthrow of her Army, was notwithstanding unvanquished in her owne Noble spirit; and scorning to be a spectacle in their Triumphs or a vassall to their willes, after the example of Cleopatra, shee made an end of her miseries and life, by poyson. And Ponius Posthumus, Campe-master of the second Legion, seeing the good successe of the fourteenth and twentieth: for that disobaying the Generall (contrary to the discipline of warre) he had defrauded himselfe and followers of their parts of glory in that service, for very griefe slew himselfe: and for their good service there performed, Nero greatly honoured the eleventh, thirteenth and fourteenth Legions, reposing a most sure trust in their valour and fidelitie, ever afterward.

(22) Suetonius animated with this victory, gathered his Army, and encamped againe; purposing to end the residue of the War, if any resisters should remaine: And at that present were sent him out of Germany two thousand Legionary Souldiers, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, & a thousand Horse, whereby his strength was augmented, and the ninth Legion which had beene much weakened by the rashnesse of Petilius, fully supplied: So that bootelesse it was for the poore Britaines to make any further resistance, and such as did, or stood doubtfully affected, were daily put to the sword. But nothing distressed them so much, as did famine, and want of Corne, being a people in all ages more given to warre then Good husbandry, and rather relying upon the provisions of others, than by the plough to provide for themselves; fierce of nature, and slowly lending eare to peace, or their minde to such Arts as either nourish, or are nourished by peace.

(23) In these stirres Iulius Classicianus, sent from Nero to succeed Catus in his office of receipts, an enemie, and at variance with Suetonius, the more to cloud his renowne, gave it forth for certaine, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, who without either hostile rancour, or pride of a conquerour, would intreat the yeelders with all Clemencie: And likewise by letters sent to Rome, hee signified that no end of warre was to be expected, so long as Suetonius remained Generall; attributing every adverse lucke to his intollerable pride, and every prosperous successe onely to the good fortunes of Cæsar and State of Rome. These Great mens dissensions awaked Nero, fearing left the Britaines, thereby would be more forward to advantage, with whom experience had shewed there was no dallying; and his former losses among them being againe recovered, he thought himselfe discharged and quit from all fatall Calamities, as Tranquillus doth affirme. Therefore he sent Polycletus, one of his freed servitors, with Commission to examine the differences, and to interpose his authoritie to worke a reconciliation; at whose greatnesse it was also thought that the Britaines would have quaked, and come in under feete. Which thing fell out otherwise: for howsoever the Captaine and Souldiers regarded him for his place, unto whom hee shewed himselfe both arrogant and terrible, yet the Britaines made him but their laughing stocke, as being themselves borne free, and knew not what the power of freed-men was; much admired that such Commanders and Armies which had atchieved so great exploits, could be brought to obay, and yeeld account of their actions to so base a bondslave, as they termed him.

(24) But Suetonius growne great by his fortunes in these warres, and as it should seeme both suspected and feared of Nero, was by him commanded (the warres yet continuing) to deliver up his Army to Petronius Turpilianus, who had lately given over his Consulship in Rome, a man of a softer, and more intreatable condition; and as a stranger to the faults before committed was the readier to forgive; and having composed the former troubles, dares not any further, neither egging nor provoking the Enemy, but gave himselfe to a quiet, or rather idle life, which he thought might passe under the title of an honourable peace. In which estate hee gave up his charge to Trebellius Maximus, and was after slaine by Galba, nothing objected against him, but his faithfulnesse to Nero, in that hee would not betray him, as the rest had done. For Nero now growne odious to God and Man, Conspiracies were continually attempted, though not in act effected, untill that Iulius Vindex Lieutenant of Gallia opposed his proceedings, being the first stirrer, and rowling stone that (as Tacitus tearmes it) tumbled Nero out of his Seate.

(25) For having proclaimed Galba Emperour, an old and weake man, at that time Governor of Arragon; neither privie to the conspiracie, nor assenting to the title, he set up daily many bitter and biting Edicts against Nero, whereby he was rowsed from his lascivious rest, and began to feare the fatall end, whereunto his impious life and bloody reigne had now lastly brought him; who destitute of all power of resistance, did now set his whole hope and refuge, upon that meanes, to which the compasse of his time had ever pointed; for relying onely upon his skill in Musicke, he intended his flight into Aegypt, there to teach the instructions of that Art: into such sudden basenesse was his minde dejected, that formerly had lashed out beyond all measure in luxury, pride, and prodigalitie. Vnto this conspiracie joyned Virginius Rufus Lieutenant of high Germany, with Nymphidius, Sabinus, and Sophinius Tigellinus, Captaine of the Guard, who after Vindex his death, (which happened upon an accident even in his entrance to Armes) maintained the election of Galba: and the Senate as forward to Neroes destruction, proclaimed him Enemy to the State, and pronounced his punishment more majorum, sending out each way to apprehend him alive.

So prodigall in apparell, that he never wore one Garment twice, and so sumptuous in buildings, as is incredible. Chapter VIII.

With the death of this Tyrant, ended the progeny of the Cæsars, and the Emperours succeeding were afterwards elected, either for the opinion of their owne worths, or else, (and that oftner) by the faction and voyce of the Souldiers, whose violence the Senate ever feared to contradict, and whose Colonies in every Province, fought to raise their owne Generall to that high estate. In which time of Combustion, though little be recorded of the British affaires, yet because the Monarchy of this Iland was then and long after invested in the Imperiall dignitie, we may not omit to speake somewhat of the ensuing Emperours, as the chiefe Governors of this kingdome. Vpon Neroes declining, divers there were (as Vindex and Virginius, Nymphidius and Sophinius) set up against him, but Galba for his reputed integritie got the Garland from them all: who little dreaming of the Imperiall Diademe, fortune set it upon his head before his hand had roucht the same: for Vindex in Gallia having proclaimed him Emperour, and himselfe in Arragon not free from Neroes hatred, he fought rather to hazard his life with the glory of a Crowne, then depend upon his mercy, who had sent secretely the sentence of his death. And therefore mounting the Tribunall, the more to impresse a fresh remembrance of former cruelties, he placed before his throne, the Images of certaine Nobles executed by Nero, with some personages sent for out of exile, whose presence might provoke a deeper edge of hatred; and his Army about him ready for mutation, these, or the like words hee spake.

The manner of chosing the succeeding Emperours.

"(2) My fellow Souldiers and friends, wee at this "time are assembled, to bestow that upon others, "which we our selves have finally enjoyed, I meane, "liberty from bondage, and freedome from feares of "a Tyrant. The life that I have hitherto ledde, will "sufficiently discharge mee from any aspiring con"ceit, and my owne Conscience doth witnesse that "I speake not upon malice or private respects: It "grieveth me to say, but it bootes not to hide, that, "which every man seeth. Hath ever Bond-man un"der a cruell master passed a yeare of harder service, "then we have done fourescore under Nero? what "kind of exaction hath he not proved, to supply with "extortion, that which with shame hee hath spent? "what kinde of cruelty hath he not practised? If we "would conceale or seeke to suppresse it, these dumb "stones would declare them: For behold, he poy"soned his Father and brother, abused and slew his "owne mother, murdered his wife, his Tutor, and "what else soever valiant or vertuous in Senate, in Ci"tie, in Province, without any difference of sexe or "Age. I need not to speake of the sorrowfull sighes, "and bitter teares of so many yong Gentlemen bereft "of their fathers, so many wives robbed of their hus"bands, so many great men deprived of their Coun"try, all which cry vengeance upon such a Prince: A "Prince? nay an Incendiary, a Singer, a Fidler, a "Stage-player, a Cart-driver, a Cryer, no Prince, nay "no man, that hath a man to his husband, and a man "to his wife, but a monster of mankinde: And in truth "a subject, upon whom, vice hath made her full ex"perience, and raised her triumphs from the base of "Cæsars throne. Against whom, what Vindex in France "hath already intended, I am sure you doe know, and "I, for my part, am most sorry to heare. The whole "course of my former life hath been hitherto remo"ved from ambition in Court, or from aiming too "high abroad, and this little that remaines of my "daies, I could heartily wish were to be spent in more "ease: But sith I know not by what my mis-fortune, "some have imposed upon me a part which I never "meant to sustaine, and least of all at this age, I will "not refuse, if you will also approve it, to sacrifice "this old carcase of mine for the wealth of my coun"try, not as Emperor or Augustus (which sacred names "I adore afarre off, not daring to approach them) but "as ——— And no further heard, was with great "acclamations saluted Emperour.

Nero described.

Nero solemnely married one of his youths called Sporphorus, and kept him as his wife: to likenesse did he with Sporus, which he endevoured to transforme into a woman.

(3) But such is the height of glory, which is raised by the blasts of the multitude, that it fals againe as the bubble burst in the swelling, which leaves neither circle nor signe of his former pride. And so is the state of Galba with one breath applauded, and placed upon the Imperiall Throne; and that scarce cold, ere they dislike of their owne hasty election: for newes being brought that the State stood firme for Nero, and for certaine that Vindex was slaine, even in his first enterprise of revolt; that Virginius was fided by his German Legions, and his name described in their banners; and that Nymphidius was the man whose deserts could not be sufficiently honoured with lesse recompence then the princely Diademe: These distractions so much overswayed his aged and passionate heart, that he retired to Clunia in great dejection, repenting himselfe of that which he had done, and wished againe his private estate.

Glory like a Bubble.

(4) But the death of Nero commonly divulged, and Virginius his refusals of the Imperiall Title, gave strength and life to his former election, now further ratified by the full resolutions of the Army: who the more to seeme both strong and valorous, though indeed a weake, fickly, and filly old man, Souldier-like in his coat of Armes shewed himselfe, and in that array passed the vast mountaine for Rome. With whose entrance, entred the dislike of his person, as one unfit to support the state of others, that by age & imbecillity was not able to sustaine his owne; and the imperfections of his government carried every way farre under expectation, daily added their further dislikes; which assaying himself: to redresse, hee soone shooke the foundation of his own fabrick: for in a blunt and short short Oration by him made unto the Senate and souldiers, he declared Piso Licinianus his Cæsar: joyning him in present power with himselfe, and after his decease, his successor in the Empire.

(5) Whereat howsoever others stood affected, yet Marcus * Salvius Otho (one, who for commerce in lewdnesse was very deare to Nero, and whose hope depended upon the common disturbance, for that his excesse in riot had now brought him to the brink of beggery) much envied thereat; the rather because himselfe had entertained a hope that Galba would have adopted him, but therein deceived, as his concurrent set his own aspiring mind for the Crown. And even now this time best fitted his attempts, being the wane of Galbaes authority, and before the full of Pisoes power; his Astrologers and Star-gazers forwarding him with their vaine predictions; a kinde of people ever to Princes unfaithfull, to hopers deceitfull, and in a commonwealth always forbidden, yet always retained. And Otho prevailing with the Pretorian souldiers, by great gifts, and faire promises, practised, and wrought (within eight daies following) Galbaes death: which his treason he so cunningly carried, that still hee accompanied the Emperour with great observances, as his private, and especiall friend. But the conspiracy ripened ready for the blanche, Otho stole secretely from the Palace, unto the Pretorian Cohorts, purposely so appointed: where no sooner come and seene, but they saluted him Emperour, and upon their shoulders bare him towards their Campe.

Tacit. hist. 1. * Silvius. Salvius Otho conspireth Galbaes death.

Astrologers and Starre-gazers.

The rumour arising of this sudden revolt, sore affrighted Galba, then ready to doe sacrifice unto his gods, and so distracted his followers, that there were as many advices, as there were men, and messengers posting from Campe unto Court, brought as diverse relations, as their owne suspicions conceived: in which distraction, the weake and wavering old man was so wrapped, that besides throngings from place to place, nothing was effected, till lastly abandoned by his owne followers, a troupe of horsemen sent from the Campe, tumultuously slew him, and presented his head upon the point of a Lance to Otho. With him died Piso his elected Cæsar, whom Sulpitius Florus, one of the British Cohorts slew, and Titus Iunius a Consull, with others, that had beene deare unto Galba, whileſt he was Emperour.

(6) He was of a good ſtature; his head bald, his eyes gray, and his noſe hooked, his hands and feet crooked by reaſon of the gout, and a bunch of fleſh or wen upon his right ſide. A great feeder and Sodomite hee was, fevere in juſtice, and over-ruled by his ſervants. Hee died aged ſeventy three yeares having out-lived five Princes. In proſperity happier under the Empire of others, then in his owne; for hee ſate onely ſeven moneths, and them with ſmall content. THE FIRST PLANTING OF RELIGION IN BRITAINE.

Chapter IX.

HIs ſhort time of Galbaes government, with the conſpiracies againſt his Predeceſſor, admitteth ſmall remembrances of our Britiſh affaires: which Province (ſaith Tacitus) among all other ſtirres againſt both Nero and Galba, held amity, and ſtood in quiet; whether it was the farre diſtance of place, ſevered by Sea from the ſeditions of the Revolters; or that by continuall ſervice againſt the Enemie, the malice of their humours were ſpent, it is uncertaine. Therefore a while to digreſſe from the Succeſſion of our Britiſh Monarkes, and to fill up the emptineſſe of thoſe Times, with matters incident to our ſelves, let it not ſeeme either tedious or ſuperfluous, to ſpeake of the planting of his Kingdome in this Iland, whoſe Rule in ſhort time extended to the Ends of the Earth; and whoſe Ambaſſadours (as ſome have written) about the midſt of Neroes Raigne, and in the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation, ſixty three, approached for the Inhabitants ſalvation, Arviragus then ſwaying the Scepter of this Kingdome.

Chriſtianity ſuppoſed to bee brought into Britaine in Neroes time. Ex Antiq. Manuſcripto. Percalibus Lexaureſis, Tom. 2. lib. 1. cap. 4. Willelm. of Malmesbury.

(2) At which time (ſay they) were ſent certaine Diſciples out of France into Britaine by Philip the Apoſtle, whereof Ioſeph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Chriſt, was chiefe; who firſt laid the foundation of our faith in the Weſt parts of this Iland, at the place then called Avalon, (afterwards Inis Witrin, now Glaſtenburie) where he with twelve Diſciples his Aſſiſtants preached the Goſpel of life unto the Ilanders, and there left their bodies to remaine for a joyfull Reſurrection. This doth Gildas affirme, and Malmsbury in his Booke of the Antiquity of Glaſtenburie, written to Henry de Bloys, brother to King Stephen, and Abbot of the ſame place, reports, and is confented unto (for the matter, though all agree not touching the time) by the learned Antiquaries of later times, grounded on the Teſtimonies of the beſt approved ancient Writers: who account the moſt happy influence of Chriſtianity, to have beene by thoſe glorious conduits convaied into the remote parts of the world: that ſo (according to the promiſe of God by Eſaiah) The Iles afarre off which had not heard of his fame, ſhould be converted, and have his glory to them declared among the Gentiles.

(3) And if the credit of Dorotheus Biſhop of Tyre, (who lived to ſee the apoſtacie of Iulian) weigh any thing with us; in his tract of the Lives and Deaths of the Prophets, Apoſtles, and Diſciples, he bringeth Simon Zelotes (an Apoſtle of Ieſus Chriſt) to preach the word, and to ſuffer Martyrdome upon the Croſſe here in Britaine: with whom Nicephorus, and after him John Capgrave (in his Catalogue of Engliſh Saints) agree, ſaying, that the ſame Simon ſpread the Goſpell to the Weſt Ocean, and brought the word of life into the Iles of Britaine: and, in the converſion of Countries wrought by the Apoſtles, the ſame Nicephorus, with Egypt and Lybia aſſigneth Britaine alſo to be one. And the foreſaid Dorotheus, as alſo Mirmamus, nameth Ariſtobulus one of the ſeventy Diſciples (the ſame whom S. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans among others ſaluteth) to have taught the doctrine of Salvation, and to have executed the office of a Biſhop heere in Britaine.

(5) But yet there are others, who upon a very good ground, from the words of Gildas (the moſt ancient of our Britiſh Hiſtorians) will have the Sunne of the Goſpel long before to have riſen in this our Weſt; and this Iland of Britaine to have enjoyed the very morning of his Aſcent, the brightneſſe wherof piercing thorow the miſtie clouds of errour, ſhined heere in Britaine even in the daies of Tiberius, towards whoſe end Chriſt ſuffered his death. Which aſſertion the ſaid Gildas doth not deliver coldly or doubtingly, but with great confidence, and relying upon good grounds, as it appeareth when he ſaith, Scimus, &c. We know for certainty, that this was in the latter time of Tiberius. Which was immediately after our bleſſed Saviours Paſſion.

Gildas de Excidio Britt.

To which uncontroulable teſtimonie ſome others have added (though not perhaps on ſo undoubted warrant) that S. Peter the Apoſtle preached the word of life in this Iland, as to other Gentiles he did, for whom God had choſen him, that from his mouth they might heare the Goſpell and beleeve, (as himſelfe alledgeth) and that hee heere founded Churches and ordained Prieſts and Deacons, which is reported by Simon Metaphraſtes out of the Greeke Antiquities, and Guilielmus Eiſingrenius in the firſt of his Centurie, who ſaith that Peter was here in Neroes time: whereas Baronius thinketh it was in the reigne of Claudius, when the Iewes were baniſhed Rome, and that therefore Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans mentioneth him not. Indeed Baronius and ſome others plead very hotly for S. Peters preaching heere; but I ſee not well how it can ſtand either with Euſebius his account, which keeps him ſo long at Rome after he was Biſhop there, or with Onuphrius, who denieth that he went weſt-ward (being expulſed by Claudius) but to Ieruſalem, and thence to Antioch, where he lived till the death of Claudius: whence it muſt follow, that if Peter were heere at all, it was before euer he went to Rome, and that the Goſpel was preached heere before it was in Rome, if Peter were the firſt (as ſome hold) that preached thereboth which may be the more probable, if we conſider the huge multitudes of Chriſtians (fifteene thouſand, ſaith Baronius) which diſperſed themſelves into all parts of the world upon the martyring of S. Steven at Ieruſalem, (which was preſently upon the death of Chriſt) and that Joſeph of Arimathea was one of that number, Baronius doth confeſſe. I am here contented to ſtep over that Monkiſh tale reported by Aluredus Rivallenſis (the writer of King Edward the Confeſſors life) that a holy man (forſooth) ſtudious and carefull for a Governour to ſucceed, was in his ſleepe told by S. Peter, that the kingdome of England was his, wherein himſelfe had firſt preached, and would alſo provide him Succeſſors. For ſeeing it was a dreame, for a dreame we leave it; and Peter among the other Elders to attend His Throne, that now ſitteth in glorious Maieſtie, and who in this life minded no ſuch earthly preheminence, no not to divide betwixt brethren, though the Kingdome and rule of all things was his alone.

(6) Certes Peter was principally the Apoſtle of the Circumciſion, and therefore more likely to have ſpent his endevours on them: but for Paul (the Doctor of the Gentiles) his arrivall heere may ſeeme more warrantable, who doubtleſſe (after his firſt releaſement from Rome) confirmed the doctrine of Chriſt to theſe weſterne parts of the world, and among them, as may appeare, to this Iland of Britaine, as both Sophronius Patriarke of Ieruſalem, and Theodoret an ancient Doctor of the Church, doe affirme and approve, ſaying that Fiſhers, Publitans, and the Tent-Maker (meaning S. Paul) which brought the Evangelicall light unto all Nations, revealed the ſame unto the Britaines. That Paul came into Illyricum, Gallia, and Spaine, and filled all thoſe parts with his doctrine, both Euſebius, Dorotheus, and Epiphanius doe teſtifie: and of this generall Amballage the Apoſtle himſelfe ſaith, that the ſound of the Goſpel went thorow the earth, and was heard unto the ends of the world: which his ſayings cannot more fitly bee applied to any other Nation then unto us of Britaine, whoſe land by the Almightie is ſo placed in the terreſtriall globe, that thereby it is termed of the ancient, The Ends of the Earth, and deemed to be ſituated in another world, for ſo in an Oration that Agrippa made to the Iewes, and Agricola to his Romans, it is called: which made Solinus write that the coaſt of France had beene the End of the earth, had it not beene for Britaine, which was as another world. And in Dion we reade, that the old Souldiers of Gallia whom Claudius commanded for Britaine, complained that they muſt beeinforced to make warre out of the world. And of this Land and latter Apoſtle (if credit may be given to a Poet) Venantius Fortunatus thus recordeth:

(7) Thus for Paul: well knowne in Rome by his long impriſonments, and (at that time) in reverend regard for his doctrine with many there: among whom alſo there were ſome Britaines that embraced the faith, whereof Claudia Rufina (remembred by Martial another Poet) was one, whom he thus extols:

Martial. lib. 2. Epig. 14.

Claudia cæruleis cùm ſit Rufina Britannis
Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus formæ? Romanam credere matres

How hath dame Claudia, borne of Britains blew,

This Claudia is by the learned commended to have beene moſt skilfull in the Greeke and Latine tongues; of whom heare them (not me) ſpeake. At the commandement of the Tyrant Nero (ſay they from Tacitus) many Noble Britains were brought to Rome, who there remaining their Confederates, they held it an honour to have their children named after the Nobilitie of the Romans: and from Claudius Cæſar was this Ladie Claudia named, who according to her worth was matched in marriage to Rufus a gentleman of Rome, then a Coronell, after a Senator, a man of a milde diſpoſition: naturally modeſt, a great Philoſopher in the Sect of the Stoickes, for his ſweetneſſe of behaviour called Pudens, who by his grave perſwaſions cauſed Martial (the wittie but wanton Poet) to reforme many things in his writings; and by him is commended for his humanitie, pietie, learning, and eloquence: as alſo his wife Claudia the Britaine, for her beautie, faith, fruitfulneſſe, learning, and languages. In proofe whereof, Bale hath mentioned three ſeverall Treatiſes, beſides others by her compiled both in the Greeke and Latine tongues. Dorotheus nameth Pudens to be one of the ſeventie two, and Volaterranus affirmeth them both Pauls Diſciples, from whom he ſendeth greeting to Timotheus in theſe words: Eubulus and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren salute thee. But some may object, that Martials Claudia could not be that Ladie, who living in Neroes time gave hofpitalitie unto Peter and Paul at their being in Rome; for that he could not retaine such beauty and perfection as the Poet to her doth ascribe in the reigne of Domitian, the seventh in succession from Nero, the time being too long (saith Ado, Bishop of Trevers, Vsuardus, and others) for beauty to be so freshly preserved. But howsoever these account her age then to be sixty, yet if we reckon according to Eusebius, we shall see that he sets the last of Claudius in the yeare of grace fifte five, and the first of Domitian in eighte three, betwixt which, are but twenty seven yeares; and yet Paul came not to Rome till the tenth of Nero, and in his thirteenth yeare, from the prison wrote his Epistle to Timothy, as the same Eusebius declareth: so that from hence unto Domitian, is left but fourteene yeeres, a time no whit unpossible to retaine Beautie, though twenty yeares and many moe of her age had beene formerly spent; seeing that in those times Plutarch praiseth Alcibiades to be passingly faire when he was threescore yeares of age.

The same Claudia that Paul and Martial speaketh of.

This Claudia then with Pauls spirituall Manna, is said to send likewise the choicest and chastest of the Poesies of Martial for new-yeares gifts vnto her friends in Britaine, both for to feed their Soules with the bread of life, and to instruct their minides with lessons best fitting unto civill behaviour; which thing moved the Poet himselfe with no small selfe-glory in his verse thus to write:

Claudia sends both Pudens and Rufus writings from Britaine.

And Britaine now (they say) our verses learns to sing.

Martial. lib. 7. & 10.

(8) It hath also passed with allowance among the learned Senate of our Antiquaries, that when Claudius and Nero began to banish and persecute the Christians in Rome, (whose superstitions, as Tacitus pleaseth to tearme them, from Iudea had infected the Citie it selfe) many Romans and Britaines being converted to the Faith, fled thence unto these remote parts of the earth, where they might and did more freely enjoy the liberty of their Professions, untill the search of Tyrants by the flame-light of Persecutions, had found out all secret places for the safeties and assemblies of Gods Saints: as after in the dayes of Diocletian we shall finde: And from this Sanctuarie of Salvation the sad lamenting Lady * Pomponia Gracina, the wife of Aulus Plautius (the first Lord Lieutenant of Britaine) brought that Religion, whereof she was accused and flood indicted upon life and death, which was none other, then the Christian Profession, seeing the same both by Tacitus and Suetonius, is every where termed the strange superstitions and new kinde of Sect that the Christians imbraced, and for which they were accounted unworthy to live.

(9) And much about these times (as Beatus Rhenanus in his History of Germanie, Pantoleon and others doe report) one Suetonius a Noble mans sonne in Britaine converted to the Faith by the first Planters of the Gospel in this Iland, and after his Baptisme called Beatus, was sent by the Brethren from hence unto Rome, to be better instructed, and further directed by Saint Peter himselfe; and returning thorow Switzerland, found such willingnesse and flocking of the people to heare and receive the Doctrine of Christ, that he there staied and built an Oratorie not farre from the lake Thun, and neare the Towne called Vnderfewen, where in preaching and praiers he imploied his time to the day of his death, which happened in the yeare of grace 110.

Holinshed descript. Britaine. cap. 9.

And that there were Christians in Britain at these times I make no question, though some exceptions may be taken against the Monk of Burton the reporter thereof, who saith in the 141 yeare, and raigne of Hadrian nine masters of Grantcester were baptized themselves, & preached to others the Gospel in Britain; howsoever he faileth in the Emperours name, which yeare was the second of Antoninus Pius his successor, and ascribeth to these men Schoole-degrees, altogether unknowne for nine hundred yeares after, yet these do not hinder the truth of the thing, though that Monke was none of the best Historians. It is reported also that Patrick the Irish Apostle, and Canonized Saint, long before the Raigne of King Ethelbert preached the Gospel in many places of Wales: As also that Ninianus Bernicius of the race of the British Princes converted the Picts to the Religion of Christ. Vnto these aforesaid authorities and testimonies howsoever we stand affected: yet it is certaine by Chemnitius citing Sabellicus, that the Britaines were with the first Converts: And Tertullian who lived within two hundred yeares of Christs Nativitie, sheweth no lesse: Who the more to provoke the Iewes against whom he wrote, calleth to witnesse the fruitfull increase of the Gospel of salvation, through many Countries and Nations, and among them nameth the Britaines to have received the Word of life, the power whereof (saith he) hath pierced into those parts whither the Romanes could not come. Whence Petrus Cluniacensis supposeth the Scottish men the more ancient Christians, as not being in the like subjection to the Romans, as other then were.

(10) Origen, who flourished not much above two hundred yeares after Christ, in his Homilies upon Ezechiel sheweth, that the first fruits of Gods harvest was gathered in the Iland of Britaine: who consented to the Christian faith by the doctrine of their Druides: that taught one onely God: with whom Hector Boetius agreeth, saying, that some of these Druides condemned the worship of God in Images, and allowed not the application of the Godhead unto any visible form: which might be the cause why Claudius the Emperour forbad their Religion, as favouring in these things too much of Christianitie; whom likewise he banished Rome, as some from Suetonius conjecture. Of these Druides we shewed before, that their offices were most imploied about holy things, and that their doctrine chiefly consisted in teaching the immortalitie of the soule, the motions of the heavens, the nature of things, and the power of the Gods: yea and Pastellus from others will inforce, that they prophecied likewise of a Virgins conception. These were the helps, saith Tertullian, that caused the Britaines so soone to imbrace the Doctrine of Christ, and thereupon immediatly after his death doth Gyldas fasten our conversion, where he writeth,

(11) Whereby we see the waters of life, flowing from Ierusalems Temple, into these farre set Countries and vttermost Seas, to be made both fruitfull and wholesome, according to the sayings of the Prophet, that in that day the waters of life should issue from Ierusalem, halfe of them towards the East Sea, and halfe of them towards the vttermost Sea, and shall remaine fruitfull both in Summer and Winter: and even in the infancie of Christianitie, both the Apostles themselves, and also the Proselytes their Disciples to become fishers therein for the Soules of Men, as Christ in chusing of them said they should bee; whereby his kingdome was foone enlarged unto these Ends of the Earth, and his Throne estabished among those Heathen, whom God his Father had given to be his. So fruitfull and famous was this spreading of the Gospel, that Baptista Mantuan, a Christian Poet, compares the increase thereof with that of Noah, thus alluding unto it:

The Lawes of God unto the World aright;
So Christ his Servants sent abroad to preach
The Word of life, and Gospell to each Wight:
No place lay shadowed from that glorious Light,
The farthest Ile, and Earths remotest bounds,
Embrac'd their Faith, and joy'd at their sweet sounds.

(12) To which effect also the sayings of S^t. John Chrysostome, Bishop of Constantinople doe enforce, who shewing the increase of Christianity, and the successe of the Gospell preached, sheweth the power thereof to have extended, nor onely to the Countries farre jacent in the continent, but also to the Ilands situated in the Ocean it selfe, and amongst them expressely nameth this our Britaine; whose Inhabitants (saith he) have also consented to the Word which is planted in every heart, in honour whereof they have erected their Temples and Altars. And againe: Those Britaines (saith hee) which had formerly fed upon humane flesh, making no difference betwixt the blood of man and beasts, now through the power of the Word by them embraced, have learned the law of true piety, and give themselves to a religious abstinence, and holy fasts. Of which Barbarisme S. Jerome also complained, that some of those Nations used to eate the burtockes of Boyes, and Paps of Virgins, which in their Feasts were served for the daintiest dishes. But elsewhere speaking of the Britaines conversion, he saith, that they had turned themselves from their westerne Paganisme, and now had directed their faces towards Ierusalem in the East, whose beauty shined in the Word of God.

(13) And thus we see by the planting of the Gospel in this Iland, the saying of the Psalmist accomplished, that God would give his Sonne Christ the Heathen for his inheritance, and the ends of the Earth (the proper attribute of this our Britaine) to be his possession. And the successe in History most apparently sheweth these parts (by an especiall prerogative) to bee Christs Kingdome. For albeit that Ierusalem and Antioch may rightly claime the precedency of all other places, the one being as it were the chamber where Christians were first borne, and the other the font where they were first Christened with that most sacred name: yet Britaine in some other graces hath outstript them all, having the glory to bee graced with the first Christian King that ever reigned in the world, which was our renowned Lucius, the first fruits of all the Kings that ever laid their Crownes at the foot of our Saviours Crosse: as also for producing the first Christian Emperour that by publike authority established the Gospell thorow the world, which was Constantine the Great, borne and brought up heere in Britaine by Queene Helena, a most vertuous and religious British Lady: unto whose dayes the succession of Christianity did heere continue, as by the martyrdomes of many Saints under Diocletian is apparant. Heerein also raigned the King that first uncrowned the head of the usurping Roman Beast, and freed the land from his devouring Locusts: putting downe Idolatry with Hezekiah that brake the brasen Serpent: and with Isaac new digged the Wels that those Philistines had stopped. And lastly hath this Iland produced that most royall and Christian Monarke, whose learned penne hath first depainted Antichrist, and pierced the heart of all Papall supremacy, as the sword of Gedeon did Zalmunna (* the Image of trouble) King of Madian. And as a Lion hath hee met that crooked [a] Serpent in the way of his usurped authority; whereby in short time undoubtedly the [b] Kall of his heart will be broken, if other Potentates likewise by his most godly example, cast off the yoake of vassallage, and in their severall Dominions governe (as free Princes ought) the people that God hath committed to their charge. So that in those and many other the like Princes of this happy Iland, most properly is performed that prophetical promise made unto the Church of Christ: that Kings should become her nursing Fathers and Queenes should bee her nursing Mothers: Of both which may bee truely said to Britaine, in imitation of that of Salomon; Many

The Biſhops of Britaine with-ſtood the Arrian Hereſie.

Nicephorus Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt. Ath anaſius Apologia 2.

In which number were Eluanus & Meduinus, thoſe two learned Divines, which were ſent by King Lucius unto Elutherius Biſhop of Rome, with whom returned two other famous Clerkes, whoſe names were Fagatius and Damianus; theſe together, both preached and baptized amongſt the Britaines, whereby many daily were drawne to the Faith: And as a worthy and ancient * Hiſtorian ſaith: The Temples which had beene founded to the Honour of their many Gods, were then dedicated to the one and onely true God: For there were in Britaine eight and twenty Flamins, and three Arch-flamins, inſtead of which, ſo many Biſhops and Arch-biſhops were appointed: under the Archbiſhop of London were the Provinces of Loegria and Cornubia: under Yorke, Deira, and Albania: under Vrbs Legionum, Cambria: By which meanes, this happy Kingdome under that godly King, was nobly beautified with ſo many Cathedrall Churches, and Chriſtian Biſhops Sees, before any other Kingdome of the world.

That this Lucius ſhould be the Apoſtle to the Bavarians, or that his ſiſter Emerita was crowned with the flames of Martyrdome fifteene yeeres after his death, I leave to the credit of Aegidius Scudius, and Hermanus Schedelius the reporters, and to the beſt liking of the readers. But moſt certaine it is, that the Chriſtian faith was ſtill profeſſed in this Iland, found and undefiled, as Beda witneſſeth, notwithſtanding the cruell perſecutions of the bloody Emperours.

(19) For, all this time (ſaith the ſaid Dicetus) Chriſtian Religion flouriſhed quietly in Britanny, till in Diocleſians time, their Churches were demoliſhed, their holy Bibles caſt into Bone-fires, and the Prieſts with their faithfull flocke bloodily murdered. In which number, about the yeare two hundred ninety three, as we reade (in Beda, Malmsbury, Randulphus, and others) Alban with his teacher Amphibalus were both of them martyred for the profeſſion of the Goſpell at the old Towne Verolanium: as alſo in Leiceſter, thoſe two Noble Citizens, Aaron, and Iulius, with multitudes both of men and women in ſundry places (ſaith Beda) as ſhortly after no leſſe then a thouſand Saints ſuffered death at Liechfield, whereupon the place was called another Golgotha, or field of blood: In memory whereof, the City beareth for Armes to this day, in an Eſcbucheon of Landskipt, ſundry perſons diverſly martyred. And yet after theſe times alſo the Britaines continued conſtant in Chriſtianity, and the cenſures of their Biſhops (for the great eſtimation of their Conſtancy, piety, and learning) required, and approved in great points of Doctrine among the aſſemblies of ſome Generall Councels; as that of Sardis and Nice, in the time of great Conſtantine (the firſt Chriſtian Emperour, and this our Country man, whoſe bleſſed dayes gave free way to that profeſſion, to the councels Authority, and to the whole world Peace) had we our Biſhops preſent; whoſe forwardneſſe againſt the Arrian Hereſie, afterward Athanaſius advanceth in his Apology unto Iovinian the Emperour, among three hundred Biſhops aſſembled at the Councell of Sardice, in Anno three hundred and fifty: whoſe words (as Nicephorus reporrs them) are theſe. Know moſt Chriſtian Emperour (ſaith hee) that this faith hath beene always preached and profeſſed, and that all Churches of Spaine, Britaine, France and Germany at this day with one voice doe approve the ſame. As alſo at that of Ariminum, in the yeare three hundred fifty nine, and in the raigne of Conſtantius, who cauſed foure hundred weſterne Biſhops to be there ſummoned in favour of the Arrians, whereof three were out of Britaine, (as Sulpitius Severus the good Biſhop of Burges hath reported) that gave their ſuffrages againſt that Hereſie. Theſe doth Hilary tearme the Biſhops of the Provinces of Britaine, by whom they were ſomewhat derided, becauſe being farre from their owne Country they lived upon the Emperours charge. And Beda teſtifieth, that from Dioclesians time they both reedified their former Temples, and founded new alſo in memory of their then freſh-bleeding Martyrs, and enjoyed a generall and joyfull peace in their religious profeſſion, till that Arrian Hereſie having firſt filled the Continent, fought and found paſſage over the Seas into our Iland.

Gennadius in his Catalogues Illuſtrium Divorum tels us of an other learned Biſhop of Britaine, Faſtidius, who in the time of Celeſtine Biſhop of Rome, wrote unto one Fatalis a booke de vita Chriſtiana, and another de viduitate ſervanda; of much divine learning and comfort. Chryſanthus likewiſe is recorded by Nicephorus, to be ſonne of Biſhop Martian, who having beene a Conſular Deputy in Italy under Theodoſius, and made Lievtenant of Britaine, where with great praiſe he managed the common-wealth, was againſt his will afterward made Biſhop at Conſtantinople of the Novatians, that called themſelves Cathari, that is pure; making a ſchiſme in the Church, by their deniall of Salvation to ſuch as fell into relapſe of ſinne after Baptiſme once received. This is that Biſhop of whom we read, that of all his Eccleſiaſticall revenewes he reſerved only for himſelfe two loaves of bread upon the Lords day. And in the firſt Tome of Councels is mention of Reſtitutus Biſhop of London, whom (becauſe that, as is moſt probable, Chriſtian Religion had in thoſe primitive times taken more firme footing in Britaine then in France) the French Biſhops called to their Nationall Councell, the ſecond at Arles, in Anno 335. that he might with his ſuffrage approve their Decrees. About the yeere foure hundred ſeventy, was a Provinciall Councell held in Britaine for the reforming of Religion, and repairing of the ruined Churches, which the Pagan mariage of Vortiger had decayed, to the great griefe and diſcontent of the people, a pregnant ſigne of the continuing zeale, which unto thoſe dayes had left a ſtanding memorie.

(20) And the Enſigne of Arthur, wherein the Virgin Mary with her ſonne in her armes (as is noted by Vincentius) was portayed, ſo often diſplayed for Chriſt, and his Countries liberty, againſt the Pagan Saxons, is as a ſeale to confirme us of their profeſſion, and doth ſhew the badge of that ages Chriſtianity. But the famous Monaſtery of Bangor, as a Colledge of divine Philoſophers, and by Clarivallenſis truly acknowledged to be the Mother of all other in the world, and her Monkes diſtributed into ſeven ſeverall parts, every part numbring three hundred ſoules, and earning their bread by their daily labours, doth notably witneſſe to all ſucceeding ages, that Chriſtian Religion was then both planted and preached in this Iland. And in the Synod held at Auſtins Oake were ſeven old Britaine Biſhops, beſides other Doctors, who met with that Romane Legate; and not in points of doctrine, but rather in their ſeverall rites and ceremonies did vary, by any thing that in that Affembly appeared. For as it is moſt undoubted, that (if we ſpeake properly) Ieruſalem is the Mother of us all, and of all Churches; and our former allegations doe evince, that the firſt Plantation of the Britiſh Faith was altogether by Iewes and others of the Eaſterne Church: ſo the very rites of this Religious Colledge of Bangor doe evidently prove, that their firſt inſtitution in Religion came from the Eaſt, Beda ſhewing that in all of them they diſſented from the Romane Church; yea, and that they never did, nor then would acknowledge any authority of the Biſhop of Rome over them in matters of the Church and ſervice of God. All which accordeth right well with that before cited out of Zachary, that the waters of life ſhould iſſue from Ieruſalem. And that S. Hierome ſpake moſt properly, in ſaying, the Britaines leaving Paganiſme, had turned their faces to Ieruſalem in the Eaſt.

The foundation of the ſaid Colledge is aſcribed to King Lucius, from whoſe time unto the entrance of this Auſten the Monke, foure hundred thirty eight yeeres were expired: in which ſpace we have ſeene that the Chriſtian Faith was both taught and embraced in this land, notwithſtanding the continuall perſecutions of the Romans, Huns, Picts, and Saxons: which laſt made ſuch deſolations in the outward face of the Church, that they drove the Chriſtian Biſhops into the deſerts of Cornwall and Wales. In which number were Thomas and Thadiocus Biſhops of London and Yorke, chuſing rather to ſuffer adverſity with the people of God, then to enjoy the pleaſures of ſinne for a ſeaſon. By whoſe labours the Goſpel was plentifully propagated among thoſe vaſt mountaines, and thoſe parts eſpecially above all other made very glorious, by the multitudes of their holy Saints and learned Teachers.

(21) Laſtly, (for the cloſe of all) that theſe teſtimonies are ſincerely by us produced, for the firſt preaching and planting of the Goſpel, and by ſuch meanes and men as we have declared, and particularly by Ioſeph of Arimathea and his aſſociates, the conſent of all Writers, both forraine and home-bred, doth ſufficiently approve: and the reverend regard had of the place, with the many Charters thereof to this day remaining, are ſtrong inducements for thoſe our firſt Apoſtles Reſidencie and Burials: whereof one, exemplified under the Seale of King Edward the third, is to bee ſeene at this day, reciting that the Abbey of Glaſtenbury being burned in the time of King Henry the ſecond while it was in his hands, at the requeſt of the Patriarke of Ieruſalem (then preſent in England) inſtigated further both by the Biſhops and Nobility, hee did reedifie the ſame, cauſing diligent ſearch to bee made for the ancient Charters of that foundation, and among many recited in that exemplification, in one of them it is called, Origo Religionis in Anglia: in another, Tumulum Sanctorum, ab ipſis diſpoſitis Domini adificatum, fuiſſe venerabilem. Alſo in the ſame Charter ſicatum, fuiſſe venerabilem. Alſo in the ſame Charter amongſt many other Kings, there is mention made of King Arthur, to be a great Benefactor unto that Abbey; whoſe Armes upon the ſtone walles, both in the Chappell (called S. Ioſeph) and in divers other places of the Abbey, are cut: which is an Eſchucheon, whereon a Croſſe with the Virgin Mary in the firſt quarter is ſet, and is yet to this day remaining over the Gate of entrance, which is held to be alſo the arms of that Abbey. This place is ſaid to have beene given to Ioſeph and his brethren by Arviragus then King of Britaine: and from hence were thoſe two divine Doctors ſent to Eleutherine by King Lucius, as by their Epithets doth appeare: the one of them called Eluanus Anglonus, or of Glaſtenbury; and the other, Meduvinus of Belga, that is, Welles neere unto this place. And to theſe perſons & places, Polydore Virgil, that dwelled among us, and had peruſed moſt of our Antiquities, aſcribeth the originall and precedencie of our Chriſtian Faith, in theſe words: Hæc omnia Chriſtianæ pietatis in Britannia extitere primordia, quam deinde Lucius Rex accendit & adauxit, &c. And our other latter Writers likewiſe with him agree of this place, further affirming, that at firſt but poore, and without all pompe, it was their Oratory, built onely of wrethen wands, as both Capgrave, Bale, Maior, Scroope, Harding, Throne, and others affirme: Aterwards by divers Princes raiſed unto greater glory, with many large priviledges & Charters granted; to wit, of Edgar, Edmund, Elfred, Edward, Bringwalthius, Kinwin, Baldred, Ina, Kenwall, the Conqueror, Rufus, and others: all which were diligently peruſed by King Henry the ſecond, as we have ſaid, and that Rectory in theſe Charters continually termed The Grave of Saints: The mother-Church: The Diſciples foundation, and dedicated unto Chriſt, as the firſt place in this Land, wherein his Goſpel was firſt preached and embraced.

(22) To conclude this digreſſion, grown much greater then was intended, we ſee it is moſt apparant, that the Britaines had a ſettled opinion in Chriſtianity before the found thereof was heard from Rome; and that the Lord had heere ſet up his ſtandard, whereunto theſe Ilanders reſorted as to the Tower of their ſtrength, and was the firſt Kingdome of the Gentiles, that are faid to bring their ſonnes thus in their armes, and their daughters thus upon their ſhoulders, unto the Lords Sanctuary: whoſe knowledge continually increaſing, hath hitherto, to Englands great joy and fame, beene ſtill continued, though the ſpirituall ſparkes thereof for a ſeaſon have ſometimes beene covered in the cinders of the Pagans deſolations, or with the ſuperſtitious worſhips of mans inventions; both which now diſperſed as clouds, before the Sunne, the light appeareth in his full ſtrength, and the moſt pure waters of the word run untroubled. This Iland then, in this thing made happy before the moſt, the Inhabitants became Inſtructers of others, and in their earthly veſſels bare this heavenly liquor, which thorow their golden Conduits ran into many other Countries, and filled their Ceſterne with this water of life. For from hence was Netherland converted to Chriſtianity, as teſtifieth the ſtory of Swithbertus: Switzerland by Beatus, as witneſſeth Rhenanus: Burgundy by our Columbanus, as ſaith Siegebertus: Scotland by Brandadus, as Bernard the French Monke affirmeth: Swedia by Gallus, as ſaith Petrus de Natalibus: Friſia by Wilfred, as is recorded by Beda and Matthew of Weſtminſter: and the Francomians, Heſſians, and Thwringians, by Winifred our Devonſhire man: the Norwegians by Nicolas Brekſpere of Middleſex: the Lithuanians by Thomas Walden of Eſſex, the Iriſh by Patrik, the Picts by Ninius Bernicus, and by Chriſts aſſiſtance the naked Virginians by us Engliſh ſhalbe. Againe, if wee caſt our eie on all the reformed Churches in Chriſtendome, and with them on Luther, Huſſe, and Ierome of Prage; they will all confeſſe, they firſt tooke their light from the learned Wickliffe of Oxford; the Lampe of whoſe ſacred knowledge hath illumined not onely all the corners of this Kingdome, but alſo all thoſe forraigne States, whom it hath pleaſed God to deliuer from the thraldome and vengeance of Babylon: ſo that with the German Poet, to Gods glory and Britaines praiſe, the Engliſh thus may ſing:

Quin ſe Religio multum debere Britannis
Servata, & latè circum diſperſa fatetur.
Religion doth confeſſe, to Britaine deepe ſhe ſtands.
In debt, by whom preſerv'd, ſhe now ſits forraine Lands.

In which regard, Polydore Virgil doth rightly call England the Parent or Mother-Monaſtery of all Europe. As likewiſe Peter Ramus termeth Britaine to bee twice Schoole-miſtreſſe unto the Kingdome of France. And the Annals of Flanders teſtifie, that no Nation had ſo many Divine Nobles (they might likewiſe have ſaid, ſo many Noble divines) as England hath had; neither any more bountifull to Gods Saints. Our Kings for ſanctity ranked before all other Potentates of the earth, as Vincentius recordeth: Our Nobles truly honourable, and the ſonnes of Princes: Our divines, for doctrine ſhining as Nazarites whiter then the ſnow: And all of us claming our ſpirituall lots of Inheritance in the midſt of the Tribes of Iſrael.

OTHO.

CHAPTER X.

An. Dom. 70.

BVt leaving Christs proceedings to the disposé of himselfe, let us returne to the subject from whence we have wandered, and continue the successions of Great Britaines Monarches, unto them that have held it, whether by chance of warre, or voice of Election: In which sort (as is said) Galba got it, and but a short time kept it: And from him Otho tooke it, and a shorter time enjoyed it.

(2) Whose Originall (saith Tacitus) was from Ferrentium, his Father a Consull, his mothers blood somewhat disparaged, but yet not base; his youth run over with voluptuous wantonnesse and prodigall expences, more ready for disturbances, then depending upon preferment or dignity of State; and having gone thorough all his wealth, retained onely the hearty affections of the Souldiers, which Galba had utterly alienated. Neither did Otho himselfe bandy against Galba, but Vitellius in Germany was favoured against both; Two persons so vile and ambitious, as was much feared, would prove the scourge of the Empire, and the ruine of Rome.

Vitellius much favoured.

(3) Vnto Vitellius sided the Britaines, under the Conduct of Trebellius Maximus, (remembred before) a man unfit for warre, and unexperienced of service, compounded altogether of covetousnesse, and for his niggardly sparings, and unmercifull pollings, exceedingly hated of his Armie: which was further aggravated by Roscius Celius, Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, his ancient Enemy, betwixt whom the sparks of envie shortly burst forth into flames of reciprocall accusations. Trebellius being charged of insufficiency for command, with the beggering of the Province, and Legions; and he againe accusing Celius of factious behaviours, and dissolving of discipline: through which dissensions a negligent regard was held of the Souldiers, who carried themselves arragantly, even against both; and as men that had rather be doing ill, then doing nothing, grew daily into mutinies. In these stirres Maximus finding himselfe unable to withstand Roscius, (the common affection swaying on his side,) with his friends and followers entred Germanie in the quarrell of Vitellius, and joyned those British forces to maintaine his cause, who now presuming upon his owne strength, and others his Confederates, ambitiously plaied the Prince, growne to that height even of nothing.

1. Chap. fellon

Roscius Celius & Trebellius accuse each other.

The Souldiers thereby discovered.

(4) Otho his Concurrent (in this thing only commendable) fought by all meanes to stay the effusion of more civill blood; and that already spent, so possest his thoughts, that his minde was still distracted and nightly affrighted with the seeming appearance of Galbaes ghost: for which causes hee sent conditions of peace to Vitellius, offering him an equall part in the Empire, and to give him also his daughter in mariage. But Vitellius disdaining any competition, refuseth all Capitulations, and prepares himselfe for the warre. Otho thus constrained, sets forth his forces, and in three severall skirmishes had the victory, but in the fourth at Brixellum lost the day; yet not so much weakened or unrecoverable, (his Armie in number and courage surmounting the other) as himselfe was unwilling to try the chance of warre any more; for being importunated by his Captaines and Leaders, to reenforce the Battaile, with many reasons, and probabilities of an assured victory, in a thankfull and short Oration answered thus their Petitions.

Otho affrighted in the night.

Suetan. in vita Otho. c. 7. Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 8. His offer to Vitellius.

" (5) To hazard your vertues and valours for one " Mans estate, I hold it dangerous, and needlesse it is, " that my life should be prized at so deere a rate; al- " ready fortune and I have had sufficient experience " each of others, and not the least in this my short " time of glory, wherein I have learned, It is harder to " moderate affections in the excesse of felicity, then ei- " ther industry or hazard for attaining the same. " These civill warres Vitellius beganne; which I for " my part purpose not to continue; and hereby let " Posterity esteeme of Otho, that others have kept the " Empire longer, but never any that left it more vali- " antly. Let this minde therefore accompany me to " the Grave, that you for your parts would have died " for my sake, and I to save your lives, die voluntary " and unvanquished. I blame not the Gods, nor envy " your Emperors rising glory: it is sufficient that my " house hath touched the highest straine of Honour, " and my selfe to be left in records, The soveraign Mo- " narch of the World.

Hath the victory in three skirmishes. Lost the day in the fourth.

Importuned by his Souldiers to renew the battell, is unwilling.

His Oration to his Souldiers.

(6) And thereupon solemnely taking his leave of the whole Army, went to his Tent, and with his dagger wounded himselfe under the left pappe, whereof immediately he died, in the yeare of his age thirty seven, and daies of his raigne ninety five. He was of stature but lowe, feeble in his feete, and unto so great a minde, his bodie not any waies proportionable; his face without haire and woman-like, his attire nice and delicate, and his life and death nothing at all consonant or agreeable.

He killeth himselfe.

His age and raigne.

His lineaments and habite.

VITELLIVS.

CHAPTER. XI.

An. Dom. 70.

WHen certaine newes of Othoes death was brought Vitellius, he presently assumed the name of Cæsar, and administred the affaires of the Empire, with no lesse authority then the absolute Commander of the World. And of such acceptance was the accident, that he dedicated the dagger wherewith it was done, unto Mars in his Temple at Coleyn, as the lucky instrument of his advanced estate.

Vitellius glad of Othoes death.

Suetan. in vita Vitell. c. 10. Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 8.

(2) Naturally ambitious hee was, and now the fame the more inhaunced by his strengths of the Germans souldiers, and the flatteries of the Senate, which ever bare saile with the faireſt winde. His entrance into Rome was above measure magnificall, having the naked sword of Iulius Cæsar borne before him, with sound of Trumpets, Ensignes, Standards, Banners, and Flags, accompanied with an Army worthy of a better Prince then Vitellius was.

Vitellius magnificall above measure.

His descent diversly reported.

(3) His originall is diversly reported: either framed according to the affections of his flatterers, or blasted with the tongues of depraving backe-biters: and both in extremes, extremely disagreeing. For Eutropius, as Suetonius writeth, deduced his descent from Faunus King of Aborigines, and Lady Vitellia his wife, worshipped in many places for a goddesse. But Cassius Severus affirmeth him to bee sprung from no better roote then a Cobler, and a common naughty-packe the daughter of a Baker. Howsoever, true it is, that Lucius his father bare thrice the Consulship in Rome, was Provost of Syria, and in such credit with the Emperour Claudius, that in his absence and expedition into Britaine, hee had the whole charge of the Empire committed unto him: himselfe in speciall favour with Tiberius, and in use for his strumpets: with Caius, for his Chariot-running: with Claudius, for his dice-playing: and with Nero, for his flattery: unto whose Ghost in publike shew hee sacrificed, and disposed the Imperiall affaires at the discretion of base Stage-players.

Vitellius in favour with divers former Emperours.

(4) His unmeasurable gluttony was such, that the whole imployments of his captaines were to provide him Cates, and that in such excesse, that two thousand dishes of fish, and seven thousand of fowle, were served to his Table at one Supper; and yet was hee not asshamed to commend his owne Temperance, in a set Oration before the Senate and People, who well knew him to bee guiltlesse of that vertue: insomuch that Tacitus reporteth, in those few moneths wherein hee raigned, he had wasted nine hundred millions of sesterces, which amounteth to seven millions, thirty one thousand, two hundred fifty pounds sterling. And Iosephus thinketh if he had lived longer, the whole revenues of the Empire had not beene sufficient to maintaine his gluttony. A Prince otherwise no way memorable, as being indeed without skill in profession of Armes, without counsell in matters of the greatest importance, commonly drowned in surfet, and farre unmeet to weild weighty affaires.

(5) These defects found ready vent to his opposites, and gave liberty of speech in the Assemblies of their Estates: among whom Vespasian was held the onely Morning-Starre worthy to ascend on the setting of this darkened Sunne; unto whom Licinius Mutianus, Governour of Syria, was averse, Marcus Clunius Rufus of Spaine stood very well affected, and Tiberius Alexander of Ægypt for him the foremost. Also with him sided the Kings Sohemus, Antiochus, and Agrippa, with the beautifull Queene Berenice: unto whom Vespasian and his sonne Titus were well knowne Governours together in the Provinces of Syria and Iudæa.

Vespasian his Adherents for the Empire.

Tacit. hist. 2. cap. 73.

(6) The first that did revolt were the Illyrian bands: to suppresse which Vitellius sent unto Vectius Bolanus Lieutenant of Britaine, for ayde of that Province, having had good experience of their service in his wars before: as when Hordeonius Flaccus brought eight thousand Britaines to his quarrell against Otho: As also when Trebellius Maximus (formerly mentioned) joyned them to the German forces. Which last man had now againe resumed his former place in Britanny, without either Majesty or Authority, but rather ruled by way of intreaty, and at the discretion of the Souldiers.

(7) Vnto whom, this Vectius Bolanus succeeded for Deputy: a man of no great parts in warre, but more temperate, and not odious for any crime. His answer unto Vitellius was, that the Country of Britaine stood not so quiet, that he might spare any numbers thence, the souldiers and confederates having their hands full, to hold all upright. Neither (in truth) were they fast to his side, but rather affected Vespasian, whose reputation in warlike affaires was first gotten amongst them in Britaine, in the raigne of Claudius: though we find in Tacitus that the Vexillaries of three British Legions followed Vitellius in his expedition against the Illyrian Army, wherein the flower and strength of all the Britaines are reported to have been, and that their fourteenth Legion came to his ayde, in whom notwithstanding he had no good confidence: but hearing the daily revolts of the Provinces, and the approach of Vespasian, was minded to resigne his dignity unto him, had not the out-cries of the people beene against it.

CHAPTER XII.

Veſpaſian.

Petillius.

An. Dom. 72.

SO acceptable was the fall of this Prince, and ſuch hopes revived at the entrance of his ſucceſſor, as that all mens minds were raiſed to an expectation, that the glory of the Empire, ſo much Eclipſed through the civill broiles of Galba, Otho, and this laſt Vitellius, ſhould now ſhine againe in the beauty of her former liberty by the deſired government of aged Veſpaſian; whoſe integrity, valour, and ſervice, had beene ſufficiently approoved by his many expeditions, in all the Provinces wherein he had to doe.

An ancient prophecy in all the Eaſt parts.

Veſpaſians worth and eſtimation.

(2) His deſcent was from the Flavian family, and that but baſe and obſcure: his Father called Titus Flavius; his Mother Polla Veſpaſia, his Wife Domitia, and his Sonnes Titus, and Domitian, both Emperors ſucceeding after him.

His originall. Sueton. in vit. Veſpaſ. ſect. 1.

(3) In his young yeares, hee ſerved as a Military Tribune in the Country of Thracia, and as Queſtor in the Provinces of Crete, and Cyrene: Vnder Claudius the Emperour, he went forth into Germany, as Lieutenant of a Band, and from thence was ſent into Britaine, to be Leader of the ſecond Legion, where the foundation of that greatneſſe whereunto after hee attained, was firſt laid: for as Suetonius hath written, therein with victory hee fought thirty ſet Battailes, and was alſo Conqueror of the Ile of Wight: whereby two mighty nations were ſubdued to the Romans; and twenty Townes wonne from the Britaines: for which exploits he had Triumphall ornaments, worthily aſſigned him by Claudius, whoſe owne Triumph, (as Ioſephus ſaith) was gotten without any paines of his, but by the onely proweſſe of Veſpaſian. After this, he governed Africke with ſingular integrity and much honour, and was laſtly ſent by Nero for his Vice-roy into Syria upon this occaſion.

Ioſephus Bel. Iud. lib. 3. c. 1.

Suetan. in vita Veſpaſ. Sect. 4.

(4) There had beene ſpread thorow all the Eaſt-parts, an old Prophecy and ſetled opinion conſtantly beleeved, that it was appointed by the Deſtinies, there ſhould come out of Iury him that ſhould bee Lord of the whole world: which how it ſerved for the Iewes to revolt, or for the Romans to apply onely unto Veſpaſian, the event ſhewech, which cannot agree to any other, then to the perſon and power of Chriſt Ieſus, there borne, and throughout the whole world ſtill raigning; Yet upon the confidence of ſuch an accompliſhment, the Iewes revolted from the Romanes obedience, and ſlew their Preſident Sabinus by name, putting to flight Gallus, Lieutenant Generall of Syria, that came to his ayde, and got from him the maine Standard, or Enſigne of the Eagle. This Nation was ſo populous and ſtrong, that none was thought fitter to ſtay their attempts, then was Veſpaſian, who with great honour and approbation, reduced that Province unto their former ſubjection, and there remained the ſhort time of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius their raignes; of whoſe proceedings there * Ioſephus writeth at large, unto whom I muſt referre the unſatisfied Reader.

The cauſe of the Iewes revolt.

* Ioſeph. de Bel. Iud.

(5) All which times, the civill ſtirres amongſt the Romans, gave the Provinces occaſion to attempt their former liberties; as did the Batavians, Germans, and French, with whom the Britaines alſo tooke heart to revolt; But the firſt that ſided with Veſpaſian, were two thouſand expert Souldiers, drawne out of the Meſian Legions, and ſent to ayde Otho againſt Vitellius; who marching as farre as Aquileia, they heard there of the certaine death of Otho, and thereupon taking the advantage of the offered opportunity, with an uncontrolled liberty, committed many robberies and outragious villanies: Inſomuch, that fearing condigne puniſhment, they held it their beſt policy, to combine ſome ſpeciall man by their favours unto them, whereby their facts might bee either quite ſmoothered, or lightly reprehended; neither in their opinion was any ſo gracious for deſert or power, as was Veſpaſian, and therefore with one aſſent they proclaimed him Emperour, and wrote his name in their Banners, thinking themſelves as worthy to make an Emperour, as were the Legions either of Spaine, or Germany.

Tacit. hiſt. 3. cap. 9.

Veſpaſian choſen Emperour by the Meſſia Souldier.

(6) Of the like minde were his owne Legions in Syria and Iury, growne now ſo famous by the proſecution of thoſe warres, that they highly conceited his his valour, and their owne ſufficiency to be inferiour to none: And therefore all on the ſudden at Cæſarea, both Captaine and Souldier ſalute him Emperour; which title when he reſolutely gainſaid and refuſed, with drawne ſwords they threatned his death. Thus then being brought into danger every way, hee ſent his letters unto Tiberius Alexander, Lievtenant of Ægypt, who likewiſe at Alexandria, preſently proclaimed him Emperour.

Tacit. in vita Agric. fol. 187.

(7) At this time Veſtius Bolanus ſent by Vitellius was Lievtenant of Britaine, there ruling in a gentler and milder manner then was fit for ſo fierce a Nation: for the ſouldiers having gotten head, by the remiſſe Government of Trebellius Maximus, continued the ſame looſeneſſe in diſcipline ſtill: and Bolanus in ſtead of awe and obedience, retained onely their affections and good wils. But moſt eſpecially the ſhort raignes of theſe laſt Emperors (whoſe beginnings were altogether imployed to ſatiſfie their licentious pleaſures, and latter times ſpent for the defence of their Lives from violent Deathes) gave way to many imperfections of the Governours, and miſdemeanours of the common ſouldiers.

Petillius Cerealis Deputy in Britaine.

(8) But when Veſpaſian had aſſumed the Empire, great Captaines and good ſouldiers were ſent into the Provinces; and into Britaine, Petilius Cerealis that had formerly there made proofe of his ſervice under Nero, in the warres againſt Boduo, and afterwards in other parts, as againſt the Gaules and Batavians, with proſperous victories. The fame of this man ſtrooke great terror into the hearts of the wavering Britaines, and amongſt them of the * Brigantes, the moſt populous State of the whole Province: againſt whom at his firſt approach they warred, and in many battles, and ſome of them bloudy, the greateſt part of theſe people were waſted, and their Country came into the Romiſh ſubjection.

* Yorkeſhire, Lancaſhire, Weſtmerland, and the Biſhoprickes of Durham.

Iulius Frontinus ſubdueth the Britoniers.

(9) Whereby the glory of Cerealis might well have dimmed the fame of his Succeſſor, had not Iulius Frontinus a great Souldier alſo ſuſtained the charge with reputation and credit, in ſubduing the ſtrong and Warlike nation the * Silures: where he had, beſide the force of the enemy to ſtruggle with, the ſtraits, and difficult places of rockes and mountaines, for acceſſe.

* South-wales.

Iulius Agricola Lieutenant in Britaine.

(10) After whoſe government (no further Acts being mentioned,) Iulius Agricola, who in Rome had beene Queſtor, Tribune, and Pretor, and Lievtenant in Aquitania, was ſent Generall into Britaine by Veſpaſian the Emperour, the yeere before his death. This man formerly had there ſerved under the command of Petilius Cerealis, whereby hee had gained experience both of the People and Province; and at his firſt approach gathered the Enſignes of the Legions, and other aydes of the Auxiliaries (who for that yeere attended an end of their travels, becauſe the Summer was almoſt ſpent) left by protracting time, the violence of the Ordovices ſhould further burſt forth, who a little before his entrance, had utterly almoſt cut off a wing which lay on their Borders, the reſt of the Country, as men deſirous of Warre, allowing their example.

Hee overcommeth the Ordovices.

Againſt theſe Agricola addreſſed, who kept themſelves in places of advantage, and durſt not deſcend into indifferent ground. He therefore being himſelfe foremoſt, led up his Army to their encounter, and ſeconded with the courage of his trained Souldiers, put them all to ſword and flight, whereby the whole nation was almoſt quite deſtroyed.

(11) And now that his fame began to aſcend, hee knew well that with inſtance it muſt be followed, and as the firſt affaires had iſſue, the reſt would ſucceed; he therefore deliberated to conquer the Iland Mona from the poſſeſſion whereof Paulinus Suetonius was revoked, by the generall Rebellion under Boduo. But in a purpoſe not purpoſed before, and ſhips wanting, the policy of the Captaine deviſed a paſſage; for he commanded the moſt choice of the aydes, to whom the ſhallowes were well knowne (and without whom the Romans did almoſt attempt nothing) to put over at once; and ſuddenly to invade them. Theſe Britaines, after the uſe of their Country manner, were moſt skilfull ſwimmers, and in ſwimming armed, able to governe themſelves and horſes. The Monaans thinking themſelves ſecure, for that no Ships were ſeene in their River, now thus ſuddenly ſurprized, as men amazed, firmely thought that nothing could be invincible to them, who came with ſuch reſolutions to Warre, and therefore they humbly deſired Peace, and yeelded the Iland unto Agricolaes devotion.

He winneth the Iland of Mona.

(12) Who now in theſe proſperous proceedings of his fortunes, fought not with any glorious relations or letters of advertiſements, to improve and augment the greateneſſe of his honour; but rather in ſeeking to ſuppreſſe his fame, made it ſhine more bright; and addreſſing himſelfe for civill governement, reformed many abuſes in his houſe, his campe, and in the whole Province, and thoſe eſpecially that moſt touched the poorer ſort, as by moderating the increaſe of Tribute and Corne, wherewith the Britaines were daily burdened: by the ſuppreſſing of which enormities (and the like) an honourable opinion of him was every where entertained, and a generall inclination unto peace, which partly by the negligence partly by the avarice of former Governours, had beene no leſſe feared then Warre it ſelfe.

Agricola good to the poore.

(13) And whereas the Britaines hitherto ſtill harried with oppreſſions and Warres, had little leiſure or will to apply themſelves to things which accompany peace, and are the ornaments of civill and ſettled ſocieties, and therefore were prone upon every occaſion to revolt and ſtirre: to induce them by pleaſures to quieteneſſe and reſt, he exhorted them in private, and helpt them in publike, to build Temples, Houſes, and Places of Aſſemblies, and common reſort; and likewiſe provided that the ſonnes of their Nobles ſhould be inſtructed in the liberall Arts and Sciences, commending the induſtry, and preferring the wits of the Britaines before the Students of France, as being now growne curious to attaine the Eloquence of the Roman Gentrie, (yea even the Gowne the habit of peace and peaceable Arts) and to delight in gorgeous buildings, banquets, and baths.

His good courſe in winning the people from wildeneſſe.

The Britaines civilized.

(14) And thus farre had Agricola proceeded before the death of Veſpaſian, whoſe managing of the Imperiall dignity was every way anſwerable to ſo high a place, and whoſe death was as much lamented, as his Vertues did ſurmount his predeceſſours. But as touching his miraculous cures of the blind and the lame, as they ſerve nor either to be urged or inferred in this our preſent hiſtory; ſo yet may they convince the indurate Atheiſt, whoſe conſcience is feared with the ſinne of incredulity of the miracles wrought by our bleſſed Saviour Ieſus Chriſt. For if the wiſeſt hiſtorians of thoſe times have beleeved themſelves, and left records upon their credit to following poſterity, that by his touch onely hee cured a lame man, and with his ſpittle opened the eyes of the blind, being a mortall and ſinfull man; ſhall it then bee doubted, that hee which knew no ſinne, neither received the gift by meaſure, either in power could not, or in act did not worke ſuch miracles as were the witneſſes of his Godhead, and for ſuch are recorded, to confirme our faith? But to our purpoſe.

Veſpaſian cureth the blinde and the lame, and that miraculouſly.

Veſpaſians miracles convince Atheiſts that deny our Saviours miracles.

(15) When Veſpaſian had lived threeſcore and nine yeeres, ſeven moneths, and ſeven dayes, and had raigned tenne yeares, as Euſebius ſaith, he dyed peaceably in his bed; which no Emperour ſince Auguſtus ever did; having beene a great ſcourge and inſtrument of God againſt the miſerable Iewes: whoſe kingly race from Davids line he fought by all meanes to extirpate, that ſo all their hopes and expectations might for ever be cut off.

Veſpaſian dieth peaceably. Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 12. & 13.

TITVS FLAVIVS VESPASIAN.

CHAPTER XIII.

Titus Emp.

Agricola Lieut.

An. Dom. 81.

RScently upon the death of this Emperour, Titus his eldest sonne, sirnamed Flavius Vespasian, without any contradiction was received and obeyed for his right full successor: aswell for that his father in his life time had made him his Partner in the Empire, and at his death by Testament declared him his Heire; as also for the generall opinion conceived of him who for his inbred goodnesse and noble conditions, was called and esteemed the lovely darling and delight of mankind. Indeed of a most comely presence hee was, and fitted thereunto with all heroicall vertues, a great Souldier, learned in the Arts, a good Orateur, a skilfull Musitian, and could by artificiall characters write both very fast and very faire.

Titus made Emperour without all contradiction.

Called the delight of mankinde. Sueton. in vita Tit. fol. 1. Fitted with all heroicall vertues.

(2) His youth he spent in Militarie qualities, and served in Germanie and Britaine with exceeding commendations, and in Iury warred with the like glory, which is nothing impaired by the learned stile of his Recorder Iosephus, unto whom againe for these affaires I must referre the curious Reader.

His implotment in former times.

(3) Ierusalem, with the slaughter of eleven thousand Iewes, even on the birth day of his daughter, with such honour he wonne, that thereupon presently he was saluted Emperour, even in the life time of Vespasian his father: and from that day carried himselfe as his Associate in the Empire; for with him he triumphed, and with him he joyntly administred the Censorship, his Collegue he was in the Tribunes authoritie; and his companion also in seven Consulships: In all which, though the Edicts went forth in his fathers name: yet were they penned by himselfe. Of this his victory over the Iewes, hee left the remembrance to posteritie by stamping upon the reverse of his coines IVD. CAP. with pictures expressing his Triumph and the Iewes overthrow, which in the front of this Chapter we have also placed.

Iosepholl. iud. lib. 6. & 7. He wonne Ierusalem in the life-time of his father.

His faults.

(4) Somewhat hee was blemished with the love of Berenice, the beautifull Queene of Iewry, and much more with the murther of Aulus Cinna, only through jealousie conceived of her; and whether that was the sinne whereof at his death hee repented is uncertaine, when lifting up his eyes to Heaven, hee complained why his Life should bee taken from him, that excepting one offence deserved not to die. As himselfe in glory weilded the Emperiall Scepter, so did his Substitutes governe the Provinces; at which time in Britaine, Agricola was President, and therein had spent almost two yeeres under the raigne of Vespasian, in such manner as wee have declared.

His repentance at his death.

(5) In his third yeere, he discovered new Countries and parts of this Iland, yet untouched, or at leastwise not thoroughly subdued, as altogether unsatiate of that which was gotten; and sought to draw the confines of the Empire with a larger compasse: therefore marching Northward to the Frith of * Taus, wasted all as he went, and without any resistance fortified the places with Castles and Bulwarkes, which hee stored with sufficient provision; where every Garrison wintring, guarded it selfe, and with the Summers service, ever repaired the Winters events, whereby evermore the Enemy went to the worse, and his designes prospered as himselfe wished.

Tacitus in vita Agric. Agricola enlargeth the Empire.

TWEEDE, as is thought.

(6) The fourth Summer was spent in perusing and ordering that which hee had over-run. And if the glory of the Romane name could have permitted, or so beene satisfied, it needed not to have fought other limits of Britaine: for * Glota and * Bodotria, two armes of two opposite Seas, shooting farre into the Land, and onely divided asunder by a narrow partition of ground, the same was both guarded and fortified with Castles and Garrisons: so that the Romans were absolute Lords of all the South-side, and had cast the Enemie as it were into another Iland.

His fleaping of killing.

Tacit. hist. 3. cap. 13. He dedicateth a Temple to Iupiter.

(7) In this state stood this Province of Britaine at the death of Titus, whose short raigne hath left no long matters of discourse, and his Acts greater under other Emperours, then when he was Emperour himselfe; yet that little time wherein he governed, was with Iustice, Liberalitie, and Love of all. A great Enemy he was to Promoters, Pettifoggers and Extortors of penall lawes, which Cancker-wormes of Commonwealths, and Caterpillers to Courts of Iustice, he caused to be whipped and banished out of Rome. Loving and familiar he was to all his Subiects, and so desirous to give them satisfaction, that his usuall saying was, No man ought to goe sad from the speech of a Prince. Mercifull he was to the poore, and so ready to doe them good, that one day being spent by him without any notable action, in sorrow he said: I have quite lost a day. He died the thirteenth of September, the yeere from Christs Nativitie eightie three, when hee had raigned two yeeres and two moneths, and in the two and fortieth yeere of his age, being poisoned by Domitian his Brother and Successor.

FLAVIVS DOMITIAN.

CHAPTER. XIV.

Domitian. Emp.

Agricola Lieut.

An. Dom. 83.

DOmitian attaining the Empire by the death of Titus, (wrought by himselfe,) as farre differed from him in vertuous conditions, as hee was linked neere him in consanguinitie of blood: His youth not spent in Armes, with his Father and Brother, but inertiously consumed in lascivioustesse and penurie.

Agricola his opinion of Ireland.

(2) At Rome he was in the Vitellian troubles, where, with Sabinus his Vncle, hee had beene murdered, had not the Sexton of the Capitoll hid him in his house, and in the habit of a Minister unknowen, thence escaped: which place afterwards, when hee came to be Emperour, he gorgeously built for a Temple to Iupiter, his supposed Preserver, and consecrated himselfe in the lap of that heathenish Idoll. Hee very speedily apprehendeth the hope of an Empire, for no sooner was his Father made Emperour, but that he assumed the name of Cæsar, and in Rome carried himselfe with such prodigality, and so liberally made promises of the Imperiall offices, that his father hearing thereof, said, hee marvelled why his sonne sent not one to succeed him in his place. But to dissemble and cloake his idle conceits, he gave himselfe to the study of Poesie, (although with little affection, as the end proved) for which notwithstanding both Pliny and Martial doe highly commend him, as it is the manner of men to admire the very shadow of a good qualitie in Princes and great ones: and so doth Iuvenal and Suetonius praise his brave minde, for his shewes in the Amphitheater, wherein not onely men, but women also were brought, and forced to fight for their lives with wilde beasts: a cruell spectacle nevertheless, and unbeseeming to humanity,

He searcheth the creekes and harboroughs.

Caledonians most puissant.

(3) His first entrance into state and dignitie was neither greatly applauded, nor gainsaid, he seeming to carry an equall mixture, and his vertues to hold level with his vices. But ambition now supported with Soveraignty, did quickly set the scale onely for the worse side. The affaires of the Empire he altogether neglected; and impatient of labour, or affection to Armes, daily retired into a private Chamber or Gallery, wherein he usually applyed himselfe onely to catch Flies, and with the point of a Bodkin to pricke them thorow: whereupon one being asked what company was with the Emperour, replyed, Not so much as a flie. In which princely exercise let us a while leave him, and returne to his better imploied Lieutenant Agricola.

Agricola searcheth out the helmes of Britain.

(4) Who now in the fifth yeare of his government tooke the Seas, and with many prosperous conflicts subdued some adjacent places and people, before that time unknowen; and furnished with forces those parts of Britaine, which lay coasted against Ireland: to which Countrey also he had a minde, and would often say, that if the Romans were therein planted, the Liberty of the Britains would soone be banished quite out of sight, and out of hope.

(5) Now in the fixth yeare of his Prefecture, because a general rising of all his farther Nations beyond Bodotria was feared, and passages were all beset with power of the Enemies, he manned a Fleet to search the creekes and harboroughs of the ample Region beyond it, and with his Army marched further North. The Britaines hereat (especially at sight of their ships) much amazed and troubled, knowing now that the secret of their Seas were all discovered, and no refuge left if they were overcome; armed themselves with great preparation; and the Caledonians (a most puissant and strong Nation in those parts) the formost; who, as challengers, braved the Romans so boldly, and in such manner, that some counselled the Generall to retire his forces on this side Bodotria, and rather of his owne accord to depart, then to bee repelled with shame.

(6) Agricola, whose courage could not be clouded with any Dastardly feare, held on his intents; and hearing by prisoners taken, the manner of his Enemies proceedings, ordered his hoste accordingly, dividing his army into three battels, and so lay entrenched; the weakest whereof, containing the Ninth Legion, the Britaines by night assailed, and having slaine the Watch, brake into their Campe with a furious noyse: to whose rescue, Agricola sent his Light horsemen, and a Band of foot, whose Ensignes and Armour glittering in the appearance of day, so rebated the edge and further purposes of the Britaines, that they gave backe to the gates of the Trench; where, in the straites the conflict was sharpe and cruell, till in the end they were forced to quit the field. Vpon this battell so manfully fought, and famously won, the Romans presuming that to their prowesse all things were now easie and open, cried to lead into Caledonia, and to find out the limits of Britaine, with a course of continued concourse: and those which erewhile were so wary and wise, waxt forward and bold after the event, and grew to speake bigly: such being the hard condition of Warres, that if ought fall out well, all challenge a part; misfortunes are onely imputed to one. Contrariwise, the Britaines presupposing that not valour, but skill in the Generall by using the occasion, had carried it away, abated no whit their wonted courage, but armed their youth, transported their Children and Wives into places of safety, and sought by Assemblies & religious Rites to establish an association of the Cities together. And so for that yeare both parties did depart, incensed to further preparations.

(7) In the beginning of the next, Agricola sending his Navy before, which by unexpected spoiling in in severall places, should induce a greater and more uncertaine terrour; followed himselfe with his Army by land: having drawne to his party some of the valianteſt Britaines, whom by long experience in peace, he had found moſt faithfull for his Warres: and ſo arrived at the Mount * Grampius, where the Britaines had lodged themſelves before, and as men nothing dejected by the unfortunate chance of the former battaile, had now prepared themſelves, attending only for Revenge or Servitude. And being taught, that common danger muſt be repelled with mutuall Concord, by Leagues and Embaſſages they aſſembled the power of all their Cities together, above thirty thouſand armed men, as by view was taken, beſides an endles number of youth, which thither daily flocked unto them, and many luſty Old men renowned in the former warres, bearing the Badges due to their honour: at what time Galgacus, for vertue and birth, of all the Leaders the Principall man, feeing the multitude hotly demaund the Battell, is faid to have uſed this, or the like ſpeech.

" (8) When I behold this preſent Aſſembly, and " conſider the cauſe of this inſtant neceſſitie, I have " reaſon to preſume, that this day, and this our agree- " ment in conſent, will give a happy beginning to " our freedome, and an end of troubles unto our I- " land. For, we which inhabite theſe furtheſt pro- " montories, know no land beyond us whereunto " we may fly, nor no Seas left us now for faferie, the " Roman Navie thus (as you ſee) ſurveying our " Coaſts: So that Combat and Armes, which men of " valour deſire for honour, the very daſtard for force " muſt now vſe for his ſecurity. Wee that are the " flower of the Britiſh Nobilitie, and are ſeated here " in the uttermoſt part of the Ile, ſaw never yet the " borders of thoſe Countries which ſerved in ſlave- " ry, our eyes being unpolluted and free from all con- " tagion of Tyrannie. But what Nation is there now " beyond us? what elſe ſee we but water and rockes, " and the Romans within, Land-lords of all, nay ra- " ther Robbers of all, both on Land and Sea? Whoſe " intollerable pride by humble ſubjection in vaine " ſhall we ſeeke to avoid. If the Countrey berich, " they ſeeke to winne wealth; if poore, to gaine glo- " ry: but neither Eaſt nor Weſt, can ſatisfie their gree- " dy affection, much leſſe this cold North can ſet an " end to their deſires. To kill, to ſpoile, and take a- " way by force, that falſly they terme Empire and " Government: and when all is made a waſte Wilder- " neſſe, that they call Peace. Moſt deare unto man " are his Children and blood; but thoſe are preſſed " for their warres, and ſerve as their ſlaves, we know " not where; our Goods are their tributes, our Corne " their proviſion; our Wives, Siſters, and Daughters " in Warre violently forced, in Peace under title of " friends and gueſts, ſhamefully abuſed, and our " own Bodies worne & conſumed in paving of Bogs, " and other ſervile drudgeries, with thouſands of " ſtripes, and many indignities more. Slaves which " are borne to bondage are ſold but once, and after " are fed at their owners expences; but Britanie dai- " ly buyeth, daily feedeth, and is at charges with her " owne bondage. We are the laſt to be conquered, " and therefore is our deſtruction moſt ſought, as be- " ing the moſt vile in account: No fields we have to " manure, no Mines to be digged, no Ports to trade " in, and to what purpoſe then ſhould they reſerve " us alive? Beſides, the manhood and fierce cou- " rage of the ſubject, pleaſeth not much the jealous " Soveraigne: and this Corner being ſo ſecret, and out " of the way, the more ſecurity it yeeldeth us, in them " it workes the greater ſuſpition. Then, ſeeing all " hope of favour is paſt, let us take courage to de- " fend and maintaine our owne ſafety as well as our " honour. The *Iceni*ans led by a Woman, fired the " Colony, forced the Caſtles; and if that lucky be- " ginning had not beene ended in a careleſſe ſecurity, " the Southerne Britaines might with eaſe have ſhaken " off the yoake. We as yet never touched, never ſub- " dued, and borne to be free, not ſlaves to the Ro- " mans; we (I ſay) now are to make proofe of our " valour, and to ſhew in this encounter, what men " Caledonia hath reſerved for her ſelfe. And do you " thinke, that the Romans are as valiant in Warre as " they are wanton in Peace? I aſſure you, nothing " leſſe: for not by their Vertues, but by our Iarrings " they are growne into fame: and of the Enemies " faults they make uſe to the glory of their owne Ar- " my, compoſed (we know) moſt of divers Nations; " and therefore as in proſperity they hold not al- " wayes together, ſo doubtleſſe, if fortune turne a- " ſide, their ſervices will appeare: unleſſe you ſup- " poſe the Gaules and Germans, and (to our ſhame be " it ſpoken) many of our owne Nation, (which now " lend their lives to eſtabliſh a forraine Vſurper) bee " led with hearts affection; whereas contrariwiſe it " is apparant, that Terrour and Diſtruſt, (weake wor- " kers to conſerve love) are the onely cauſe; which " once removed, then thoſe that have made an end " to feare, will ſoone begin to hate. All things that " may incite unto victory are for us: the Romans " have no Wives to harten them on, if they faint; no " Parents to upbraid them, if they flie; moſt of them " have no Countrey at all, or if they have, it is by in- " truſion taken from other: A few fearefull perſons " ſtand here before us, trembling and gazing at the " ſtrangeneſſe of the heaven it ſelfe, at the Sea, and at " the Woods, whom the gods have delivered, mew- " ed up and fettered into our hands. Let not their " brave ſhewes of gliſtering Gold or Silver, any way " diſmay you, which of themſelves neither offend " nor defend. And be you well aſſured, amongſt our " enemies wee ſhall finde many on our ſide; The " Britaines will agnize their owne Cauſe; the Gaules " will remember their wonted liberty and former e- " ſtate; And the reſt of the Germans will leave and " forſake them, as of late the Vſipians did. What then " ſhall we feare? The Caſtles are emptie; the Colonies " peopled with aged and impotent perſons; the free " Cities diſcontent, and in factions, whileſt thoſe " which are under, obey with ill will, and they which " doe governe, rule againſt right. Here you ſee be- " fore us is the Generall and the Army; on each ſide " Tributes, Servitudes and other miſeries inſepara- " ble: which whether we ſhall continue for ever, or " caſt off ſubjection as free-borne Britaines, it lyeth " this day in this field and your approved manhoods. " Wherefore I beſeech you in joyning battell, beare " in your minds your worthy Anceſtors, your Selves, " and following Poſterities, which if you faile, ſhall " for ever live in ſubjection and ſlavery.

(9) This ſpeech was ſo vehemently delivered, and ſo cheerefully of them all received, that with Songs and confuſed acclamations (after their accuſtomed faſhion) they cluſtered together on heapes, and ſome of the bold'ſt advanced forward, whilſt Agricola likewiſe was encouraging his men, who ſtraightwayes ran to their weapons, and ruſhed on furiouſly toward the Enemy.

(10) The Britaines were marſhalled in the higher ground, fitly both to the ſhew, and to terrifie: the firſt Batalion ſtanding on the plaine, the reſt on the aſcent of the hill, knit and riſing as it were one over another; the middle of the field was filled with clattering and running of Chariots and horſemen. Agricola ſeeing their number to exceed his, drew his battell in length, and leaving his horſe, advanced himſelfe before the Enſignes on foot.

(11) In the firſt aſſault before the joyning, both ſides encountred, diſcharging off their darts; wherein the

the Britaines, employing both art and valour, with their great ſwords and little Targets, avoided the volue of the Romans, ſhowring down withall great ſtore of theirs upon them, wherewith they were both galled and ſore wounded. Agricola ſeeing his men thus ſtoutly reſiſted, tooke another courſe; for ſpying the advantage, he commanded three [a] Batavian Cohorts, and two of the [b] Tungrians, to preſſe forward, and bring the matter to handy ſtrokes and dint of ſword, a thing which (in reſpect of their long ſervice) they were very expert in, but contrariwiſe to the Britains very prejudicial, by reaſon of their little Bucklers, and huge ſwords, being blunt pointed, and no waies fit for the cloſe in fight. This command advantaged the Romans much; for theſe with the pikes with the Bucklers, when they came to deale blowes, ſo mangled the faces of the Britaines, that they were not able to ſtand before them; and the reſt, gathering courage upon emulation of theſe, aſcended the hill, bearing downe all that was in their way; ſo that many halfe dead and ſome wholy untouched, were over-paſſed and left for haſte of winning the field. In the meane while the Chariots mingled themſelves with the battle of footmen, and the troopes of Horſemen began to flie: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now diſtreſſed themſelves, by the unevenneſſe of the ground, and thicke rankes of the enemy, and were forced to fight ſtanding ſtill, and by the maine weight of Horſes to beare downe one another. The wandring Waggons alſo, and maſterleſſe Horſes, as chance or feare did guide them, over-bare many times their friends, and thwarted their way that met them.

(12) The other Britaines that kept the hill, and had leiſure to behold the manner of fight, began to come downe by little and little, and fought to compaſſe the backe of the enemy, which intent Agricola ſoone prevented, by ſending foure wings of Horſemen retained purpoſely about him for ſudden diſpatches and chances of warre. Theſe ſo fiercely aſſailed them, that a moſt ſharpe and bloody battle enſued, wherein the Britaines on each ſide were beaten downe and ſlaine, notwithſtanding many of them ſhewed both valour and revenge even to the end: the reſt disbanded, turned their backs, and fled toward the deſart: whoſe purſuit was followed untill night and fulneſſe of blood made an end of the chaſe.

(13) Of the Romans ſide were ſlaine (if we muſt credit their owne friends) onely three hundred and fortie perſons, and of them, one of extraordinary note and account, Aulus [a] Articus, Captaine of a Cohort, who upon a youthfull heate, and fierceneſſe of his horſe, was carried amidſt his enemies. Of the Britaines fell ten thouſand, and their deſignes ſo defeated and broken, that as deſperate men, they forſake their houſes, and in deſpight ſet fire on them themſelves: the hurt perſons they carry and draw with them, and call them that art unhurt, hoping to be releeved by them. One while they chuſe out holes to lurke in, for their lives ſafety; eſtſoones in great haſte forſake them, as doubting therein their owne ſecurity. Diſperſed aſſunder, they lament and attend death: aſſembled together, they expoſtulate of their meanes and life: one while conceiving a glimmering of ſome ſmall hope, another while dejected with utter deſpaire: Sometimes at the ſight of their deareſt beloved, mooved to pity, but much oftner ſtirred to rage, for revenge; and many of them, even by way of compaſſion, ſlew their deareſt Wives and Children, to rid them from their future miſeries.

(14) Agricola having made every where a deſolation and ſilence, withdrew his Army towards the * Horreſtians, where taking hoſtages for their fidelity, ſent the Admirall of his Navy to ſaile about the North Coaſts of Britaine, who with ſtrength and ſtore tooke the Seas; their terrour gone already before, himſelfe with eaſe and gentle journies diſpoſed his foot and horſemen in their Wintring places, and planted Garriſons upon the Borders betweene Glota and Bodotria. And his Navy with proſperous winde and ſucceſſe arrived at the port * Trutulenſis.

(15) Thus, after many conflicts, about the ſpace of one hundred thirty ſixe yeeres from Iulius Caſars firſt entrance, the utmoſt limits of Britanny, and the Iles of the Orcades lying on the North ſide of it, were by the valour and induſtry of Iulius Agricola firſt diſcovered, and made knowne unto the Romans: and the South part of the Ile, in the fourth yeare of the raigne of Domitian, (being the yeare of our Saviour eighty ſixe) reduced into a ſubject: d Province, the government whereof was ever annexed and appropriate to the Romane Emperours themſelves, and not at the diſpoſition of the Senate, as other provinces were.

(16) This State affaires in Britanny, Agricola ſignified by letter, without any amplifying termes to Domitian the Emperour, who (after his manner) with a cheerefull countenance and grieved heart, received the Newes, being inwardly pricked with feare and diſdaine, that his late counterfet Triumph of Germany (wherein certaine flaves bought for money, were attired, and their haire dreſſed as Captives of that Country) was had in deriſion, and juſtly ſcorned abroad; whereas now a true and imperiall victory of ſo many thouſand enemies ſubdued and ſlaine, was currant and famous in every mans mouth: as being indeed a thing dangerous, that a private mans name ſhould be exalted above his Prince. In vaine then had hee ſuppreſſed the ſtudy of Oratory, and other worthy politicke Artes, thereby to keepe downe other mens reputation, if he ſhould in Military glory be diſſeiſed by another. And to be a good Commander of an Army, was to be above a private eſtate, that being a Vertue peculiar for a Prince, and therefore not lightly to bee paſſed over. With theſe and the like incentives his minde was tormented; yet thought hee it beſt to diſſemble his malice, untill the heat of his glory, and love of his Souldiers were ſomewhat abated. And forthwith hee commanded for Agricola, Triumphall ornaments, ſtatue, honours, and what elſe uſually conferred in lieu of Triumph; hee yet remaining in charge, from whence, with the like policy alſo, hee was ſhortly diſplaced. For Syria, by the death of Atilius Rufus, lay deſtitute of a Lieutenant; and that place reſerved for men of great quality, Domitian gave forth, was purpoſed for Agricola, and ſent him both his Patent, and Succeſſor into Britaine; who thereupon delivered up the Province in a peaceable eſtate unto Saluſtius Luculus, and returned to Rome.

(17) Where the life of Domitian was now growne unmeaſurable vaine. The ſurname Germanicus he aſſumed to himſelfe, for ſome ſmall ſervice therein done. The Moneths September and October hee changed into the names of Germanicus and Domitianus, becauſe that in the one he entred his Empire, and in the other was borne. He cauſed his Statue to be made in gold, and commanded, himſelfe to bee called God. His cruelty every way matchable to his pride. The Senators and Nobles upon ſmall furmiſes hee murdered: many new tortures hee invented: Confiſcations and Baniſhments, were favours, not puniſhments. Amongſt all which, the Chriſtians bare a part, whoſe Second Perſecution this Tyrant raiſed and began. The great Evangeliſt Iohn hee baniſhed into the Ile of Patmos, where hee received his Revelations from Ieſus Chriſt, appearing unto him in no leſſe Majeſty then Daniel before time had ſeene him in his viſions, and both (after a ſort) in one and the ſame manner: their Viſions alike, and almoſt to the like end: For as Daniel ſaw a Lion, Beare, Leopard, and Monſter with Ten hornes perſecute the Iewes Gods people, and to fall before the Stone cut without hands, which brake into powder the Image of their Tyrannicall Government, to give place to the peaceable Birth and Kingdome of Chriſt; ſo Iohn ſaw one Beaſt compacted of theſe foure, mouthed like a Lion, footed like a Beare, ſpotted as the Leopard, and horned for number and power with the Monſter, retaining their Tyranny in raiſing Perſecutions in the Church of Chriſt, and clouding with Idolatry

Nerva Emp.

HItherto have wee purſued the ſucceſſion in the Britiſh monarchy, together with the Invaſions, attempts, and ſucceſſe of affaires for the Conqueſt of this Iland, under the firſt twelve Emperours of Rome: and that from ſuch writers, who though they were moſt favourable Regiſters of things done by the Romans, yet had they beſt meanes to know, and publiſh their Hiſtories with warrantize of truth. But after the death of Domitian, dyed many Records, and the Provinces proceedings (eſpecially thoſe that moſt concerne Britaine) left uncertaine; and therefore are neither with the like largeneſſe proſcuted, nor with the like authority avouched. And were it not that theſe Roman Emperours ſucceeding, did onely continue the ſucceſſion of our Britiſh Monarches, many of them might be quite omitted; as neither themſelves, nor deputies, allies, or enemies once ſpoken of concerning our affaires; and the Government of this Province, during thoſe times, ſo maimed and defective (in reſpect of any warrantable relations) that hardly a method can be obſerved to the fitting of a continuall Hiſtory. Yet as we finde it, let us have liberty to deliver it, and rather to expoſe Truth in the meane attire that time hath left her, then by diſguiſing her in richer roabes to abuſe the World, and make her ſeeme nought elſe but a counterfeit, as Plutarch in the life of Pericles hath complained.

(3) What Lieutenants under him were in Britaine, or under his Succeſſor Trajan, I find not in Record: but our Engliſh Writers from the Arch-Deacon of Monmouth, bring a ſucceſſion of Britiſh Kings, and amongſt them Marius, who conquered Rodoricke, King of the Picts accompanied with the Scots, whoſe Trophie erected neere unto Carleill, remained a long time after, bearing the inſcription of his victory: and after him his ſonne Coilus brought up in Rome all the time of his youth, retained their favours, and payde them tribute without conſtraint. Albeit by Iuvenal, it ſeemeth that Arviragus the father of Marius, a great reſiſter of the Romans, lived in the raigne of Domitian, as hath beene touched, unleſſe you will ſay, that Mauriqus and Arviragus was the ſame Marius, as a worthy Antiquary affirmeth. But through theſe uncertaineties and diſagreements occaſioned by the ſilence of better Authors, our Hiſtories reſt doubtfull, and ſo muſt we leave them, returning to finiſh up briefely the Raigne and Life of this good Emperour Nerva.

Trajan Emp.

An. Dom. 99.

VNTO Nerva ſucceeded Vulpius Trajan in the Romane Empire; borne neere unto Sivill in the Territories of Spaine: of a noble family, but was much more ennobled in himſelfe for his princely endowments, wch moved Nerva in his life time to adopt him into ſo high a calling, and the whole Senate after his death joyfully to confirme his Election, and ſo often to honour him with the title of the Moſt Excellent Prince in publike dedications, as on the Coyne above.

(2) Hee raiſed the Roman Empire unto the very higheſt pitch of glory, and ſpread the power of their Command into the largeſt circuit that ever before or ſince had or hath beene poſſeſſed. For the Kingdome of Dacia he ſubdued; Armenia, Parthia, and Meſopotamia made ſubject; Aſſyria, Perſia, and Babylon conquered; paſſed Tigris, and ſtretched the confines of the Roman Empire, unto the remoteſt dominions of the Indies which never before that time had heard of the Roman Name. And indeed, if we looke upon his politicke managing of the government, he may ſeeme (in compariſon of others) a right worthy, memorable and lovely Prince, of much affability, and Familiarity even with his inferiours, and of ſuch carriage towards his Subjects, as he himſelf would wiſh his Prince (he ſaid) to uſe towards him, if he were a Subject. A great obſerver alſo of Iuſtice, inſomuch that when he inveſted any Pretor, in giving him the Sword, he commanded him to uſe the ſame even againſt his owne perſon, if he violated Law or Equity. (6) How silent soever writers have beene for this Emperours affaires in this our Iland, yet it is to bee thought that unto this, as well as unto other Provinces both Propretors, Lieutenants, Presidents, Prætors, and Proconsuls were sent, and every City to have their municipall Magistrates. The Prætor that yeerely proclaimed solemne Sessions, wherein himselfe sate aloft upon a high tribunall seate, and guarded with his lictors about him in great estate, did execute his authority throughout his owne jurisdiction, and determined all causes brought before him, where rods and axes were prepared for the common people, that were enforced to receive a new Ruler every yeere. And surely as this yoke of bondage was grievously borne of every Province, upon whose necke, it was impoſed and laid: So the Britaines underwent the weight of that subjection with such unwillingnesse, that in the time of this Trajan, they revolted and rebelled, though presently surprized, as it is evident out of Spartianus.

(7) The care that this good Emperour had for the weale of his Subjects is projected by his providence in making wayes passageable from place to place, whereof remaine many testimonies by those his Causeys drawne with wonderfull diligence, even thorow the whole Iland; which now, though dismembred and cut in peeces by the Countrey people, where thorow they passed, yet doe many remnants thereof remaine, especially in pastures, or by-grounds out of the rode way, with bankes so high, that evidently they shew themselves. Of these Causeys Galen writeth as followeth: The Wayes (saith he) Trajan repaired by paving with stone, or raising with banks cast up such peeces of them as were moyst and myrie: by flocking up and ridding such as were rough and overgrowne with bushes and bryers: by making bridges over Rivers that could not be waded thorow: where the way seemed longer then needed, by cutting out another shorter: if any where by reason of some steepe hill, the passage were hard and uneasie, by turning it aside thorow easier places: now in case it was haunted with wild beasts, or lay waste and desert, by drawing it thence thorow places inhabited, and withall laying levell all uneven and rugged grounds.

Along these Causeys the Emperour caused to bee set little Pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters cut in them, to signifie how many miles was from place to place. Of these Sidonius Apollinaris writeth thus:

Antiqua tibi nec teratur agger;
Cujus per spatium fatis vetustis
Nomen Cæsareum viret columnis.

Breake not the ancient Causeys strong,

(2) A great Mathematician he was, skilfull in Arithmeticke, Geometry, Astronomy, and Iudicious Astrology; learned in the Greeke, and Latine Tongues; in which languages hee wrote both Poesie and Prose: well seene in Physicke, and knew the Vertues of Hearbes, Rootes, and Stones: a singular Musitian both for Theory and Practice; and could both limme and carve with approbation of the skilfull: but above all, is the admirable report of his Memory, who never forgot any thing that he either read or heard.

Spartianus. Hadrianus of an admirable memory.

(3) His first businesse for the Empire, was rather a care to hold securely what was gotten, then by enlarging the bounds to endanger the reſt: and therefore lessening the compasse, and bettering the strength he planted his forces along the River Euphrates, and affigned that for the Eastern limits, leaving out India, Armenia, Media, Assyria, Persia, and Mesopotamia, as Countries too remote for the Romans to hold to their profit. By which his doings other Provinces tooke occasion to revolt, thirsting after Liberty, and among others the Britaines (as ever most impatient of Servitude) attempted alterations, whose Lieutenant Cneus Trebellius (Succeſſour to Iulius Agricola) could not so governe his Souldiers which were growne out of discipline, and by long reſt farre out of Order, but that they fell at variance among themselves, and disquieted the most peaceable of the Britaines by their licentious manners.

Britaines attempt alteration. Helinshed. lib. 4. cap. 20. Cneus Trebellius. Lieutenant of the Britaines.

(4) The Northerne Inhabitans, that were more at liberty, and imboldned by their Bogs and Rockes unacceſſable, set themselves to withstand their wrõgs, to whom also many others joyned their affections and forces, whereupon some bickering insued with losse and blood; to represſe which Iulius Severus was sent by Hadrian: but ere hee could settle the Commotion, was againe recalled and imployed in Syria, to suppresse the Iewish rebellion.

Iulius Severus sent to suppresse the Commotions of the Britaines.

(5) These stirres here still continuing, the Emperour tooke it to be of such importance, that he resolved in Person to addresse for Britaine, which he performed in his third Consulship; the yeare of Christ one Hadrian withdrawes into Britaine to suppresse rebellion.

One hundred twentie foure, attended on by three Legions: of which, his Army for this exploit was then composed, as appeareth by his money in the entrance of his life, fixed in memory of this undertaking: With these hee encountred the Northerne Riders, recovered such Holds as they had taken, and forced them into the Woods and Mountaines, whither the Romane Horsemen without danger could not pursue them. But perceiving the Aire too sharpe for the Romanes constitution, and the Soile rough and of lesse profit then the reſt, hee made a Fortification or strong Wall of Earth, which (as Lampridius saith) did continue on the West from Ituna, (that is, the River Eden in Cumberland neere Carleil) unto the River Tina, or Tine at Newcastle in Northumberland, in the East; and was no lesse then Eighty miles in length. This Wall (saith he) was made of stakes driven deepe into the ground, and bound together in the manner of an hedge; and with Turfe and Earth intermured as a Rampire or Bulwarke, to defend the Incursions of the wilder Britaines and ill Neighbours, that daily molested the peace of the Romanes. Hadrian his worke finished, and the Province reduced to the obedience of the fatall Governesse Rome, at whose feet hee laid againe the name of Britaine, (as appeareth in the first Reverse of his Coine, placed in the fronture of this Chapter) triumphantly returned to Rome, and for his honourable adventure and Expedition had his name inscribed upon his Coine with this addition: THE RESTORER OF BRITANNIE.

(6) Neither after this seemed the Southerne Britaines greatly to contend, but patiently bore the yoke of subjection, which Time and Custome had made lesse painfull, the rather for that they saw themselves to stand in need of the Romanes helpe against the inroads of their owne Countrimen, whose cruelties was now as much feared, as in former times the Invasion of Strangers: whereupon they conformed themselves more willingly to the Romane Lawes, both in Martiall and Civill affaires: which were then principally directed by Licinius Priscus, who had beene not long before imployed by Hadrian in the service of Iewry, and was at this present Lieutenant of Britaine.

(7) This Iewish warre hapned in the eighteenth yeere of the Raigne of Hadrian, who suddenly affailed and slew where they came, both Romanes and Christians: for revenge whereof, besides an infinite number of them slaine and tortured, their Citie Ierusalem was also raced even to the ground, and another built, but not altogether in the same place, and the name thereof changed to AELIA: the Iewes utterly banished thence, and (as Aristion Pellæus writeth) not lawfull for them to looke towards that Citie nor Soile, no not through the Chink or Crevice of a dore: And upon the Gate that leadeth towards Beth-lehem, hee caused a Swine to be ingraven; a Beast by their Law accounted most uncleane, and by them abominable.

(8) But as this Emperour was exasperated against the Iewes, so was he gracious and favourable to the Christians, and the rather at the request of Quadratus, a Disciple (as is supposed) of the Apostles, who wrote unto him concerning them; and of Aristides a learned Philosopher of Athens, who made an Apologie for their defence; so that the Persecution then in practice was forbidden by Hadrian in a publike Edict; who (as Lampridius writeth) was minded to have built a Temple to the service of Christ, had not some diſſwaded him therefrom. In extremity of sickneſſe he designed Cæsar, Lucius Ælius, whose Coine we have hereunder expressed: A man deare to his Emperour, if we consider at how great a rate he bought for him the acceptation of the Commons and Military men: And how short a time the blaze of that Honour continued: for he died so soone, that Hadrian himselfe had wont to say, Lampridius tutes Senpti.

Ostendent terris hunc tantum fata, nec ultra
Esse finent. ——

(9) When hee had raigned in great honour and love the space of one and twenty yeers, five moneths, and fifteene daies, he died, the eighth or tenth of July, of a dropsie: which maladie so tormented him, that willingly he refuſed all sustenance, and languished away through faintneſſe. Hee was of perſonage tall, and very strong, of a good complexion and amiable countenance, wearing the haire of his head and beard long, and died aged sixtie two, the yeere of our Lord God, One hundred thirtie nine.

ANTONINVS PIVS.

Chapter XVIII.

Antoninus Pius Emp.

Lollius Vrbicus Lieut.

An. Dom. 139.

NExt unto whom succeeded Antoninus, (for his many vertues) surnamed the Pious: and by the Senate, Father of his Country. This man did not onely equall his Adopter and Predecessours, in wisedome and other princely qualities, but was also compared, for his peace and policie, unto Numa Pompilius the second King of Rome, who for his renowned government, is so famously in their Histories recorded. His birth was in Lombardy, the son of Aurelius Fulvius, and Nephew to Titus Aurelius Fulvius, that had beene Consul, and held other Offices of dignitie and State. The whole time of whose Raigne was so spent in peace, that small remembrances remaine of any martiall affaires: yet such as we finde in Britannie we will deliver.

Antoninus raigned in peace.

(2) At his first entrance into the Empire, about the yeere of Christ, One hundred thirtie nine (as appeareth by the money minted in memory of the reduction of Britaine) the Northerne Britaines in that part of this Ile began to stirre, and made inroads into the Province, notwithstanding the Rampire or Wall that Adrian had made. Against whom Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant heere under Antoninus, brought his power, and with some skirmishes put them backe: taking from the Brigantes part of their Land, as a Mulct, for the waste they had done to the Genouniani, a Province adjoyning unto the Brigantes, whose people had put themselves under the Emperours protection. Which done, he repaired the Wall with stronger Fortifications; or (which is more probable) raised up another not farre from the same, to double the defence: for (saith Iulius Capitolinus) Lollius the Legate to Antoninus, overcomming the Britaines, built another turfe Wall to divide the Province, and to appeach the incursions of the barbarous. Notwithstanding the honour of this service (as is testified by the ancient Panegyricke) was (by one Fronto) attributed wholly to Antoninus the Emperour himselfe: who, although absent, and in his Palace at Rome, yet sitting as it were at the Helme of a Ship, did command and direct the enterprise, and therefore had right to the glory thereof. This Wall also (as Clarencieux conjectureth, having scene it so tracted in an ancient Chorographicall Chart) was drawn from the River Tine unto Carleil: but Time and Warre have worne it now away.

(3) In the meane while a new insurrection was kindled among the [a] Brigantes, that annoyed some of the Romane Confederates. But by the discretion of the Generall, it was quenched before it came to flame: for upon the first rumour of the Revolt, Lollius marched thither with part of his Armie, commanding Seius Saturninus, Admirall of the British Fleet, to waffe upon the North of the Iland, both to defend the Coast from danger, and also upon occasions to further the Land-service, if need were: by which meanes, the Brigantes were easily reduced to obedience, even by the presence onely of the Lieutenant, who for his good service done in Britaine, during the short time of his imploiment there, obtained the surname Britannicus. This may, by the first figure in the face of this Chapter (being in the third Consulship of this Emperour) be conjectured to have hapned in the yeere of Christ one hundred fortie one; and by inscription of the last Coine in that ranke, it is manifest that there was some other expedition against Britaine the yeere following.

(4) I cannot omit, though not directly pertinent to our purpose, the care that this good Emperour generally had for the distressed and persecuted Christians (who, no doubt by his bounty, enjoyed much tranquillity heere in Britaine also) in whose defence he wrote to his Deputies in Asia, and published an Edict against their Accusers, the effect whereof (from Eusebius) is this:

Antoninus Pius a great defender of the Christians.

The Edict of Antoninus for protection of the Christians.

"(5) The Emperour Cæsar Marcus Aurelius "Antoninus Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, "fifteene times Tribune, thrice Consul, unto the Com- "mons of Asia sendeth greeting. I doubt not but the "Gods themselves have a care that wicked persons "shall be brought to light: for it much more doth "appertaine unto them, then it doth unto you, to "punish such as refuse to yeeld them worship. But "this course which you take, doth confirme them "whom you persecute, in this their opinion of you, "that you are impious men, and meere Atheists "whereby it commeth to passe, that they desire in "the quarrell of their God rather to die, then to yeeld "to the wils of such as you are, and to embrace your "forme of Religion. Let it not seeme unseasonable to "call to your remembrance the Earth-quakes, which "lately happened, and which yet are to your great "terrour and griefe; because I understand that in "such like accidents you cast the envy of such com-"mon misfortunes upon their shoulders, whereby "their confidence and trust in their God is much the "more increased whereas you being still ignorant of "the true causes of such things, doe both neglect the "worship of the other Gods, and also banish and per-"secute the service of the Immortall God, whom the "Christians doe worship; and you persecute to the "death all the embracers of that Profession. In the "behalfe of those men many of the Provinciall Presi- "dents have written before unto our Father of famous "memory: to whom he answered, that they should not "be molested, unlesse they were prooved to have "practised Treason against the Emperiall State: and "touching the same matter some have given notice "unto "unto me; to whom I have answered with like mo-"deration as my Father did before. And by this "our Edict doe we ordaine, that if any hereafter bee "found thus busie in molesting these kinde of men "without any their offence, wee command that hee "that is accused upon this point, be absolved, albeit "he be prooved to be such a man as he is charged to "be, that is, a Christian: and hee that is his Accuser "shall suffer the same punishment, which hee sought "to procure upon the other.

Iulius Capitoll.

Antoninus person and vertues.

This Edict was promulged at Ephesus in the Generall Councell of all Asia: so favourable was this good Emperour to the true Professours, and (indeed) to all sorts of men, having that Apothegme of Scipio Africanus rise in his mouth: That he had rather save one Subjects life, then kill a thousand Enemies.

(6) He was of Stature tall, of a seemly presence, in countenance Majesticall, in manners milde, of a singular wit, very learned and eloquent, a great lover of Husbandry, peaceable, mercifull and bounteous; in the last of which vertues, he so much exceeded, that therby he set going wholly his own private estate and demaines, whereat when his Empresse much repined, he told her, that when hee undertooke the Title and State of an Emperour, he then did forgoe the interest and proprieties of a private Person: meaning that a Prince is not much to respect his private wealth, so as the publike wealth and welfare of the State may bee advanced. In fine, this large Eulogie and praise is fastened on him, that neither in his youth he did any thing rashly, nor in his age any thing negligently: In which honourable course, having raigned twentie and two yeares, (some say twentie three) seven moneths, and twentie sixe daies, he died of a fever at Lorium the seventh of March, the yeere of his life seventie five, and of Christ one hundred sixtie two.

MARCVS AVRELIVS.

Chapter XIX.

Marcus Aurelius Emp.

Calphurnius Agric. Lieut.

An. Dom. 162.

FRom the vertuous example of the good Emperour Pius, proceedeth a branch of no lesse towardlinesse and fruitfulnesse, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, Verus, Philosophus, (for by so many honourable names is he remembred:) and although hee sprung not from Pius, as from his native roote, yet was he his adopted Sonne, and grafted into his Stocke and alliance by the Marriage of his daughter Faustina: Hee was the Sonne of Elius Verus who died Prator, and whose Pedegree is brought from Numa Pompilius, the second King of Rome; and his Mother was Domitia Camilla, daughter of Claudius Tullus.

Iulius Capitoll. Lucius Verus chosen Cæsar.

(2) This man chose to him for his Associate in the Empire, Lucius Verus, the sonne of Lucius Ceionius Commodus, whom Pius had adopted (but died before him,) and therefore this Verus was respectively commended unto Aurelius; betwixt whose natures and conditions was as much oddes, as betwixt Day and Night; The one very moderate, loving, and industrious; the other proud, careless and cruell: the fruits whereof, the poore Christians felt, whose chiefest pillars, Polycarpus, Bishop of Smyrna, and Iustinus Martyr, an excellent Philosopher, with infinite more, were put to most cruell deaths; and by him the fourth persecution of Gods Saints was begun: whose licentious and bloody life, lasting in authority the space of nine yeares, was cut off by an Apoplexy in the presence of Aurelius being then in expedition towards Germany, whose Coyne wee have here expressed as wee find it minted with his face and reverse.

(3) Aurelius the Emperour following the warres against those, who there revolted, was inclosed about with his enemies, called the Quadi, and suffered great mortality both by Pestilence, and much more by want of Water, whereby himselfe and Host were almost consumed: At which time many Christian Souldiers being in his Campe, and commanded (as Ionas was) to call upon their God; they fell prostrate on the ground in prayers, and obtained of him so plentcous a shower of raine, as therewith after five dayes extreameth drouth and thirst, the whole Army was refreshed, and the Quadi contrariwise by Thunder and Lightning were quite dispersed and overthrowne.

Aurel. us obtaineth raine by the Christians prayer. Eutropius. Euseb. lib. 5. c. 5. Acts and Monuments.

(4) This wonder (saith Eusebius) is reported even by those Historians, who favoured not Christianity: and the prudent Epistle of the Emperour himselfe, (which hee wrote to the Senate for confirmation of this miracle, yet extant) doth warrant the same: whereupon he both mitigated the rage against Christs Professours, and (by testimony of Apollinaris) named that Legion of the Christians, for an everlasting remembrance, The Lightning Legion.

Capitolinus. P. Orosius. Tertullian.

(5) In his Raigne Calphurnius Agricola was sent Lieutenant into Britaine, where the inhabitants sought some alterations of the State, fore repining at the oppressions of the Romanes. But the surname Agricola reviving the remembrances of their former overthrowes, so daunted their Courages, that at the presence of the Generall, who came amongst them to prevent all occasions, they gave over their intended enterprise: for which, and for many other his policies there there used, hee worthily deserved great commendations, but (for the most part) the glory of all such services was attributed to the Emperours themselves; and the paines in attempting, and perils in obtaining, did commonly breed nothing but disgrace and envy after victory, to those by whom it was atchieved. Yet besides the stories, the memory of his being heere Lieutenant, is delivered to posterity, by this inscription, once erected in the Picts Wall, an Altar to the Goddesse Suria, and now preserved by Sr. Robert Cotton of Connington, Knight Barronet, amongst other Monuments of like quality.

So also Lucius Verus, (whom this excellent Emperour had in the yeere 162. as appeareth by his Coyne of Concord, set in the entrance of his life, erected his Colledge in the Empire) who to supply the defect of merit in himselfe, tooke from the Conquest of Avidius Cassius, and other his Captaines in Armenia, Parthia and Media, the Trophies of their victories, with which he filled up his Title, and adorned his money, expressed in the beginning of this Chapter.

(6) About these times, albeit other things went not so happily with Britaine, as might have beene wished, yet one felicity then befell her, which did both countervaile her owne calamities; and overpoize the good fortunes of all other Nations: and that was the blessed rest of the Gospell of peace in this warring and unpeaceable Kingdome, a great part thereof being governed at that time by King Lucius, surnamed Lever-Maur. For that was the policy and ancient custome of the Romans (as Tacitus saith) to use even Kings themselves for their instruments, to bring the people into bondage. And Antoninus Pius among warre, permitted Kingdomes to be governed by their owne Kings, and Provinces by their owne Comites (as saith Capitolinus.) This King disliking the Paganisme and Idolatry of his people, (though, as wee have shewed, among many of them the truth of Christs Doctrine was both taught and embraced, even from the first planting thereof) and being incited both by the exemplary life and piety of the Christians, and also by the manifest miracles wrought amongst them, and encouraged moreover by the favourable Edicts of the Emperours in their behalfe, and by the good affections and forwardnesse of their Deputies heere, Trebellius and Pertinax; he gave leave to their Religion by publike warrant, and was the first Christian King in the world, and Britaine the first province that embraced the Gospell by publike authority, as Sabellicus saith.

(7) This Lucius (as before wee have touched) to be better furnished with Christian Lawes for himself and subjects, Missa legatione ab Imperatore Romanorum & à Papa Romano Eleutherio, (as Nennius saith) for in this purer age the Church was so humble, to vaile (as farre as might be) her actions to the Imperiall licence, sent two learned Clerkes, whose names were Eluanus and Medwinus, skilfull in the Scriptures, to Eleutherius Bishop of Rome: whose Reply to his most godly Demand (because the favourers of the Papall authority either doe doubt it, or altogether deny it) I have thought good heere verbatim to insert, as my selfe have found it, in a most ancient Manuscript, amongst the authenticke Records and Constitutions of the City of London.

(9) The date of this Epistle (as by some other Copies it appeareth) being the yeere of the second Consulship of Commodus and Vespronius, may give great light and satisfaction to such as are curious to know the truth, and to reconcile the differences of our Historians, touching the time: That Consulship being about the yeare of Christ one hundred and eighie: which was at the beginning (if not a little before) of Commodus his raigne, and therefore whereas some refer it to the one hundred sixty & nineth yere after Crists Passion, it is apparant to be the only error of transcribers, who so writ in stead of one hundred seventie and nine after his birth; which was anno currente, the very time of Commodus being Consul the second time: and on this yeere agree both forrain and domesticke writers of this matter. And albeit the very texture of this Epistle carrieth with it the true Character of Antiquitie, yet because our worthy writers, mentioning this Epistle, are charged of flat forgery (by such who challenge to be Masters in all ancient knowledge) we will adde somewhat, to wash off those false aspersions, both from the Record, and from the mentioners thereof.

Their first exception is, that the Latine Copy would doubtlesse have beene produced by them, if it had not been counterfait. Whereto what need we answer, sith now we have produced it, and can produce as many, as there are Copies of King William the Conquerours Lawes, wherein it is expressly repeated. The next is, that the English translatio of it is differ each from others. A reason more childish then the former, sith every man hath a severall conceit of that hee transllateth, and sometimes the very Originals, (by transcribers ignorance or omission) cause variety of translation, as may appeare in the varie lectiones of this Copy prefixed. The last, but most saucy and ignorant exception is, that the places of Scriptures mentioned in the Letter, are so satisfily and senselesly applied, as is unworthy to be fathered on the learned Eleutherius. Let us therefore in a word, bring the divinity of this Grand-censurer to the touchstone: For Eleutherius proveth, first, that Kings are Gods Vicars in their kingdome, because the whole earth is properly Gods, and therefore Kings have it not as their owne, but as his Lieutenants: next that as David typically, and Christ implyedly, was by God anointed King, for the execution of Righteousnesse and Justice, so every godly King ought to make that the only end of his high honour, that being by God advanced he might likewise advance Righteousnes, Justice, & the seruice of God whose vassall he is: and that therefore Gods judgements and Lawes are to be preferred by them, before all humane Lawes: with which they should rule & cherish their godly subjects as their children: and protect them, and gather them under one faith as Christ (their master) doth, who therefore compareth himselfe, to a Hen gathering her Chickens under her wings.

Parsons ibid.

The defects of which Princely duties Eleutherius most lively expresseth afterward, in so proper applications, as if the learnedst fathers on these places be duely examined, they wil be found no whit to exceed the apprehensions of this Godly Bishop. But if Robert Cowbucke, would have cast his eye on the moderne Popes, and their Cardinals applications of Scriptures, what would he thē say: God made a greater light and a lesse: therefore the Pope is as much greater then the Emperour, as the Suane is bigger then the Moone. Christ said to Peter, Kill and eate: therefore the Pope may excommunicate and depose Kings (yea and Kill them too for a need.) Peter said, Behold two swords; therefore the Pope hath both temporall and Spirituall iurisdiction over the world. So God said to Jeremy, he should plant and transplant: therefore the Pope may dispose and transpose all Kingdomes at his pleasure. Christ to Peter, thou art Cephas, and Cephas is a head; therefore the Pope is head of the Church. Domini sunt Cardines Terræ. The earth is the Lords: therefore the Cardinals are the Lords of the Earth. On such pillers and applications of Scriptures, is the whole Papal greatnesse founded, and yet those late Scribes can scoffingly cavill at the godly applications of ancient Eleutherius. But to our purpoie.

Cephas is a stone but all serves their turne.

(10) This Epistle with two other Preachers, Faganus and Daminius, sent unto King Lucius, did not a little encourage him in this godly purpose, in so much that receiving Baptisme, the Temples of the Heathenish Flamins and Arch-Flamins even thirty one in number, were converted into so many Christian Bishops Sees, whereof London, Yorke, and Carlein, now Saint Davids, were made the Metropolitants of the province.

(11) A table remaining in the Parish Church of Saint Peter in Cornhill London, recordeth that the foundation thereof was by this King Lucius, and that Church to have beene the Cathedrall to that Arch-Bishops See. There be that ascribe the foundation of Saint Peters Church at Westminster unto him; unlesse the places are mistaken. Others affirme that this King Lucius likewise built a Church within Dover Castle, to the fervice of Christ, endowing it with the Toll or customes of that Haven. Differences there are about the time of his Raigne, but none at all for his conversion and establishing of the Christian Faith. As for those who would have this Lucius after his Baptisme to faile into Gallia and other forren parts, where subduing many Pagans, hee became the Apostle to the Bavarians, and that his sister Emerita fifteene yeeres after was martyred in the Citie Augusta: I find therefore no warrant in any sufficient writer; but in this all others agree, that he raigned twelve yeeres, and lyeth buried in Glouceiter.

LIVIVS AELIVS AVRELIVS COMMODVS ANTONINVS.

Chapter XXI.

An. Dom. 181.

THE prudent life, and love conceived of so good a Father, gave hopefull signes and joyfull entrance unto the raigne of young Cõmodus, his soone degenerating sonne; who had nothing from him but Nature, and that also much suspected: The knowne Adulteries of Faustina, his Mother, strongly confirming the opinion of Bastardy.

Entropius.

Commodus his qualities.

(2) At nineteene yeares of age, he was invested Emperor, his raigne not long, but life as loose and impious as the worst: in sottish pride equalling Caligula, for intemperance another Vitellius, and in cruelty a second Domitian. Three hundred Concubines continually he kept, and upon one of them, named Martia, so doted, that he wore her painted Picture upon the outside of his garment; and instilling his money Herculi Commodiano, or Romano, which was stamped about the yeare 193. Sometimes (Hercules-like) would he shew himselfe roabed in a Lions skinne, bearing a Club in his hand instead of a Scepter: other whiles wantonly clad in the habit of an Amazon woman, alwayes costly, but seldome civill.

Cassiodor.

Commodus altered the Months.

(3) The Month August, hee named Commodus, September, Herculeus, and December, Amazonius, according to his own and his Concubines names. Commendable in nothing but for his skill in darting; and for some small breathing of the persecuted Christians; which came not of himselfe, but (as Xiphilinus writeth) by the Mediation of Martia his beloved Concubine, who was found very favourable to their doctrine: But the outragious wickednesse of his life made him so hatefull to all, as that his death was often plotted; and once by some of the Nobleſt, with whom Lucilla his owne Sister conspired; for which fact he put her, with the rest of the conspirators, to death. The Empire and all things else hee weilded at the discretion of others; attending onely his voluptuous pleasures, howsoever the State or Provinces fared under him.

Eutrop. lib. 8. cap. 19. Aelius and Monuments.

(4) In Britanny the Northern Borderers brake thorow the Wall, and finding the Frontiers but weakly guarded, entred the Province, where suddenly they surprized the Roman Generall; & killing many of the Souldiers, ranged the Countrey, wasting (without resistance) all where they went. Commodus at Rome, hearing these stirres in Britaine, rouzed up his spirits, and sent one Vlpius Marcellus to stay their fury; who with great difficulty forced them backe beyond the Wall: and seeing the careleſſe service of the Souldiers, revived against the ancient disciplineof Warre, that by long ease had beene left off by the Romans. The repressing of this incursion (as it seemeth by some revolt of the Province) was about the yere of Christ, one hundred eighty six, as appeareth by the monies of this Emperor set in the entrance of his life, at which time in memory of some worthy expedition and victory against the Britaines, he stamped them.

Vlpius Marcellus sent Lieutenant into Britaine.

(5) This Lieutenant Marcellus, is reported to be of a marvellous great temperance and strange diet; for all the time of his abode here he would eate no Bread, but such as was baked in Rome, neither slept he more then would maintaine Nature, whereby both his private businesse and projects for publike services were commonly dispatched by night. Severe he was in the execution of his place, not led by favour of the person, nor staid from justice by corrupted bribes, esteeming money onely for necessity, and riches no further then made for further good: But those his vertues, though now with us they get him honour, yet then did purchase him envie with the Emperour. Who lived (saith Lampridius) for his subjects mischiefe, and his owne shame: For Commodus hearing Marcellus daily commended, construed his praise to be his owne reproach; and doubting left he should grow too high, thought good to crop him off betimes, and so sent him letters of discharge.

Lamprid.

(6) The Army then feeling the raines loose, that ere-whiles had beene borne with a stiffer hand, fell straight to a disordered mutiny, and therein proceeded with such boldnesse as they openly refused any longer to acknowledge Commodus for their Soveraigne: At which time Perennius was a chiefe Agent and so ruled all in Rome for the Emperor, as that he entertained a hope to be himselfe (in time) an absolute and sole-ruling Emperor; and having now fit occasion offered to spread his power further, he took upon him to redresse these disorders (whilst Commodus wallowed in his lascivious idlenesse) and displacing some worthy Captaines at his owne pleasure, sent other persons of meane respect or parts, to command those Legions in Britaine, that formerly had beene led by Noble Senators and men of consular dignity; whereby greater mischiefe began to accrew and civill dissensions daily to burst forth; the Army scorning their upstart upstart Commanders: and the Captaines insulting over the Souldiers, (of all sides) the Aides so disquieted, that had the Britaines followed the advantage, the whole Province at that time had beene in hazard to be lost: upon which distractions no lesse then fifteene hundred Souldiers at once went out of the Land to Rome to complaine of their wrongs unto Commodus: where charging Perennius to be the stirrer of these troubles, with an intent thereby to raise himself or his sonne to the Emperiall Majesty (a string that cannot be touched without sound in a Soveraignes eare) they were so farre heard and beleeved that Perennius was to them delivered to be put to death, which accordingly they accomplished with all extremitie.

Out of a coyne of this Emperours instiling him Brit in the 8. yeere of his Tribuneship and 4. of his Consulship.

(7) Then was sent for Lieutenant into Britaine Helvius Pertinax, a man of low birth, but high Fortunes, being risen from the state of a common Souldier, to the dignity of a Consull, and had beene Commander before that time over many Provinces. Him had Perennius discharged from Britaine, and with disgrace sent and confined into Liguria where hee was born, whose credit Commodus again with such favours repaired, that he gave him the Sirname Britannicus, which glorious title also himselfe had taken about the yeere 184. At his first entrance and arrivage, he assayed by rough hand to suppresse the rebellions of the Army, and adventured his person so farre in some tumults that hee was stricken downe and left for dead, but afterwards proceeding with better advice hee composed those troubles with most severe punishments of the principall offenders: whereby notwithstanding he presently grew odious to all, and thereupon so far feared his own safetie, that he made suit to the Emperour to be discharged of his Lieuenantship.

Helvius Pertinax made suite to be discharged of his office. Histor magus. Brit. lib. 3. cap. 7. Clodius Albinus sent Lieutenant into Britaine.

(8) Vnto him succeeded Clodius Albinus in the Government of Britain, a man of great birth, forward enough, and fortunate: for which the Emperor Commodus either upon favour or feare, did honour him with the title of Cæsar, though Albinus seemed unwilling to accept of the same, and afterwards discovered his disposition more openly in approoving the Ancient and free State of the Romans. For upon a false report of the death of Commodus, he made an Oration to the Legions in Britany in favour of the Senate, whose kind of Government he much commended and preferred before the rule of the Emperors: Of which his affection, when Commodus understood, he sent Iulius Severus in all haste, to take charge of the Army: and Albinus retired himselfe from all publike affaires, untill the death of Commodus, which not long after followed, and was wrought upon this occasion: He having assigned many to die, and to that end had inrolled their names in a scrol, it chanced Martia his Concubine to light on the same, wherein she saw her selfe allotted for one: and revealing this his purpose to others that stood in the same list, and in the like danger; they together thought best to secure their owne lives by his death: and with poyson, stabs, and strangling made him away, when he had lived one and thirtie yeeres, foure moneths, and viciously raigned thirteene yeeres, eight moneths, and fifteene daies, the yeere of Christs nativitie one hundred ninetie and three: the night before the Kalends of Ianuary.

(9) Of stature he was indifferently tall, of a fine constitution of body, very faire of complexion, with cleere eyes and golden locks, neither in person nor in Princely parts resembling his Father. How joyfull the death of this Tyrant was both to People and Senate, their execrations pronounced against him, and their assemblies in the Temples to give thanks for their deliverance, do manifest, as is at large reported by Lampridius, who wrote his life, and is styled by all, Hostis humani Generis, The enemy of Mankinde: The very name of the Divell.

PVBLIVS HELVIVS PERTINAX.

Chapter XXI.

An. Dom. 194.

VPON the person of this Helvius Pertinax (of whom we are now to speake) Fortune (as it seemeth) meant to make the full experience of her power, and from a very slender foundation to raise the building of her owne Pride: His birth was but poore, and parents as meane, whose Father from a servile condition got to be free, and traded in Mercery wares for his living: himselfe educated according to his birth, rose by degrees to mount the Chaire of all worldly glory, and to be the Monarch of the whole world.

Dion. Cassi. lib 37.

(2) At first a Schoole-Master, and taught the Grammar; next a Civill-Lawyer, and pleaded causes in Courts; and lastly, a Martiall-man, and served in Campe: where Fortune attended him with such favourable successe, that within five dayes, out of the ranke of a common Souldier he was preferred to be Captaine of a Cohort, in the Syrian warres against the Parthians; which ended, he was imployed into Britaine, Mœsia; and Germany; and also had charge in chiefe of a Fleet upon the Flemish Seas: he served likewise in Dacia with such honourable proofe of his valour; as that wise Emperour Marcus Aurelius held him in high esteeme, and afterward made him Senator of Rome. Then was he assigned Governour of all Syria and Asia, the greatest place of Credit and reputation that might be; and from thence sent againe into Britaine, chosen out as the principall man of note for to stay the Commotions there raised against Commodus; where in the Field he was left for dead: but thence also returning after hee had governed foure severall Consular Provinces, was created Proconsull of Africa, and immediately after Præfect of Rome. Neither ther yet made he his ſtand there, (though the greateſt of any ſubjective degree,) till he had mounted the Throne of Majeſtie, and obtained the command over All: which fell to his lot by the death of Commodus; and by the meanes of Martia, Aelius Latus, and other conſpirers of his end.

Helvius Pertinax made Emperour.

Helvius Pertinax envied by the Pretorian cohorts.

(3) For the Murther being done in the dead of the night, Latus in great haſte repaired to Pertinax his lodging; at whoſe ſight the Old man in bed, expected nothing but Death, as ſuppoſing him ſent from Commodus to no other end. But Latus ſalutes him by the unexpected name of Emperour, carrying him with acclamations unto the Army, and in the morning to the Senate, where, of them all with great joy, he was confirmed Auguſtus.

Sabellicus.

(4) His firſt buſineſſe was to bridle the licencious lives of the Pretorian Cohorts and injuries done by them unto the Romane Citizens, which gained him ſuch hatred, that it was cauſe of his death: For theſe men growne diſordered and lawleſſe in the raigne of Commodus, held themſelves wronged, to be now locked under the conſtraint of Lawes civill Government: and theſe only envied the peace and proſperitie of Pertinax, whereas all the Provinces abroad at the very hearing of his Election, and fame of his Imperiall vertues, laid aſide their weapons, and deſired to imbrace peace with a Prince ſo nobly qualified.

Helvius Pertinax aſſaulted by his Souldiers.

(5) The firſt that conſpired againſt his life, was one Falco; whom notwithſtanding he freely forgave, yet puniſhed certaine Souldiers thereto acceſſary: whereupon the reſt aſſembling themſelves in tumultuous and furious manner, with their drawn ſwords invaded his Palace. Hee ſeeing their purpoſes ſought no eſcapes, but deſcending the Palace, met them in the baſe Court: At whoſe preſence and Majeſtie they were much amazed, and a while made a ſtand: unto whom with great gravitie, and without ſhew of any feare, he thus ſpake unto them.

Helvius Pertinax his ſpeech to his Souldiers.

"(6) Souldiers and Companions, if you come to "kill me, (as I thinke you doe) you ſhall therein per"forme an act neither valorous nor otherwiſe very "commendable for you, no, nor any way grievous "unto my ſelf; for every mans life hath his limit, and "to mine, by Natures courſe, the laſt period cannot "be farre: Or thinke you that I feare death, who now "am ſo ripened for it, and have already gotten the "very height of all renowne upon my name? Surely "you are deceived: but at this I grieve; that my life "and ſhort time of Government, which I had devo"ted to the good of all; ſhould ſeeme ſo diſguſtfull "unto any, as to deſerve a violent and haſtned death, "eſpecially by you, who are by office, the Guarders "of my Perſon: you (I ſay) whoſe charge and Oath "is, to ſecure your Soveraigne from perill, and now "ſeeke to ſheath your Swords in his breaſt, ſhall ei"ther leave a Teſtimony of my bad life deſerving it, "or brand your places with ſuch ſtaines of Treaſon, "as Time ſhall never weare away. And what I pray is "mine offence for maintaining your Lawes? Why, it "was the charge your ſelves impoſed upon me. Are "Lawes too ſtrait? Surely, not to the vertuous, who "are even a Law unto themſelves: Are they need"leſſe? why then were they made? and being made, "why ſhould they not be executed? If the death of "Commodus grieve you, was I the cauſe? If he were "made away by Treaſon, your ſelves are conſcious of "my innocency. And this I aſſure you, in the word "of a Prince, that his death ſhall deprive you of no"thing, which you require, if you require nothing "but that which is honeſt and juſt. My life, whilſt I "was a Subject, was ſpent with you in Warre, now (be"ing your Soveraigne) is conſumed with cares for "your Peace: which if you free me of, by taking it a"way, my troubles ſhall thereby end, but your con"ſcience ſhall begin to groane under the guilt of "blood, and perchance be touched with too late Re"pentance.

(7) His words were ſpoken with ſuch a mooving gravitie, and unmoved reſolution, that the formoſt in the attempt gave backe, and were aſhamed of their audacious enterpriſe; but the reſt furiouſly driving forward, one Truſius with a Lance ran him into the Breaſt, whereupon Pertinax covering his Head with his robe, quietly yeelded his body to the traiterous ſtrokes of them all, and ſo died that poore, old, and innocent Emperour. The yeeres of his life, ſaith Iulius Capitolinus, were ſixty, ſeven moneths, and twenty five daies: But Dio, Spartianus and Herodian accounteth them to extend to ſixtie eight; Euſebius to above ſeventie: The like diſagreement there is for the ſhort time of his Government: for Euſebius ſaith that he raigned not fully fixe Moneths: Eutropius ſaith but three; Iulius Capitolinus and Aurelius Victor, eightie five dayes: Dio, Herodian and Spartianus, two Moneths and twentie eight dayes: how long ſoever, thus he lived, and thus he dyed, the fifth Calends of April.

DIDIVS IVLIANVS.

Chapter XXII.

An. Dom. 194.

THE ſtate of man continually attended with uncertain chance, apparantly doth ſhew, the weake condition that nature enjoyeth, and with what unſureneſſe the feare of majeſty is poſſeſt, as is ſeene by the precedent Emperour, who ſitting at peace in his Palace at Rome, renowned, beloved, and guarded with the ſtrengths of Europe, Aſia, Africa, Aegypt, and Greece, was notwithſtanding ſurprized and ſlaine at noone day, by a Band of Souldiers, not much exceeding the number of three hundred, and all eſcaping unpuniſhed; the deed was ſo ſudden, and mens minds ſo diſtracted, that it could not be fully beleeved, though witneſſed by ſight.

(2) The Senators miſtruſting each others, abandoned the Citie, and the Citizens in ſecret ſecured themſelves, all in an uproare: but none for revenge of the treaſon: The murtherers, in as great feare as any, fortified their Campe, and with weapons in hand ſtood upon their guard: But ſeeing all in a maze, and nothing againſt them attempted, a further boldneſſe (the like before never heard of) enſued: for by a Common Crier they made Proclamation for the ſale of the Empire, to any man that would give them moſt: which offer was readily accepted by Didius Iulianus (a man of much more wealth then honeſty of life, and a Lawyer: ſaith Euſebius) who with larger promiſes then ever were performed, obtained the Imperiall Diadem.

(3) His birth was in Millan, the ſonne of Petronius Didius Severus, his mother Clara Emilia, and himſelfe brought up in ſervice under Domitia Lucilla, the mother of Marcus Aurelius, by whoſe favours, he was firſt made Queſtor, next Edile, and then Pretor in Rome. In Germany as a Captaine he ſerved under Aurelius, then was he appointed Governour of Dalmatia, Bithynia, and of the Lower Germany, and was Conſul with Pertinax, and afterwards Proconſul in Africa. Theſe were his riſings and meanes to that Majeſty, which not long he kept: for hated in Rome, and not approoved abroad, Syria choſe for Emperour their owne Generall, Peſcennius Niger; Germany, Septimius Severus: By whoſe conſent Cladius Albinus Leader of the Britaine Army was firſt elected Ceſar, and then his fellow in the Empire; whereby the Eagle the faireſt of Birds became monſtrous, and in one Body bore three Heads.

(4) For Albinus at that time having gotten againe the government of Britaine, where erecting his owne Statues, and ſtamping his picture in his Coines, as thou ſeeſt heereunder inſerted, gave great ſuſpition that he intended to be a Competitor, and with his Army a foot meant to have gained the Emperiall ſeat it ſelfe, by advantage of Septimius forces abſent in ſuppreſſing of Peſcennius; which to divert, inforced Severus untill better opportunitie to declare Albinus his Companion, for he much more feared him then either of the former: becauſe Didius, in Rome, and Peſcennius in Antioch conſumed their times in banquetting, and unmartiall diſports, whiles Albinus managed his office moſt ſouldierlike, and was highly eſteemed and honoured of them.

(5) Severus haſting toward Rome, was met in Italy by Ambaſſadours from Didius with faire offers of peace, and poſſeſſion of halfe the Empire: but refuſing compoſition, and making ſtill forward, the Senate that ſo lately declared him a traytor, now proclaimed him an Emperour: And the Souldiers unſatisfied of the covenanted promiſes, and in hope to purchaſe favour with Severus, ſlew their Chapman Didius in his Palace, the Calends of Iuly, being but five dayes after he had done himſelfe as much for Pertinax, when he had raigned, as Eutropius ſaith, ſeven months: Spartianus ſaith by two, and Dio ſixty ſixe dayes: the yeere of his age fiftie ſeven, and of our Saviours appearing in our fleſh, one hundred ninety and foure.

SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS.

Chapter XXIII.

Sept. Severus.

An. Dom. 194.

SEVERVS having by this blouddy accident of the giddy multitude, gained with more facilitie then he expected, the fatall ſeat of government, it was his next care to ſuppreſſe Peſcennius by force, and Albinus by falſehood: whoſe actions and lives ſince they hapned with this Emperour, and ended with his ſword, I will record together, beginning with Caius Peſcennius firſt, ſince firſt he fell under the fortune of this man.

This old man in the yeere of Chriſt 194, was elected Emperor by Acclamation of the Syrian Army, of which (though begun but by a handfull in reſpect of all the other imperiall forces) he had good hope, ſince to the honour of that Goddeſſe he dedicated the firſt marke of his Soveraignitie; the minting of his money, as in the entrance of this Chapter is ſeene.

A perſon he was of ſeemely ſtature, lovely feature and faire skinne, except his necke, which differing ſo far from the reſt gave him the ſirname of Niger: his complexion was ruddy, his Body fat, his voyce ſo piercing, that it would be heard a mile off: and his haire for more orhament long hee wore in reflected curles upon his ſhoulders. A commendable ſouldier and well bearing himſelfe in the military offices hee underwent. In his Lieutenancy abroad he was ſevere, and at home hee ſo well acted his part when heewas Conſul, as in his Clemency and Juſtice hee ſeemed emulous of Pertinax. Thus all his life he enjoyed the goodneſſe of his merit and fortune, and had not his ambition begun, where his yeeres were ending, had ſo parted: For no ſooner had hee put on the Robe Emperiall, but Severus defeated Peſcennius his Army at Cizicum, purſued him to Antioch, and tooke him at

Euphrates

Euphrates, sending to Byzantium his head a Trophy of the Conquest; and to his wife, children, and followers (unto whom at first this Victor granted banishment) in the end denyed life.

(1) Now as soone as Severus made his approach neere Rome, he gave command that the Pretorian Cohorts should attend him disarmed; which done, hee vehemently checkt them for their proditorious trechery against Pertinax, and pronouncing sentence, deprived them both of name, honour, and armes of Souldiers, and banished them from Rome, and the circuit thereof for one hundred miles distance: which act of his wonne him such reputation, that in Rome the whole Story of Pertinax his ruine, and Severus his aspiring to his Throne, was at large portraited in an excellent peece of worke, of solide molten brasse, as Herodian relateth, though he ascribeth the occasion of it, to a dreame of Severus.

(2) Those two objects Didius and Niger, who gave some hinderance to Severus his beginning, being thus defeated of their high hopes; the third, which was Albinus, seemed now a more dangerous cloud, which would altogether over-cast his brightnesse and glory, if it were not dispersed or blown back in time: and therefore to make faire weather with him, hee created him Cæsar and his Successor in the Empire, but afterwards his good fortunes thus swelling in the East, and himselfe still courted by Ambassadours from all parts, with their tender of subjection, hee began to grow proud, and to disdaine any Copartner in State: and thereupon first secretly fought the destruction of his Cæsar; which failing, hee then proclaimed him Traitor and Enemy to Rome.

Albinus made Successor in the Empire.

His death practised.

Proclaimed Traitor. He wageth war against Severus.

(3) Clodius Albinus brought into these unexspected dangers, prepared his strengths, and with the choice of all Britaine entred France, and neere unto Lions tooke the field against the Emperour; but with no better successe, then Pescennius had done in Asia the yeere in the same place (as Herodian, Eutropius, and Spartianus affirme) where Darius was first overthrowne by Alexander. The Armies ioyning, a bloody Battell was fought, which through the great prowesse of the Britains went at first so fore against Severus, that being beaten off his Horse, despairing of Victory, and almost of Life, cast off his Imperiall Robe, and flying, ignobly hid himselfe. Latus one of Severus his Captaines, kept aloofe all this while, of purpose as was thought, to bring the Emperour to ruine; and now upon report that hee was slaine, came on most furiously with his forces, in hope of winning both the day, and the Empire to himselfe: whereupon the Emperour drawne again into the field, the day was his by the meanes, but not the meaning, of Latus: whom on attainder of his Treason he afterward put to the sword. That day a great part of the flower of Britaine was slaine, together with their valiant Leader Albinus, a Captaine of exemplary Severitie and Martiall discipline, a great admirer of Hannibal and Marius; for the Scipio's he thought them rather fortunate then valiant: and in the time of his service in this Iland, there was no toile which he commanded his souldiers, but himselfe would beare therein a part, even in carrying of burdens on his Backe: and yet so farre from vaunting of his valour, as that when an Historian would have recorded his noble Acts, hee willed him to write of theirs who were already dead, whom he need not to flatter; holding it a foppery to write of those, of whose favour or wrath the Inditers stood in hope or feare. Being such a one, no marvaile if Severus so feared him, as he did, which he shewed even after he was slaine, by putting incredible numbers of great Personages both in the Citie and Provinces to death, with this one Pretence, for all, that they wished well to Albinus.

Albinus vanquished by Severus.

After this overthrow Severus forthwith sent Heraclianus hither, to keepe the rest of the Britaines in quiet, and to be Lieutenant in Albinus his roome, as Spartianus writeth: Of whose affaires therein little remembrance is left, onely it seemeth by a Coine of Severus minted in his second Consulship, which fell in the yeere of our Saviour one hundred ninety eight, and about the period of this his last Competitor, that the Britaines gave not at first their service and servitude to this man, untill he had made the purchase of it by his sword; the brand of which he hath left to posteritie in figuring the goddesse Victory seated upon spoiles, and writing in a shield, Victoria Britan.

Spartianus.

Vnto this Lieutenant, Virius Lupus succeeded President of Britaine, as Vlpian the Lawyer termes him, and was about the yeere of Christ one hundred ninetie seven, as appeareth by this Inscription erected at Olinacæ amongst the Brigantes, in memory of the re-edifying of that place by this Emperour and his eldest Sonne, then first defigned Cæsar, by which the time is discovered, and in this stone inserted.

Virius Lupus made President of Britaine.

*Legatus.

*Pro Prætore.

(4) This man strengthned the Province especially in the North, with many strong Castles, repairing many places ruined either by fire or fury of the bordering swords: Of which * Lavat Re, where the first Cohort of the Thracians lay, was one, as appeareth by the altar there erected to the goddesse Fortune, and since removed to Conington the house of Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baronet in Huntingdonshire.

* Bowes under Stanmore in Richmondshire.

He warred against the Meate and North Britaines with such bad successe, that he was forced to redeeme his peace with money, and was so much weakened by losse of his men, that he sent to Rome for present supply, with relation of his great danger, and the Enemies strength: which newes touched Severus to the quicke; and notwithstanding his yeeres (sixtie at the least) and gout wherewith hee was continually grieved, yet would he undergoe that journey in person himselfe, as well to satisfie his owne vaine-glorious humours, as to traine his sonne Bassianus from his licentious life, wherein he wallowed idly in Rome; who together with his brother Geta, accompanied their Father into Britaine.

Caledonians desire peace.

(5) The Britaines then hearing of the Emperours approach, sent him their Embassage for intreaty of peace, whereby the Iland might have been setled and secured without blood; but the old man (saith Sabellicus) had so unsatiable a desire to beare the glorious Sirname of Britannicus, that he preferred Warre, and accepted not their proffered subjection.

(6) Severus thus entred Britain, Geta was appointed to remaine in the South of that Province, and to governe those parts that stood in quiet, assisted by Æmilius Papinianus the famous Lawyer, whose tribunall seat was held in Yorke; himselfe and Bassianus marching further into the North against the Meate and Caledonians their neighbours, both which bare themselves boldly upon the advantage of their Countries, their waters brackish, and unwholsome drinke for their Enemies, the aire sharpe and contagious to their constitutions, and the soile it selfe so pestred with Loughs, Bogs, Meares, and Mountaines, that the Romans were forced to make way by continuall labour, in cutting downe Woods, in building of Bridges, and in draywing of Meares, so that by distemperature of diet, continuall labour, contagiousnesse of Aire, and afflictions by sicknesse, fifty thousand of them perished, and that without Battaile, saith Dio: Many souldiers also, whose spirits were spent, and through feeblenesse could not keepe ranke in their March, were for meere pitty slaine by their fellowes, lest they should fall into the hands of their Enemies.

(7) These miseries notwithstanding, old Severus indured and fought many battailes, but (as Sabellicus confesseth) ever with more difficulties to the Romans then to the Britains, and yet in some small skirmishes hee went away Victor, and continued his courses with such resolution, that lastly the Caledonians thought good to intreat their peace; which upon these conditions was granted: first, that they should forthwith lay aside all hostile Armes, without any further resistance: next, that they should deliver into the Romans possession, those Countries that were next abutting on their Province: and lastly, that thence-forth they should live in quiet, attempting nothing against the publike peace.

(8) The State thus setled, Severus bethought himselfe of some further meanes to secure the Province, by building many In-land strengths anew, and repairing those with stone and Cement which formerly were but of Turfe and Earth, as appeareth by this Inscription found in the Ruines of one of his workes neere unto the River Vre, in the County of Richmond erected.

And neglecting the uttermost and vast Northerne parts of this Iland, drew a Wall or Fortification, which might serve as a Rampire and division betwixt the savage and more civill people, stretching it selfe thorow the whole Iland, even from Sea to Sea; that is, from the Bay of Itun (otherwise Solwayfrith) in Scotland, to the doore of Tine or Tinmouth, containing in length One hundred thirty and two miles, as Sextus Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and others account them, and by * some more. This Wall he built of Turfes and Timber, strongly feneed with Bulwarks and Turrets, neere unto (if not upon) the foundation of Adrians Wall, the track whereof thorow the Countries of Westmorland and Northumberland, is more pleasing to be seene, then easie in word to be expressed. For which his Acts thus heere atchieved about the yeare of grace two hundred and eleven, he assumed to himselfe his much desired Sirname Britannicus Maximus, causing in his owne and his sonnes Coines that inscription to bee stamped.

(9) And recording to posterity the glory of his first atchievement here, upon the reverse of those his moneys, whereon he sometimes formed a Trophy erected upon spoiles, with two captives, underseting the word Vict. Brit. sometimes a winged victory: graving a Shield, hung on that tree which is the meed of Conquerors; Victoriae Britannicae: and sometimes in such a forme and phrase as is expressed in the entrance of this his life. And now retyred to Yorke, he left his eldest sonne to finish this worke of warre by him begun, as being rather allaied then altogether ended.

Bassianus dissloyalty.

(10) Bassianus thus set in the one part of the Iland as Geta was in the other, fought rather to gaine the affections of his Army, by a loose liberty to doe what they list, then to manage the trust reposed on him, by the restraint of Martiall Discipline, and action of Military duties: hoping by such his plausibility and indulgences to purchase to himselfe their best concurrence for the obtaining of the Empire; which he so thirsted after, as that hee often tampered with them to raise him, by the fall of his father.

Caledonians rebell.

(11) The Caledonians understanding the dissolutenesse of his Campe, and the want of a better Captaine, suddenly assailed the Romans, putting many to the sword, and taking great booties, (which they dispersed among their neighbours) without any regard of the obligation of their former Covenants: whereat the testy old man was so much disquieted, and so farre enraged to revenge, that he gave an expresse charge to make a generall Massacre, without exception of any; using in his speech to his Souldiers, these verses borrowed out of Homer:

A generall Massacre of them by Severus.

Nemo manus fugiat vestras, cademq; cruentam:
Non fatus, gravidâ Mater quem gestat in alvo,
Horrendam effugiat cædem.

Let none escape your bloudy rage; with terrour lee all die:
Spare not the mother, nor the child that in her womb doth ly.

(12) This (which seemeth to have beene the worke of Severus second yeere in Britaine, Anno two hundred and twelve (for so it is expressed upon the monies of himselfe and sonnes) may (and with a fit and easie inference from the same authority) seeme to have beene heere the fortune and effect of two encounters and Conquests that same yeere: for whether we observe the two severall coines of victory then minted, on one of which is the Statue of that armed and winged Goddesse, at whose feet are two Captains prostrate bound; or the other bearing on it a double figure of that Lady, graving the sculpture of the former, Vict. Brit. upon a Shield, it can conclude no lesse in probability.

The seed plots of our Cities.

(13) Severus remaining in Yorke, where the Sixth Legion called Victrix kept, (which place afterwards grew to be one of the chiefest for account among the Brigants, as commonly the Stations of the Romans Colonies were the seed-plots of all our Cities, and principall Townes) grew feeble and sicke, being weakened with age, and wearied with travell, his malady more increa-increasing by the disturbances of the Enemie, and the daily disloyaltie of Bassianus his sonne, insomuch that despairing of life, he called his Councell and Captaines before him, and underlaid with pillowes, he thus addressed his speech.

" (14) Eighteene yeeres almost have I weilded " the affaires of the Empire, and borne on my shoul- " ders the burden of her encombred estate, both at " at home and abroad; at my first entrance, troubled " every where, now at length quiet, even here in Bri- " taine, the most unquiet and molestious Province of " all: The profit of which travels I must now leave " for others to enjoy, and with ease in peace to keepe " that which I with care and warre have gotten. If " therefore amitie and mutuall concord bee imbraced " (the onely sinewes of a Common-wealth) the glory of " the Empire shall yet shine more bright, sith by con- " cord wee see that small things grow to greatnesse; " whereas contrariwise, discord is the ruine of all. I " die & must leave the succesſe of all to my Succes- " sors and Sonnes by Nature, though the Elder unna- " turall: I meane Bassianus new made Antoninus and " your Emperour, who often ere this hath sought to " gaine that title by his sword and my death; but " knoweth not the dangers that attend a Diadem, nei- " ther remembreth that high places are continually " guarded with Envy and Feares. But so blind is Am- " bition, as it seeth not that a Soveraignes greatnesse " is such unto others, but least in himselfe, and that " the things possessed are not the very things they " seemed: It is not these Titles therefore can make " man happy, the line of his life being drawne forth " with so many uncertainties, and the height of his " power laid upon so weake foundations. My selfe " at this instant may serve for example, of whom this " may be said, I was all things, yet nothing, seeing " I must pay my debt to Nature, and leave my ex- " ploits in East and West to be registred either (at " your disposall) for matters of moment, and good " of the Empire, or blotted to the reproch of my " government, with the shadowing pencile of Ob- " livion. That therefore my care for the welfare of " this State may survive my selfe, and bring forth " the happy fruits thereof when I am withered, this " shall be my last and onely request, that you will e- " ver assist my sonnes, both with your counsell and " aide, whereby they may rule according to Law, " and you obey according to Right, that so in you " both, the good of the Empire be above all things re- " spected. With which words hee ended both his " speech and his life.

Spectators.

(15) This Emperor by Historians is ranked with the best, both for his warres, wherein hee was very fortunate, and for his wisedome in governing the Empire: and yet he is taxed very sharpely both by Sabellicus for sundry vices, and by Eusebius for stirring up the fift Persecution of the Christians in the tenth yeere of his Raigne. In which Irenæus the learned writer, among many others, suffered Martyrdome: howbeit, towards his end, he became more milde to them, as saith Saint Ierome; as also that hee was a diligent reader of the excellent workes of Tertullian, whom usually he termed his Master.

Bridg.

(16) This Emperour was by birth an African, to which Country his affection and graces were so much, that the illustrious City of those parts, recorded upon their coyne his many favours by this Inscription, INDVLGENTIA AVG. IN CARTH. and inshrined him amongst the Gods of that Nation. Hee was the sonne of Geta, his mother Pia Fulvia: himselfe rough, cruell, covetous, and ambitious, and his nature relishing too much of the Punick craft and simulation: otherwise a most expert Souldier, and a worthy Prince, more battels he fought, and more victories obtained, then any other that ever had ruled before him the Roman Empire. In a word, his vertues and vices so equally composed, that lastly this grew into a customed speech: It had beene good that this Emperour had never beene borne, or being Emperour, that he had never died.

Severus his description.

(17) Of stature hee was tall, and of a comely personage, his countenance severe and representing Majestie, his beard white and long, and the haire of his head he wore usually curled. He was very learned in the Mathematicks, a good Philosopher, an eloquene Orator, and of a deepe sounding voice. Hee raigned eighteene yeeres (saith Eusebius) by Dion Cassius, Herodian, and Eutropius, seventeen yeeres, eight months, and odde daies. He died in Yorke, the fourth day of April, in the yeere of Christ two hundred and twelve, not so much of sickneſse, as of discontent and griefe, or (if our British writers may be credited) of a deadly wound given by Fulgence, Captaine of the Picts, who, as the Monke of Chester saith, was brother to Martia, the first wife of Severus and mother of Bassianus. His second wife was Iulia Domna the mother of Geta, (though some thinke that shee was mother to both) a woman of a surpassing beauty, and an earnest instigator of the two Brethrens reconciliation, had she not bin blemished with other vices, as afterward we shall heare.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Bassianus Caracalla.

Septimius Geta.

An. Dom. 212.

BAssianus Caracalla, and his brother Septimius Geta, together were declared Emperours by old Severus in his life time, and both of them by their father surnamed Antoninus, a name very gracious in the esteeme of the Romans; the elder so stiled about the yeare of Salvation two hundred and five, and the younger foure yeares after, (as it appeareth by the mintage of their monies;) were approved and applauded by people and Senate, and of all men saluted and acknowledged for Emperours. Bassianus the Elder, stiling himselfe Britannicus Maximus, as it should seeme, was admitted his Fathers fellow Emperour at Yorke, at his refiding there, to quiet Northern Britaines, wherein also he gave him the name Antoninus, for so implieth that famous Law, bearing joyntly the names of Severus and Antoninus, enacted by them at Yorke, touching the interest and right that masters have to the goods and possessions of their servants. His mother the first wife of Severus, was Martia a British Lady (say our British Historians, though Sabellicus doth judge her to be an African) and himselfe better beloved of the Britaines for her sake, then for his owne.

Geff. Monmouth. Sabellicus.

Geta was the sonne of the Empresse Iulia, a second wife, a woman of passing beautie, and surpassing lust, who being perswaded (by some Oracle or Dreame) that her husbands succeſſour should be an Antoninus left her sonne should lose his hope of the Empire, she importuned Severus to bestow the name of Antoninus also on Geta, who with it gave him likewise the title of Cæsar, about the yeare two hundred and two. And to unite the affections of his two sons, as well as to eternize their memories, he minted their features upon one Medall inscribing the one side ANTONINVS PIVS AVG. PON. TR. P. IIII. the other, P. SEPT. GETA, CAES. PONT. having the yeare before matched them together upon the reverse of his owne money, and incircling their heads with this word, AETERNITAS IMPER.; as if the separation of their affections were the dissolution of his and the worlds Empire.

Some say it was Severus his dreame. Sabellicus.

Heroidian. Sabellicus.

(2) Vpon Severus his death, Antoninus Caracalla, hastning for Rome, proffred good conditions of peace to the Britaines, who long tired with warres, accepted thereof, and hostages were given for conserving the same. Whereupon the Empresse Iulia accompanied with both the Cæsars, departed hence, carying with them the funerall ashes of the deceased Emperour in a golden Vrna to Rome, where they solemnely consecrated him a God: the ceremony whereof (because it concerneth so great an Emperour and Monarch of this kingdome) is not unworthy the inserting.

In the Porch of his Palace was a Bedsted all of Ivory, dressed with richest bedding and furniture of gold, wherein was laid his image portraited to the life, but yet in manner of a sicke man. On the left side sate all the Senatours and Princes in black mourning weeds; on the right, all the great Ladies, cladde in white (which then was the mourning colour of that Sexe.) The Physicians diligently comming to visit him, and feeling his pulse, as if he were alive, doe signifie that his disease did still increase upon him. This they all did seven dayes together: at last, as if then he were dead, all the prime of the Nobility carry him in his Ivorie Bed to the * Forum, where all the Patrician youth, and noble Virgins, incompassed him with most dolefull Hymnes and ruefull ditties. Thence againe he was removed to Mars his field, where was erected a foure-square frame of Timber, of a huge height and compasse, the stories still mounting to the top with sundry ascents, richly beautified with strange varieties of golde and purple ornaments, and images of great Art and price: On the second of which ascents, was placed the Emperours said Bed and Statue, with infinite store of sweetest odours, brought thither from all parts of the Citie: which done, the yong Nobles bravely mounted on Horseback, rid round about in a kind of dance or measure, and another sort likewise (who represented great Princes) in their Coaches, whereupon his successor in the Empire, first set fire to the frame, then forthwith al the people did the like on all sides: and when the whole began to be on flame, an Eagle secretly enclosed within, was let flie out of the toppe; which soaring a great height, and out of sight, the people followed it with shouts and prayers, supposing that therewith the Emperours soule was carried up to heaven. And thus Severus which before was a man of Gods making, was now become a god of mans making: and the more to preserve the memory of his fathers glory, Caracalla erected a magnificent Edifice, which he intitled Severus his Porch, wherein with most exquisite Art, and admired workmanship, were portraied all his Fathers warres and triumphes, atchieved here in Britaine or elsewhere.

Sabellicus.

(3) But presently after, these two ungodly sonnes of this new supposed god, so much emulated each others glory, that the deadly sparkes of envie, blowne a long time with the bellowes of their ambitious desires, brake out into the flames of murther and blood, being brethren by one Father, but not by the same mother (as it is said,) and in this onely like, that they were both starke naught, though both in contrary kindes of Vices. And albeit the Empresse Iulia had fought by all meanes to make peace betwixt them, both formerly, here in Britaine, and now after their returne to Rome: yet the desire of a sole Soveraignty, had beene a long time so rooted in Bassianus his heart (for which he had twice attempted his Fathers life and so much hasted his death, that he slew his Physicians, because they had dispatched him no sooner) could not indure an equall (much lesse a confronter) in authority, and therfore in the Court & in the armes of the Empresse, he slew her sonne Geta, in a time least suspected, when he had fate with him in state and disdaine, the terme of one yeare and twenty two dayes.

Geta slaine in his mothers armes.

Herodian.

(4) And to cloak his fatricide with shew of constraint, first to the Souldiers, and then in the Senate, hee accuseth his brother to have sought his death, and that in defence of himselfe he was forced to slay the other, and thereupon fled to Pretorian Cohorts for safety of his life, as though further conspiracies had been intended against him in the Citie; where at his returne he commanded Papinianus the famous Civilian, to excuse the murther in his Pleas at the Barre: which, when he refused, he caused him to be slaine, as also all those that had been acquainted with Geta; whereby so many of the Nobility perished, that hee was thereby counted another Nero in Rome: and by his favourites, the name of Geta was raced out of all Monumentes and Imperiall inscriptions, as we have seene some of them defaced upon some Altar stones found here in Britaine.

Dio Spartianus.

Papinianus slaine for refusing to defend a murther.

(5) Of nature he was subtile, and could well dissemble with them whom he feared, and make shew of love where he deadly hated; alwayes fitting himselfe to the humours of flatteries: Among the Germans, he would counterfeit their gate and garments; In Greece, be like Alexander, bearing his necke somewhat awry; In Troy, would resemble Achilles, alwaies so Camelion-like, as the Romans (his followers) were therewith ashamed. In a word, Caracalla (saith Dio) never thought of doing good, because (as himselfe confessed) he never knew any goodnesse.

Dio.

(6) And to fill up the measure of all iniquitie, as one regardlesse of humanity or shame, he maried Iulia his mother in law, late wife to his owne Father (a sinne (saith S. Paul) not to be named among the Gentiles) and by Sext. Aur. Eutrop, and Spar. reported upon this occasion. It fortuned that Iulia in presence of Caracalla, either by chance, or of purpose rather, let fall the vaile which she wore, discovering thereby her naked breasts and beauty, which was great; whereat the Emperor casting his lacivious eye and bewraying his affection, presently said, Were it not unlawfull, I should not be unwilling: to whom she replied (without respect of modesty) that all things were lawfull to him that made lawes for others, but was subject himselfe to none: forgetting at once both the murther committed upon Geta her sonne, and the scandals that accompanied so foule a sinne, the pleasure whereof they did not long enjoy, both their deaths (by Gods vengeance) soone after ensuing.

Iulia her wicked speech

(7) For Caracalla remaining in Mesopotamia, and carrying (as it seemeth) a guilty conscience, and suspition of his life, sent to Maternus, whom he had left Governor of Rome, to assemble all the Astrologers and Mathematicians (unto which learned impostors he alwayes gave especiall credit) and of them to enquire how long he should live, & by what death he should die. Maternus having so done, wrot for answer, that Macrinus his Prefect of the Pretorium (then with him in his expeditions) went about to murther him. Which is thought rather in envie of Macrinus to have been fained, then by any Astrologicall directions so given forth. This letter and others comming to Caracalla his hand, at such time as he was busie about his disport, he delivered them to Macrinus to reade, and give him the report at his returne. In perusall wherof finding him self to beaccused of Treason, and fearing lest by the sequell he might be brought into greater danger, he incensed one Martial a Centurion (whose brother the Emperour had lately slaine) to murther him; which was soone performed, and occasion in the fields offered: for Caracalla stepping aside from his traine to ease nature, Martial, as though he had bin called, ran hastily in without hinderance or suspect, and with his dagger stabbed him to death; but being too late perceived, was yet so hastily pursued, that hee was hewed to pieces before his tongue could revеale the principall Traitour. Iulia his incestuous wife hearing of his death, with poison slew her selfe at Antioch, leaving her shame to her life.

(8) Antoninus Caracalla, saith Eusebius, raigned Emperor seven yeares and five monethes, but Herodian, Spartianus and Dio allot him five yeares and two moneths: he died the eight of April, and yeare of Christ two hundred eighteene. The testimonies of these many Writers notwithstanding, together with the place and circumstances of his death, and the person by whom it was committed, the British Historians do contradict, reporting him to be slaine in Britaine, in Battaile against the Picts, by one Caracucus a man of a lowe and obscure birth. But by this it may seeme, some wounds received by him in those British warres, gave occasion to that errour. He left a sonne not by his incestuous mother, nor by Glanilla his wife, whom he exiled into Sicilia; but by a Mistris, whose name was Iulia Simiamira his cozen German, and indeed no better then a common strumpet: which corrupt roots brought forth as bitter fruits, even Heliogabalus, of whom hereafter wee shall have occasion to write.

OPILIVS MACRINVS.

CHAPTER. XXV.

Opilius Macrinus.

Diadumenus.

An. Dom. 218.

IN prosecuting our intended course, for setting downe the Acts and Lives of sundry Emperours, hereafter succeeding, I know I shall hardly satisfie my Readers, being no way able to give content to my selfe, in that, on the one side, finding very few remembrances concerning the state of this our Iland, till the raigne of Diocletian, the History of that Interim may seeme impertinent to our purpose; and yet on the other side, considering how unfit it is, that the Succession of all our British Monarkes should be interrupted (that Royall Title being somewhat annexed to those other Emperours) I suppose it will be expected, that somewhat also be said of them, though managing their affairs in places farre remote. It seemeth that the continuall striving for the Imperiall Diademe, and their nearer hazards at home, made them contented to give Britaine some peaceable breathing, and so deprive us of the Roman Records of those times: wch want if I should supply out of our homebred British Writers, I might be thought, not so much to repaire the ruines of our Monuments, as to heape more rubbish upon them. And therefore (necessity so enforcing) I must crave patience, if I proceed to the rest of our Countries Monarches, though I cannot to the resdue of our Countries Exploits and Affaires in those dayes.

An. Dom. 218.

(2) Opilius Macrinus from obscure and base Parentage, by favour of the Emperour, without any notable desert in himselfe, first aspired to the Office of a Prefect, and at last by the election of the Souldiers, to the Dignitie Imperiall. So farre from suspicion of Caracallaes death, by the outward appearance of a seeming sorrow, that he was held of all most free from the Treason, and the second person worthy of their voyce. For first, the Title was conferred upon aged Audentius, a man of good sort, much experience, and an excellent Captaine; whose wisedome could not be drawne to adventure his life under the weight of so uneasie and dangerous a Crowne, but excusing himselfe by the priviledge of his age, as far unfit to weild the troubles (much lesse to increase the glory) of the Empire, refused their offers, but with returne of as many thanks as they had given him hands or voyces. Whereupon they againe consulted and determined for Macrinus, whic as willingly received, as Audentius refused: unto whom they swore fealtie, but not long after failed in performance.

Audentius refuseth the Empire.

(3) He made for his Cæsar, Diadumenus his sonne, changing his name (a usuall custome at their election) into Antoninus, because that name was gracious among the Romans. The Senate at home confirmed all that the Armie had done abroad; unto whom it seemed their right, as it were by prescription, to have the election of the Emperours.

Diadumenus appointed for Cæsar. Called Antoninus.

(4) His first expedition was against Artabanus King of the Parthians, that hasted against the Romans, for wrongs received by Caracalla deceased: but after three great and dangerous Battles, came to an attonement, and a peace betwixt them concluded. After this, as free from other troubles, he returned to Antioch in Syria, and there spent his time in Banquets, and other sensuall pleasures, being drenched so farre therein, that the Armie began to dislike his Government, and to favour young Bassianus the sonne of Caracalla, then presen at Emesa a Citie in Phœnicia, with Mœsa his Grandmother by his Mothers side, who there had built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, and therein ordained him a Priest; for which cause he was called Heliogabalus, that is to say in the Phœnician Language, The Priest of the Sunne.

Antoninus son of Caracalla.

Antoninus called Heliogabalus, that is, A Priest of the Sunne.

(5) To this Temple in their vaine devotions resorted many of the Romane Souldiers; and seeing the beautie of the youth, allured Mœsa to bring him to their Campe: where knowne to be the sonne of Caracalla, the Souldiers proclaimed him Emperour, and maintained his right against Macrinus; who after this revolt, met young Heliogabalus in the Confines between Phœnicia and Syria, where he fought a bloudie Battle, and Macrinus forsaken of all, was driven to flie; who with his sonne hasting thorow Asia and Bithynia, came lastly to Chalcedon, where he fell sicke, and was there, together with Diadumenus, put to death the seventh day of June, the yeere of Christs Incarnation two hundred and nineteene, when hee had raigned one yeere, one moneth, and twenty eighth dayes.

ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Antoninus Heliogabalus Emp.

An. Dom. 219.

VOung Bassianus, surnamed Heliogabalus, the sonne of Caracalla before mentioned, thus elected, and prospering at his entrance, gave hopes to his raisers, of many Princely parts, and signes of those things that in sequele, by better proofe appeared to be onely signes indeed: for nature had plentifully adorned him with the complements of her gifts, had his minde been answerably furnished with vertue. But as the one was over prodigall and lavish in his outward forme, so was the other as sparing and defective in bestowing of her inward gifts: in so much that both in mind and garment, he seemed to be that which in truth he was not. This Emperour, as appeareth by the reverse of his money, tooke it no meane addition of honour to his Imperiall Dignitie, to be stiled, The Priest of the Sunne; which in the Assyrian tongue is called El, from whom he tooke the surname Elagabal.

(2) Assoone as he had setled the Empire firme upon himselfe, by the death of Maximus, he began to discover his owne dispositions, and in wantonnesse, apparell, lightnesse and diet, to exceed any that had gone before him in Rome; and so farre differed from the manners of men, that modesty will not suffer us to record his greatest vices.

Heliogabalus exceedeth in wickednesse all others before him.

(3) His apparell was rich, and most extreame costly, and yet would he never weare one garment twice: his Shooes embellished with Pearles and Diamonds; his Seats strewed with Muske and Amber; his Bed covered with Gold and Purple, and beset with most costly Jewels; his Way strewed with the Powder of Gold and Silver; his Vessels (even of basest use) all Gold; his Lamps burning with no other Oile then the Balmes of India and Arabia; his Fish-Ponds filled with no other water then of distilled Roses; his Ships (in his Naumachies or ship-fights) sloted in a River of Wine; his Bathes most stately built, and againe after they were once used, presently pluckt downe; his Plate of finest Gold, but never served twice to his Table; his Concubines many and chargeable, but not one laine with twice; his Diet so profuse, that at every supper in his Court, was usually spent a Thousand pound Sterling: inviting the chiefe Citizens to a Feast, he strewed all the Roomes with Saffron, as it were with Rushes, saying, That such Cattle were worthy such costly Litter. Neere the Sea, with him no Fish was eaten: in the Land, no Flesh: whole Meales made of the Tongues of singing Birds and Peacocks, or of the Braines of most costly creatures, alwayes saying, That meat was not savory whose sauce was not costly. And indeed so costly it was, that the revenewes of Germany, France, Britaine, Spaine, Italy, Sicilia, Gracia, Asia, Syria, Aegypt, Arabia, and all the Ilands, were not sufficient to defray the charges.

(4) In his Progresse, six hundred Chariots followed him, laden with Strumpets, Boyes, and Bawdes, for whom he built a Stewes in his Court, wherein himselfe in the attire of an Harlot, made to them solemne and set Orations, terming them therein his Fellow-Souldiers and Companions in Armes, with Instructions for them how to practise with most variety their filthy Luxuries. In regard of which kind of actions, one doth make this doubt, whether were greater his boundlesse Prodigality, his stupendious Lechery, or his foppish Foolery: the last of which his Imperiall vertues, he gave proofe of, when he gathered in the Citie ten thousand waight of Spiders, professing that thereby hee understood how great a City Rome was: at another time, ten thousand Mice, and a thousand Weesels, which hee brought forth in a publike shew to the people, for some wise State-purpose, like the former.

Aelius Lamprid. Herodian.

(5) In Rome he built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, (like to that in Phoenicia, whereof himselfe was Priest) commanding the Christians therein to worship: as also a Charterhouse for women to meet and determine of their Attires; and brought into the Senate-house, his mother Semiamira, allowing her a Voice among the Senators. In modestie I forbeare to write the particulars of his un-manly libidinous filthinesse, adding onely that which a judicious Author speaks of him: Kings (saith he) as they have greater power to sin then other men, so have they lesser safety in sinning then any man; for being set above others in the eye of the World, they are as Markes that are aimed at, and lie open to the shot of Revenge. And so was the state of this Superlative Monster, whose owne Conscience still stung him, even in the midst of his sweetest sinnes, and therefore ever expecting some violent end, hee prepared silken haltars, richly wrought, to hang himselfe, if need were; and Golden Knives to stab himselfe, or cut his throat; and built a goodly Tower of exceeding height, adorned with Gemmes and Gold of invaluable cost, that thence he might cast himselfe headlong, having these words oft in his mouth, That however he died, his death should be precious in the eyes of all men. But he failed of his hope, though not of his desert; for against him the Pretorian Souldiers suddenly arose, no wrong offered them, more then unto others, but out of a Justice in God, who repayeth sinne with sinne, and suffereth not such outragious wicked ones to escape unrevenged.

A Privy. Sabellicus.

(6) These breaking into his Palace, found him not in estate answerable to his calling, but hidde (for feare) in a homely place suitable with his dirty conditions: from whence with acclamations thorow the streets of Rome, more like a Dogge then a Man, they dragged him with his mother, saying, The Bitch and her Whelps must go together: and after their fury spent, threw their bodies into the common sinke of the Citie, and thence into Tyber, sinking them downe with great great stones, lest the carkasses cast up with the waves, should either find buriall, or infect the aire. The Senate approving all that was done, decreed that his name should be obliterated out of all monuments in Rome, and never any Antoninus (a name before very gracious) should rule againe their Empire: so odious was the remembrance of this Image of ignominy.

(7) He was aged but foureteene yeares when hee became Emperour; by Herodians computation, he raigned six yeares, and died at twenty: By Aurelius Victor, he died at seventeen, and raigned not fully three yeares: Eusebius saith, that he raigned fully foure: Onuphrius would have him to live eighteen yeres, & to dy the 8 day of March, An. two hundred twenty three.

ALEXANDER SEVERVS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Alexander Severus, Emp.

An. Dom. 223.

BEfore the death of Heliogabalus, his cosin German Alexianus, by the working of his mother Mommea, was made his Caesar; whose vertues daily increasing with his age, gave hopes to the better sort of some happier times by his meanes: but so farre incensed Heliogabalus (who hated nothing more then vertue,) and so dimmed his fame, that he often assaied to take away his life by treachery: But surviving him whom no man wished to live, he was with publicke blessings, and unspeakeable joy elected Emperour; * his name they changed from Alexianus to Alexander, and his surname given of old Severus.

Lampridius saith, he was borne on the day that Alexander the great dyed, and had therefore his name. Sabellicus. Lampridius.

(2) He was the sonne of one Varius, a Syrian borne and of Mammea, sister to Semiamira, though there are who say, that both the sisters, attending on their Aunt Iulia the Empresse, were gotten with childe by young Caracalla, and so he father of Alexianus: howsoever he was brought up in learning from his childhood, having a naturall propension to all humane vertues, and divine pieties: Hee was very skilfull in the Mathematicks, Geometry, Musicke, Carving, and Painting, and composed some Bookes also of Poetry: so great a lover of the liberall Arts, that he allowed the professors thereof annuall stipends for their further encouragement: and that which most is, hee much favoured the Christians, from whom he took to himselfe examples of life, and urged their precepts unto others, and this one especially, * NOT TO DOE TO OTHERS WHAT WE WOULD NOT HAVE DONE TO US. Their Christ hee honoured (though as a Heathen man) and would have had him consecrated among the Roman Gods: Vnto whom he also was minded to have built a Temple, had not his Idol-Priests hindred the same; but a place of their holy Assemblies he allowed them by his Imperiall warrant: for when certaine Vintners or Victuallers laid claime to the place whereunto the Christians resorted to pray, he thus decided it, That it was much fitter that God therin should be worshipped, then bellygods should be pampered to surfet there. Cotes, or to the like prophane uses.) This good inclination of Alexander the sonne, was undoubtedly stirred up by the instigations of Mammea his mother, who, as Eusebius witnesseth, had sent for Origen (the Christian Doctor) from Alexandria to Antioch: by whom she was so well instructed, that Jerome gives her the honourable Title of a most holy woman.

(3) Himselfe, though young, ruled the Empire with great Wisedome and Justice: admitting onely such for his Counsellors, as were men uncorrupt, sage and learned, skilfull in the Civill Law, and experienced in Antiquities of elder times, and preferring none to any office or charge by suite, but onely by the commendation of each mans worth and fitnesse for the place: In regard whereof, he caused Turinus (one of his Courtiers, who tooke money of divers, with promise to procure the Emperours favour in their suites) to be put to death by smoake, the Crier proclaiming, That hee had sold smoake, and therefore with smoake he should die. And likewise to cut off in Lawyers their continuall selling of Justice (the bane of all Common-wealthes) for a fee, he granted a publike and fer reward to such as should plead gratis. By which courses, his civill affaires were nobly managed and his warres likewise proved as prosperous: for he triumphed with great glory over the Parthians: The Germans also, who in furious manner had passed the Rivers Danuby and the Rhine, in many skirmishes he put backe, and forced them to their former obedience.

Sabellicus and others.

Bountifull and liberall he was both to the people and souldiers, as by the reverse of his coine above prefixed is feene, wherein is expressed the fourth Donativum and congiarium, bestowed by the bounty of this Emperor, upon the souldiers and common people, of which Lampridius maketh mention in his life.

(4) But as Envy ever attends persons of Estate, and a desire of change breeds a dislike of the present, so the Roman Legions growne farre out of order by the prodigious Government of the last Emperour, proved now unnaturall to their dread Soveraigne: whose warres drawing him into Germany, and thence hither into Britaine, he found some of his Souldiers here so tumultuous, that he thought fit to use exemplary severity towards them, whereupon they, being secretly secretly backt, (as is supposed) by Maximinus (a potent man in the army, raised onely by the Emperours favour) they traiterously assailed him, and together with his mother Mammea, murthered him in a village then called Scilla, though others say he was slain in Germany, in the City Mogunce, and some in France, no other cause moving them, but onely his vertue; the eighth day of March, when he had raigned (by Lampridius) thirteene yeares and nine dayes, aged (by Herodian, and Iulius Capitolinus) twenty nine yeares, three monethes and seven dayes, the yeare of our Saviour, two hundred thirty six.

CAIVS. IVLIVS. MAXI. CÆS.

Maximinus Emp.

Maximus Cæsar.

An. Dom. 236.

Maximinus, a man barbarous by birth and disposition, (himselfe a Thracian, his father named Nicea, borne in Gotland, very obscure, his mother Ababa of little better rancke) spent his youth in keeping of Cattell, the poverty of his parents admitting no better maintenance: Yet afterwards his fortunes brought him unto great advancement, and that by working upon the outward object of his person, being for shape and strength (if the reporter deserve credit) rather to be thought a vast Giant, then described for a goodly man: For Iulius Capitolinus affirmes his height to be eight foot and an halfe: by Geometricall measure, and his body answerable in every proportion, insomuch, as he did weare as a Ring on his thumb, the * bracelet which his wife used to wear on her arme, a stature thought uncredible; and yet Iosephus, an Author of great credit, doth confidently record, that one Eleazar a Iew, accompanied Darius the Kings son of Persia unto Rome, (sent by Vitellius to Tiberius for an hostage) whose height, as he saith, was fully seven cubits, a measure surmounting this.

Capitolinus calls it Dextrocherium being a broad plate of gold set with rich Iewels, an ornament in use amongst the Romane Ladies.

Ioseph Antiq. Lib. 20.

(2) This Maximinus increasing strength with growth, left his trade of Cattle-keeping, and resorted to the Roman Campe then in Syria, where for his admirall height, he was admitted by Septimius Severus, into the ranke of a common Souldier, and shortly after, preferred to be one of his Guard. Bassianus made him a Coronell, and Heliogabalus gave him the leading of certaine foot: but the last Emperour Alexander, advanced him to be a Captaine of the fourth Legion, whose death notwithstanding hee disloyally practised, (of such force is the desire of Soveraignty which makes men forget all bonds of gratitude and loyall truth) and was thereupon by the Souldiers elected Emperour, with fealty sworne unto him.

Maximinus his means of rising to preferment.

(3) The ignoble Upstart thus borne, from the dunghill, upon the wings of Fortune, unto the seate of Majestie, thought the increase of his pride was an increase of State; and knowing he had nothing for which he might deserve to be loved, he studied in the whole managing of his estate, how by all meanes hee might be feared. Hee therefore displaced Senators, Captaines, Souldiers, and whom not? with murders, banishments, and confiscations of their goods: all such especially he did cut off, whom he supposed to have knowledge of his base beginnings. The Christians likewise under him were martyred, (whereof Origen wrote a booke, not now extant) and he is by Writers accounted the sixth Persecutor of Gods Saints: so that, whereas his flatterers at first called him Milo, Antæus, and Hercules, for his strength; now they all tearmed him, Busiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops, for his Savage cruelty.

Eusseb Eccl. hist. lib. 6. cap. 27. Maximinus persecuteth the Christians.

(4) But his life being odious to God and Man was often attempted to be taken away; first, by Maximus, a man of a Consular dignity; then by Quarcinus (whom Capitolinus calleth Ticus) set on by the old Souldiers of Septimius Severus, that had been disgraced by Maximinus; and lastly by the Army in Africa, who elected Gordianus (their Proconsul, a very worthy and learned man, of fourescore yeeres old) Emperour, and his sonne (of the same name and Princely qualities) his Cæsar: the Senate likewise confirming all that they had done. He tooke to himselfe the surname Africanus, either in respect of his Pro-Consulship which he exercised, in that Province, or else as descended from Scipio his family who bore that surname: His sonne Gordianus likewise was stiled Augustus, as appeareth by his Coines, whereon hee writeth himselfe AVG. and upon the Reverse, PIETAS AVGI.

(5) In the meane while, aged Gordianus with the Ensignes and glory of an Emperor, entred Carthage; with blessings and acclamations of joy: whereat his old enemy Capelianus, Governour of Numidia and Mauritania (Provinces in Africke) much envied; and gathering forces in Maximinus his name, made head against him, and shortly gave him Battle, wherein Gordianus the younger was slaine before the walles of the City. The father seeing his Cæsars disastre, himselfe an Emperour onely nominall, his new risen Sunne to have passed the circle of his height, and now to approach to the setting and fall, wished againe his private estate; and in despaire, griefe, and disdaine of his enemies successe, with the Girdle which he wore, strangled himselfe to death, when hee had beene stiled Emperor only twenty six dayes: whereat Maximinus was not a little joyfull, and the Senate no lesse perplexed, seeing themselves deprived of their hopes, and now laid open to the Tyrants will, who like a Lion came raging on; threatning revenge in all their blouds.

(6) The State thus standing, all the Peeres and Princes thereof assembled themselves together at Rome: and in the Temple of Iupiter, after long debating of their present dangers, concluded, that Maximus Pupienus and Clodius Balbinus together should be Emperours; men of great account and favour with the people: These taking Oath and Imperiall Robes, levied forces to maintaine their cause: and Balbinus taking charge of the City, Pupienus marched to meet Maximinus, who in great pride had passed the Alpes, entred Italy, and now laid siege against Aquileia; in which this was very memorable, that The Citizens wives cut off the haire of their heads, to make bow strings for resistance of so hatefull a Tyrant: where after long assault prevailing little, his discontented Souldiers fell to mutiny: and entring his Paulion, at noone day without resistance, slew both him and his sonne, bearing the same name, whom hee had created his Cæsar, and whose monies, as he minted them, we have inserted at the entrance of his Empire. Their heads for a Trophy they sent before them to Rome, where with such acceptations they were received, as that the Senate acknowledged themselves to be ridof a Monster.

Maximinus his intemperance in diet. Iul. Capitol. Eusseb. Eccles. hist. lib. 6. cap. 27.

(7) Hee was, as is said, exceedingly tall, his body great, and joints proportionable, faire of face, full eies, and of such strength as is uncredible: and according to his limmes, so was his diet; for hee daily devoured forty pound waight of flesh, and thereto drank six Gallons of wine. He died aged sixty yeeres and odde, when he had raigned three yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirty and eight.

{PVPIENVS MAXIMVS / CLODIVS BALBINVS} Emperours.

CHAPTER. XXIX.

Pupienus Maximus Emp.

Cladius Balbinus Emp.

Pupienus Maximus and Clodius Balbinus thus elected together for Emperors, the one in action, and the other resident, a great sedition chanced betwixt the Senate and Souldiers, which grew to a bloudy issue among the Citizens, and Rome it selfe was set on fire in sundry places; the Emperors presence and authority little prevailing: which strucke such feare into their hearts, that they accounted these times most unfortunate, and themselves and present estate to be most desperate. But the death of Maximinus (and his head happily brought them at the instant) gave present life to their dying hearts. And Pupienus coming to Aquileia, as much quieted the Army; sent backe the Lieutenants to their places of charge, and with great pompe and praise returned to his Fellow-Emperour.

(2) The parentage of Balbinus is reported to bee both both noble and ancient, made Citizens of Rome by great Pompey, and himselfe borne at Cales in Spaine. Pupienus Ancestors were much latter, yet had hee borne many Offices of Magistracy, and ever discharged them with wisedome and valour: both of them highly accounted of in Rome.

Jul. Capitol.

(3) Peace thus established beyond all expectation, with shouts and applauses the Emperours enter the Senate-house, where (according to the custome and their deserts) they were stiled, The Fathers of the Senate, with thankes as to the onely preservers of their lives and estates: and some extolling the Senate highly for their provident foresight, in electing such sapient and worthy Emperors, contrary to the rash and undiscreet practise of such as chose their governours to fit their owne fancies, rather then the charge to which they advance them; and whose bad lives brought commonly their untimely, but deserved deaths. The Pretorian Souldiers tooke themselves to be taxed with those aspersions, and the rather because the German strangers were brought in to be of the Guard, as if themselves were not to bee trusted: so turning their spleene against the present Emperours, sought to set up a new, which shortly after they found opportunity to effect.

The Emperours envie one another.

(4) For these Emperours, though aged and wise, were not so linked together in affection, as they were neere joyned in authority: and therefore the winde of emulation had the easier passage betwixt the chinkes of their owne conceits; the one prizing his wisedome and government to be more judicious; the other, his birth and Nobility to be more honourable, and each of them having his own Guard, stood upon his owne Guard, though one Palace contained them both: and both their endevours ever well consorting for the businesse of the Empire.

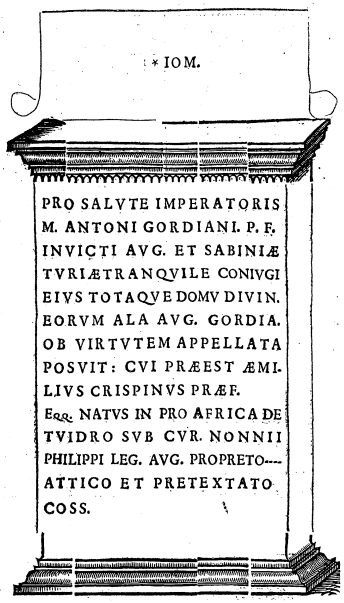
(5) At this time the Provinces of Parthia and Germany grew unquiet, and, by civill discords, endangered their subjections: to represse which, the Emperors agreed to goe in person, the one into the East, the other into Germany. Now whilest these great preparations were in making, the Capitoline-Games were celebrated in Rome, whereunto all (almost) resorted, but especially the new-come Guards of the Emperors. The Pretorians finding the advantagious time, which they had long waited for, suddenly in armour assailed the Court; which Pupienus perceiving, sent in all haste for Balbinus, and both their Guards for defence. But his Fellow-Emperour, upon a vaine suspicion detracted time himselfe, and hindered the forwardnesse of the Guards, so that these Traitours had easie accesse into both the Emperours Chambers, where in their rage they dispoyled them of their Imperiall Robes, and haled these poore aged and innocent Emperours, like two theeves thorow the middest of the Citie: Lastly, they slew them, and left their bodies to despightfull ignominy.

(6) These Emperours raigned together one yeare, and somewhat more, and dyed the yeare of Christ two hundred thirty nine: in which yeare happened so great an Eccliпse of the Sun, that the nooneday thereby became as darke as the mid-night.

M. ANTONINVS GORDIANVS.

Chapter. XXX.

M. Antoninus Gordianus. Emp.



An. Dom. 239.

GOrdianus (for Antoninus he might not be called, a Law formerly acted inhibiting the same) was the sonne of a daughter to old Gordianus (that had made away himselfe in Carthage, as is declared) at the age of eleuen yeares was created Cæsar by the Senate, with Pupienus and Balbinus; and at their deaths by the Pretorian Souldiers, elected Emperour, not yet fully fourteene yeares of age. Greatly was hee strengthened by the Alliance and Counsell of one Misitheus, his Prefect and Instructer, whom for his great learning, he so honoured and loved, that he tooke his daughter for his wife; and by whose onely direction, he prosperously administred his State affaires.

(2) Touching the affaires of our Provinces proceedings, or what Lieutenants were imployed in Britaine since Virius Lupus there placed by Severus (since whose death our Story hath spent twenty seven yeares) we finde not recorded. Yet now in the raigne of young Gordianus some glimmering light for her Government appeareth by an Altar stone found in Cumberland at a place then called * Castra Exploratorum, with an inscription for the happy health of the Emperour Gordian the third; his wife Furia Sabina Tranquilla, and their whole Family: which votive Altar was erected by the Troupe of Horsemen furnamed Augusta Gordiana; when Æmilius Crispinus, a native of Africa, governed the same under Nonnius Philippus Lieutenant Generall of Britaine, in the yeare of Christ, two hundred fourty three, as appeareth by the Consuls therein specified: whose forme and inscription we have followed by the Stone it selfe, now remaining at Connington among many others, in the custody of Sir Robert Cotton Knight Baronet.

Thence marching to Antioch, recovered the City, forcing Sapor to forsake the Province, and to content himselfe with his owne demaines.

Homer Iliade. A. Misitheus poysoned by Philip.

(4) But long this Sunne went not without a Cloud, nor his favourable fortunes without a checke; for Misitheus, his Nestor, paying Natures debt before it was due (being poysoned by Philip, as Eutropius affirmeth) was wanting in counsell, and missed for trust: to supply which, Philip (an Arabian and of ignoble parentage) was made his Prefect; wife (I must needs say) had hee beene moderate; and valiant in Armes, had he beene true. But the glory of a Diadem beheld with the false light of ambition, so dimmed the eye of his dutifull affection, and blinded the senses of his aspiring mind, that hee, who from nothing was risen to bee something, thought that also nothing worth, whilst it was shadowed with the name of a subject. First therefore hee sought to winne credit with the Souldiers, to whom hee was facile; to regard the poore, to whom he was liberall; and in all things to outstrip his Soveraigne, to whom he was treacherous. Yong Gordianus unable to endure his Prefectors designes, or his owne disgraces, and perceiving the marke whereat hee aymed, complained his wrongs in open assemblies, and to the Souldiers after this tenor.

Philip his treachery.

Gordianus his speech to the Souldiers.

" (5) I got not this state from my Parents by " birth, nor yet by any deserts (I must confesse) in " my selfe, being the least of many that did deserve
" it better: but it was you, my fellow Souldiers (up-
" on what fate I know not) that have made me what " I am. If then I have defrauded your hopes, by " carrying my selfe under your expectations, I wish
" to bee set in the place where I first was; or rather
" (if I so deserve) my life, and state, may at one in" stant be ended by your unerring hands: For Noble
" minds cannot brooke to bee curbed with the bit of " base indignities, nor suffer their vassals to bee Cor-
" rivals of their Majesty. It is a jealous object (I " must needes confesse) and many times casts great
" suspition when is small occasion: but I, for my " part, have alwayes thought of that humour, that " men causelessely jealous, doe most justly deserve
" what they unjustly feare; and both your selves
" will bee my witnesses, how farre I am from the " touch of that staine, and also the daily occurrents
" of my Cæsar, (if so low I may terme him) doth
" make more then manifest. I am but yong, yet elder
" by sixe yeares then I was; my body tender, yet ex" posed to the chance of warre; my counsell raw,
" yet bettered by your wisdomes; and my conquests
" in my selfe nothing, but yet in your valours both
" glorious and famous. What then are mine errours,
" that I may amend them? or your discontents, that " I may redresse them? for by the powers of heaven
" I protest, it is your loves which I most esteeme, and
" the good of the Empire, for which I onely wish to " live; the first is in your powers to bestow at your " pleasure, but the other in me (if it be possible) shall " live even after death.

(6) These complaints notwithstanding, Philip so politickly, nay, rather traiterously, brought his owne projects to passe, as that the yong innocent Emperour was displeased, and abandoned of all: in which distresse he first sued to be made his Cæsar, and that denyed, to be his Pretorian Prefect: but neither would be had, yet at length the charge of an ordinary Captaine, was with some difficulty granted him. But Philip bethinking himselfe of the greatnesse of Gordianus his bloud, his love and esteeme both in Rome and the Provinces, and his owne vertues equalling any, hee commanded him to be slaine in the twenty two yeere of his age, and the sixt of his raigne. The Senate hearing thereof, elected M. Marcius, and after him againe, L. Aurel. Severus, Ostulianus. But Philip through the giddy multitude, prevailed against both. This Emperour though yong, so well demeaned himselfe, that the Senate by authority added to his titles TVTOR REIPVBLICÆ, and PARENS PRINCIPVM POPVLI ROMANI; and after his death even by his owne murtherers, his Monument of faire Stone was raised in the confines of Persia, and upon his Sepulcher this inscription set:

Gordiana slaine.

DIVO GORDIANO VICTORI PERSARVM VICTORI GOTTHORVM VICTORI SARMATARVM DEPVLSORI ROMANARVM SEDITIONVM VICTORI GERMANORVM SED NON VICTORI PHILIPPORVM.

To the Sacred Gordianus vanquisher of the Persians, Gothes, and Sarmates, extinguisher of the Roman Civill discords, and subduer of the Germans, but not of the Philippians.

Pompon. Lætus.

(7) Hee was of condition most noble and lovely, of behaviour gentle, very studious and given much to learning; having in his Librarie no lesse then threescore and two thousand Bookes, as is reported. The truth is, that wicked people were not worthy long to enjoy so vertuous, so clement, so peerelesse an Emperour. Hee dyed in the moneth of March, in the yeere of our Redeemer two hundred forty five.

Iulius Philippus, Cæs.

An. Dom. 245.

WHat man is there, who considering those forepassed murthers, of so many, and so mighty Monarches, would not, by the spectacle of others calamities, bee induced to preferre the security of a moderate estate, before the desire of Soveraigntie; whose glorious content is only in appearance, but the cares and hazards are both reall and perpetuall? But of so attractive vertue is the Load-stone of Majesty, through the imagined felicity thereof, that most mens desires are drawne to that one point of the compasse; and if a little faire winde of fortune shall blow on them, they will lanch forth with their full sailes into the Mare incognitum, a Sea of unknowne calamities. And amongst others, such were the blind desires, and such the unhappy event of this Iulius Philippus the Arabicke Barbarian. Of parentage obscure and ignoble, as Victor and others affirme, who pluckt off the imperial robes of his Liege-Lord, to invest himselfe.

(2) Being now accepted as Emperour by the Souldiers in Parthia, he wrote to the Senate of the death of Gordianus, as though it naturally had happened, and with faire pretensions of his good purposes, but more through the feare of his Parthian souldiers, obtained their consents; whereupon shuffling up a most dishonourable peace in those parts, and declaring his sonne Philip for his Cæsar, (whose Coynes with his, we have set in the beginning of this Chapter) hee made all speed towards Rome: where, the yeere insuing, his shewes and games were exceedingly magnificent, for the celebration of the Birth-day (as we may terme it) of Rome, that being the thousand yeere from her foundation.

(3) It pleased God at length to touch this Emperours heart, both with such a sense of his owne forepast sinnes, and also with the light of heavenly truth, that hee hath the honour of being the first Emperour baptized into the faith of Christ, together with his sonne Philip, and his wife Severa: though the publike like authorizing of the same Profession was reserved for the blessed times of our British Constantine. The meanes of his conversion from Idolatry, were Fabianus, and Origen, who by letters exhorted him thereunto: and for the same Profession, were both himselfe and sonne murdered by Decius his Captaine, though others report, that Decius did rather hate Christianity for their sakes, than them for their Professions sake. And howsoever Pomponius Lætus accuseth him to bee a dissembling Prince, yet Eusebius declareth the effects of his Profession farre otherwise; for Philip (saith he) seeking to communicate with the Saints, could not bee admitted, till such time as he had made open confession of his Faith; at which time he joyned himselfe with those, who for their sinnes were brought to examination, and was placed in the roome of the Penitents, because that in many things he had beene faulty: which willingly he obeyed, and declared by his workes, his sincere and religious mind towards God. Which may the rather appeare by Sabellicus and Bergamensis, who shew, that the hatred of Decius against Philip and his sonne was conceived, for that they had committed the custody of their Treasures unto Fabianus the Christian Bishop of Rome, who baptized them, as some write; though others say, Pontius the Martyr did it.

(4) The Gothes againe descending from Scythia, infested Missia and Thracia with a mighty Army, seeking their habitations in those Countries as formerly they had done: against whose irruptions, the Emperour sent one Marinus a most valiant Captaine, who no sooner came into those parts, but drew the Souldiers into a Rebellion and proclaimed himselfe Emperour, taking (as he said) his example from Philip, that had in like sort raised his title by his Soveraignes fall: But the Souldiers that had newly erected him, as suddenly againe threw him downe, and in their mutable affections slew him.

(5) Into whose Charge was sent Decius, a man of great experience, who also no sooner was in the Army, but they forced the Imperiall Ensignes upon him, and (as some report) against his will: hee therefore sent secretly to Philip, declaring this attempt of the Souldiers, and how hee meant to make escape from them with persisting in his dutifull allegeance. But the Emperour fearing this to be but policy in Decius, left by delay he might give him more strength, omitted no time to uphold his owne, and with a mighty Army undertooke these affaires himselfe, not trusting any more to the dispose of his Captaines. And immediately departing Rome, with a sterne resolution, and over-hard hand, held the reine of that begun Expedition, whereby he presently lost the love of the Army, and Decius was accounted the more worthy of rule, whom in Verona they forthwith proclaimed Emperour, and cut off Philips head thorow the teeth, before they had departed Italy. At newes whereof, the Pretorians slew Philip his Cæsar and sonne, a man of so observable composednesse, as that he had beene never seene to laugh in all his life. And thus the two Philips ended their raignes.

(2) His Birth was noble, of the City Cabali in the Lower Pannonia, now known by the name of Hungary: himselfe well experienced, wise, and valiant, and weilded the Empire as a worthy Prince, had hee not blemished his raigne with a staine of Tyranny, and persecuted Gods Saints with such a Heathenish rage, that hee is rightly noted by learned Writers, to bee the seventh Horne of the Persecuting-Imperiall-Beast, whose savage cruelties towards the innocent Christians, is most lamentable to bee heard, but more to their smart that suffered and felt it.

But long hee raged not, ere God in his justice tooke revenge, and brake him to peeces as a Potters Vessell.

(4) For the Gothes that had invaded Mysia and Thracia, continuing their Irruptions into the bordering Provinces, drew him into an Expedition for those parts, where being betrayed by Trebonianus Gallus his owne Captaine, he saw his two sonnes, Decius and Hostilianus, (whom he had admitted in fellowship of Empire with him, and whose monies wee have with his expressed) slaine before his face; and himselfe to intombe his body, as a last refuge, in a deepe whirlepoole; wherein it was so swallowed up, as it could never be after seene; having no other honour of Burial, nor place of remembrance where his bones should rest. And according to his Death, so was his Descent: for neither hath he Father, Mother, nor Wife mentioned (for ought I know) by any Writer, (for of Salustia Barbia Orbiana, it is doubtfull whether to him or his sonne Hostilian she were wedded;) nor his Acts so exactly registred, as were those of the preceding Emperours, his sinnes so deserving it, and God in his revenge so punishing it.

Chapter XXXIII.

Trebonianus Gallus. Emp.

Vibius Volusianus. Emp.

An. Dom. 252.

THis overthrow of the Romans, and death of Decius, in outward semblance was so grievously taken by Trebonianus Gallus, that no man was so forward for revenge as hee, and therefore the last in suspition of Treason. The Army hee strengthned, and daily encouraged, pretending great service against those barbarous Scythians, but all to gaine credit and liking of the Souldiers, whereby he soone atchieved his desire, and with their applauses was proclaimed Emperour.

Pompon. Laetus. Blondus. Sabellicus.

Gallus declared Emperour. His parentage.

(2) By Birth, he was descended of an honourable Family in Rome: but true honour cannot harbour where dwelleth treachery and falsehood, as it was with him, when appointed by Decius to bee Governour of Mysia, and to keepe the passages from the invading Gothes, the desire of Rule so corrupted his minde, that he plotted with them against the Army, and betrayed the trust and life of his Soveraigne.

(3) Neither is hee stayned with the blot of Treasons onely, but also with a careless and cruell government; for with the Gothes he made a dishonourable peace, whereby the Romans (who were Lords of the World) became Tributary by a yeerely pay to those uncivill Scythians; who nevertheless in short time brake their Truce with him, sacking and spoiling the Provinces of Thrasia, Mysia, Thessalia, and Macedonia: the Persians then also by their example entring Mesopotamia and Syria, made spoile even thorow Armenia.

Pompon. Laetus. Blondus. Sabellicus.

(4) Gallus little regarding these troubles abroad, consumed his time idly in Rome, rather as a Bondman to his owne voluptuous desires, then a Conquering Monarch; taking for his companion and Fellow-Emperour, his sonne Volusianus, as appeareth by inscription tion of Coine placed before, a very childe, whose yeeres did quit him of Capitall Crime. But himselfe not perceiving the unfortunate successe of Decius for persecuting the innocent Christians, stumbled (as Eusebius saith) at the same stone, and banished them whose Prayers preserved his prosperous estate: at which time followed so universall a Pestilence, that no Province in the world was free from the same; and his wicked Life and most unfortunate Raigne hastned now unto their period.

Æmilianus Maurus his victory.

(5) For the Gothes continuing their furies begun, his Generall Aemilian Maurus overthrew them with a wonderfull slaughter; whereby hee grew so famous, and Gallus so contemptible, that the Souldiers (ever affecting change) proclaimed him Emperour; the newes whereof soone roused Gallus from the Bed of his lascivious pleasures, and with his sonne entred the quarrell against Aemilianus, whose fortune was to slay them both in fight, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, two hundred fifty three, after hee had raigned not fully two yeeres, and lived (as Victor testifieth) fortie and seven: whereupon the Armies joyning their forces together, conferred the Imperiall Title and Ensignes upon the Conquerour.

Chapter XXXIV.

Maurus. Emp. Aemilianus.

An. Dom. 253.

Aemilianus Maurus his descent.

AEmilianus succeeding Gallus by the only election of the Mysian Army, was by birth an African in the Province Mauritania, of Parentage base and obscure; who being risen by the Warres from meane places of service, and no better then a Common souldier aspired to the charge and credit of a Captaine Generall.

(2) His Election at first was contradicted by the Italian Bands, in favour of Valerianus their owne Leader, whom they sought to raise Emperour, the Senate also inclining thereto, the fame of the man among them was so renowned. The most voices therefore were heard on his side. Some have rather accounted Aemilianus an Usurper, then rancked him in the Catalogue of lawfull Emperours.

Eutropius.

(3) But seeing Eutropius doth allow him the place, we are not to dispute his title or claim; only his short time of government admitteth no matters of large discourse, being cut off in the bud, before the graft had time to spring. For his Army disliking what themselves had done, and hearing of the worths and election of Valerianus, laid downe their weapons borne in his defence, and tumultuously murdered him in the heat of their bloods, after hee had raigned in name, without action, the space almost of foure moneths.

Æmilianus Maurus his end, and discontinuance of his raigne.

(4) So unconstant is the state of worldly felicity, and may be compared to a masterlesse Ship, which without Tackle is left to the mercy of the raging Seas, that is one while carried with the faire winds of hope towards the haven of wished desires, but straightwayes overwhelmed with the waves of despaire: and most especially him that is borne upon the opinions of the giddy multitude, now carried aloft upon the flouds of their fawning favours, and anone left in the sands of their retiring ebbes, with a sudden shipwrack of all their fore-gone fortunes. And these adventures too soone Aemilianus felt, who the same yeere that he thus put forth to Sea, lost all his adventure, and therewith also his life, Anno 253.

CHAPTER XXXV.

An. Dom. 254.

IF ever the saying of the wise Athenian Solon (spoken to Crœsus the rich King of Lydia) was true, That no man can be happy before the day of his death: then most truely may it bee verified of this Valerianus the next succeeding Emperour: whose yeeres were multiplyed with increase of honour, untill they came to seventy and seven, but then were clouded with such ignominious miseries, as the like had never hapned to any Romane Emperour before him, and (I may well say) to no other Monarch in the world before living: such is the Ordinance of our great God, sometimes from the Dunghill to raise men of low degree, and to place them with Princes in the Chaire of Majesty; then againe to bring downe the Mighty from their Seate of glory, and to leave them chained with the poorest captives, and basest Vassals. For such was the State of that Great and Proud King of Babel, who from the height of Majesty fell into the conditions of an unreasonable Beast; and so was it with Valerianus, though not utterly abandoned from the Society of men, as Babels King was: yet was hee carried Captive unto a nation whose Society was scarce humane, and where his usage was more then barbarous.

Herodot. in Clio.

Dan. 4. 27.

(2) This man was both nobly descended, and of so great esteeme among the Romans, that being but a private man, and then also absent, they chose him for their Censor, an Office of high dignity, conferred ever upon the Best, as Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the History of his life, hath declared. Eusebius reporteth his beginning to have beene gracious and milde towards the Christians, above any of his ancestors whatsoever: yea even those who were themselves openly accounted Christians; insomuch, that his Clemency was their Protection, and his court the Sanctuary of their safeties. But Satan (whose hatred sleepeth not) stirred up an Egyptian Sorcerer against them, who so inchanted the Emperours heart, that with great cruelty he began the Eighth persecution, and so raged that some have appropriated the sayings of the Apocalyps in the thirteenth chapter unto him, as to whom power was given for two and forty moneths over the Saints of God, and a mouth to utter great blasphemies: Of which opinion is the ancient Dionysius Alexandrinus. Many indeed were the Martyrs that he caused with horrible tortures to dye, and more had done, if the just revenging hand of God had not cut him off.

(3) For Sapor the savage King of Persia, making great spoile in Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, drew Valerian from Rome into Mesopotamia, to withstand his rage; where striking Battell with him, was left (either by Treason or Chance) without sufficient Guard to secure his Person, and was there taken prisoner by the Persians; having then raigned seven yeeres (whereof two were spent in spilling of the bloud of Saints) and thence forward, the rest of his life was enthralled to a most miserable and mercilesse servitude: For the Tyrannizing Persian puft up with this fortunate gale, to an excessive swelling pride; whensoever hee was disposed to take Horse, made Valerianus his Foot-stoole, causing this Greatest Monarch of the World to whom all Nations did homage, to bow downe his necke and backe for himselfe thereon to tread, and mount unto his Saddle: In which unsufferable slavery, his old body indured without releafe, to the end of his most wretched life, which by some Authors account was full seven yeeres more; the very time of the Babylonian Kings abasement.

Pagan. Latin.

Aurelius Victor.

(4) But herein the misery of Valerianus is much greater then Nebuchadnezzars was, in that God both restored him to his former glory, and indued him with heavenly grace to confesse his sinnes: whereas Valerianus perished in the desperate calamity whereinto he was falne; as Eusebius shewes in these words: And thou Valerian, forasmuch as thou hast exercised the same cruelty in murdering the subjects of God, therefore hast prooved unto us the righteous Iudgement of God, in that thy selfe wast bound in chaines, and carried away for a Captive slave with thy glorious Purple and thy Imperiall Attire, and at length also commanded by Sapor King of the Persians, to be slaine, and powdred with salt, hast set up unto all men a perpetuall Monument of thine owne wretchednesse.

Eusebius in Ser. ad conventum Sanctorum.

(5) How unspeakeable the cruelties were which this wretched Emperor endured by that Tyrant, may hence appeare, in that not onely those which were Allies to the Roman Empire, but also the Barbarous Kings, and friends of Sapores were moved with commiseration, and distaste, as Trebell. Pollio proveth by the copy of one he produceth from King Belsolus, as followeth.

"Belsolus King of Kings to King Sapor greeting. If "I were assured that the brightnesse of the Romans "might be dimmed, or their Imperial greatnesse were "at the ebbe of their fall, I would with thee rejoyce "for thy present fortunes, which in thy owne conceit "are glorious to thee, and beneficiall to us all thy "fellow Princes: but take heed thy pride deceive thee "nor, that thou be not a hurt to thy successors, and unto "us all; for one Ship drowned by tempest doth not "minister destruction to the whole Fleete, nor one "overthrowne assure a full conquest. But rather con- "sider how many Nations of enemies, the Romans "have made vassals to their Empire. The Gaules wee "know have sacked Italy it selfe, and have set the "City of Rome on fire, but now we see them a servile "nation, and themselves made subject to the Romans. "The Africans likewise ere this have given them ma- "ny overthrowes, yet at this day the dice is cast, and "the Africans chance is, to serve the Romans. To let "passe more ancient and remote examples, Mithri- "dates King of Pontus, and lord of al Asia, far mightier "then thou, was by the Romans overthrowne, and Asia "made a province unto their subjection. They have "lost, thou wilt say; but what a weak old mã though "an Emperour: their strengths little lessened, having "choise sufficient both of election and revenge. Thou "hast won, but how? by valour? Nothing lesse; "but by treachery, and that also by thine enemies as- "sistance: yet herein assure thy selfe, that their fide- "litie to thee-ward is of no firmer assurance. Follow "then my counsell; make benefit of the occasion, "deliver the Romanes their Emperour, whereby thou "mayest obtaine with them a perfect peace for thy "selfe and us; and so I conclude that thy fortunes "are great, and whereof I am glad, if thou thy selfe "know how to use them.

Other Princes also of the East, as of the Bactrians, Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, inhabiting Mount Taurus, had such sense of these ignominious usages, that they disdained to receive the Letters from Sapor of his Victorious successe, and sent their Ambassadors to Rome, proffering their assistance for the redemption of their Emperour; yet all availed not, and Sapor held still his Prisoner, abating nothing either of his owne pride, or his Captives misery, but in the end (so hellish a fiend is revenge) commanded his Eyes to bee pulled our, and so for age and griefe hee died, as Eusebius saith: but Agathias (a writer of credit) reporteth, that hee was flaied alive by direction of this unhumane King. Thus did God punish one Tyrant by another, and thus himselfe felt those torments unpitried, which hee had without pitie inflicted on others. The race of whose Raigne is accounted to be seven yeeres before his Captivitie, wherein he lived almost so long as Galienus his sonne sate Emperour, and died in the yeere two hundred sixtie one.

Valerianus had his Eyes pulld out.

CHAPTER XXXV.

An. Dom. 261.

VALERIAN now Captive in Persia (while Odenatus grasping the advantage, tooke upon him the Empire of the East, and the now guideless Army of Rome, occupied onely in spoile and mutiny, their Leaders in faction, and the whole State astonished in affrighted terrour and amazement) Balista (a gallant Romane gentleman) mooved with the instant misery of the Commonwealth, resolved by electing anew an Emperour, to prevent the apparant ruine of his owne Countrey: yet never in this his worthy resolution, once dreamed of Gallienus, (though before chosen Augustus in the full fortune of his father) but the affection of the Army forcibly setled the Garland upon Marcian and his two sonnes, as the most worthy; who with his eldest not long after was subdued by Aurelius usurping Illyrica (against Gallienus then received Soveraigne by the Romane Senate) and his youngest betraied to murder by plot of Odenatus, left the distracted Empire to those there; of which the last disdayning much the indignitie offred to the State of Rome by that base captivitie of Valerian, whose calamity nothing touched the sense of his unnaturall sonne, entred a warre against the Persians, and tooke from them their Cities Nisabis and Carras. But such was the moderation of this man, that although he had power of an independant Soveraigntie, yet he held still a good correspondency and intelligence in all his actions of Government, with Galienus, to whom he sent (as monument of Victory and Revenge) such of the Persian Nobility as became his Prisoners: and thus Odenatus did conquer, and Galienus triumph. But such was the baseneese of Galienus, that when he could not by any Princely vertue in himselfe, ecclipse the true merit of Odenatus, he endevored to deface by treachery what he could not suppresse by valour. But in this failing, he made him then (through feare) copartner of his Empire, stiling him Augustus, and stamping his face and the Persian Triumph upon the publike Coine of the State, by approbation of the Senate; leaving him alone to defend those Frontiers of the Empire, whileft himselfe, neither regarding his old fathers miseries, (most miserable that he had so unnaturall a sonne) the dishonour of the Romane State, nor the revolts of the Provinces, whereof newes was daily brought him, spent his unprincely thoughts upon fruitlesse devices, as in reserving sundry Fruits and Flowers, that they might grow greene and flourish all seasons of the yeere; and (which was worse) upon women and wanton dalliances. Yet had he a Lady of excellent beautie and allurements, Cornelia Salonina Pipara, to his wife, the daughter of the King of the Marcomani; whose feature wee finde often minted upon her Monies. His sonne by her Saloninus he adopted Cæsar, whose of whom there is no more remembred in Story, then that he was borne noble, trained up princely, and perished through the errours of his father, and not his owne. And to his brother Licinius Valerianus (to whom the father had given the title of Cæsar) he added the honour of Augustus. And therefore we have not held it improper, to adjoyne to his their monies in the front of his life.

both in the Heavens and the Earth, manifested his wrath that sate upon the Throne of Iasper; from whose presence issued Thundrings, Lightnings, and voyces. For (by Writers of best credit) the Sunne was clouded as under sackcloth, and not seene for many dayes together; Earth-quakes great, and fearefully resounding, overthrew Cities and other edifices, shaking the ground so terribly, that vast Caves, and hideous gaping bowels of the earth were thereby laid open, and whereout (no lesse strangely) flowed great streames of salt waters. The Earth roared, and seemed to thunder, when there was no voyce heard in the aire. The Sea over-swelled her bankes, and and brake into many Continents, drowning Countries, Cities, and People: and (besides all these) so violent a Pestilence raged, that in Rome no lesse then five thousand persons died in a day.

(3) These miseries somewhat mooved this Heathenish Emperour to remorse: and thinking thereby to pacifie the wrath of the Divine powers, he stayed the Persecutions of the Christians, sending out his Edicts in favour of them. For not onely the Heavens, Earth, and Seas declared the anger of their God, out of whose mouth went a two edged sword, but the Provinces also seemed to be removed out of their places. The Souldiers of all parts electing their owne Generals, advanced no lesse then thirty at once; who assumed the title of Emperours, but are recorded to Posterities by the name of Vsurping Tyrants. And as they were all deadly opposite each to other, so were they joyntly almost all bent against Galienus; whereby the Roman Empire was more oppressed with her owne forces, then ever it had been by forraine powers. And since sixe of them assumed the Purple Robe in this Westerne Angle of the Empire, it will not be impertinent to the course of Story, with a light touch to remember them, and to expresse their Monies, as we have done the rest of those that held the reines of government in these parts of the Romane World.

Thirty Emperours at once.

Fla. Claudius Emp.

An. Dom. 269.

M. Cassius Labienus Posthumus after the death of Saloninus (who was committed to his education by Gallienus) assumed the Empire, by ayde and encouragement of those of Gallia, over whom he had borne the office of Lieutenancy by favour of Valerian the Emperour. And these againe, as all Populars greedy of Innovation, from him and Iunius Cassius Posthumus his sonne, tooke both honour and life, after tenne yeares government. This opportunity either made by L. Aelianus, or fitly taken, mounted him up with ease into that Emperiall throne, in which he sate not with like fortune of continuance, though of confusion. To this man succeeded together, M. Aurelius Victorinus and Lucius his son; both in a tumult neere Coleyn by their souldiers murthered. And had not the inordinate lust of the elder, blemished his other vertues, he had to all the most excellent Emperours beene nothing inferiour, in the best of their other vertues.

(4) The restlesse humor now of the giddy Commons, next setteth it selfe upon Aurelius Marius, a Soveraigne sutable in his meane condition, to their base affections (for hee was no better then a Blacke-smith) yet to him a man of their owne meanes and making, they were no lesse unconstant and cruell, then to the rest; after three dayes, setting an end of his government, with a sword of his owne forging. And therefore Piveisius Tetricus, the father and son, though ascending the throne of Majesty, with the greatest applause of that people, and filling it up with much merit and happy successe of their owne; when they considered the insufferable insolencies and desperate practises of that prophane ranke, chose rather to adorne Aurelians Triumph, in a voluntary captivity, then to live and rule at the devotion of a lawlesse multitude. And these times seemed no lesse fatally bent to bloud, disorder and tyranny in other parts as well as these: For the Pannonians raised Ingennus: The Mysians, A. Regillianus: The Aegyptians, Aemilianus: In Africa, Celsus was proclaimed: In Illyricum, Aureolus: and in the East, Odenatus, (a man the more famous for Zenobia, his glorious and magnanimous wife; Whose valour was so feared of Gallienus, that to make him his, hee admitted him his Fellow Emperour, with the Stile of Augustus, as wee have remembred before). The[a] Germans invade Italy: The[b] Gothes waste Greece, Pontus and Asia; The Samaritans seize[c] Austriche and Hungary: The Persians robbe Syria: The Saxons breake into Gallia: The Frankes into Spaine: In a word, all are in uproares, the second seale opened, and the Red-horse prepared for Battaile, whose Rider received a great and sharpe Sword, with Commission given him to take Peace from the Earth: and these times of troubles are so famous in Story, and the revolutions of acts so agreeable to the words of the Prophecy, that they may seeme justly a most exact accomplishment of that sacred vision.

(5) Finally, when Gallienus had raigned from his first Associating with his Father the terme of fifteene yeeres, Martian, Heraclianus, and Ceronius, three of his principall Captaines, (compounding together that one of them should be Emperour) plotted his death, whiles hee besieged the City Millan, where they traiterously murthered him, the yeere of our Lord two hundred sixty nine, after that hee had suffered the Empire to be rent in peeces, and usurped by many Forraine and barbarous Nation.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

ROMES glory thus declining, and the Imperiall Foundations thus undermined, the aspiring tops of all that beauteous frame began to shake, and to foreshew the signes of her approaching fall. And had not the Fates even at that instant raised a stay to underprop the Walls, those mounted Towers which so long had braved the Skie, had been laid levell with the Ground, and made the ruines of All-consuming Time.

(2) For whereas by the strange confusions under the late Emperour, the Eagles body was burdened with the waight of those thirty heads at once: of which number though many of them by their owne mutuall tavening were consumed before the death of Galienus, yet the mighriest, as Aurelius Governour of Dalmatia; Tetricus and Victorinus, who held Britaine and Gallia; and Zenobia (the Heroicke Queene and Wife of Odenatus) all the East; to omit the Murderers of Galienus, that durst not make their claime, (their deed so ill digested) all these were still remaining and strong, at such time as Flavius Claudius by the Souldiers was elected before the Walls of Milan, and confirmed with much joy by the Senate in Rome.

(1) This Flavius was descended of noble Parentage, out of Dalmatia, by some; or as others say, of Dardania, and sprung from the Trojan bloud. But Aurelius Victor will have him the sonne of Gordianus the Emperour before spoken of. Howsoever, a most worthy man he was, an excellent Capraine, of singular continence, a just Iudge, a lover of strangers, severe to the wicked, but most benigne to the vertuous: so that we may well say, In Rome was a new world; or at least, In the world was a new Rome.

(4) His first Expedition was against Aurelius, that held Milan, whom he there slew, and joyned his souldiers to his owne strength. But preferring the generall good before his particular quiet, he addressed his warres for the East, against the Gothes, who (as Iornandes their Story-writer reporteth (had infested those parts of the Empire (for fifteene yeares continuance) with continuall irruptions, and had now lately entred friendship with many other like barbarous Nations, invading Thracia, and the Countries before them, even unto Macedonia: and thence taking their way thorow Hungarie, came downe the River Dambie, with two thousand saile of Ships, fraught with Munition and Men. To meet these, Claudius prepared: but before his Encounter, he wrote thus to the Senate:

(5) "Renowned Fathers, and Reverend Lords, understand ye for certaine, that three hundred and twenty thousand men of warre are entred our Confines, "whose weight doth seeme to burden the earth it "selfe, and whose warlike preparations make these "parts of the Empire to tremble and quake; with "whom I am now to strike battell: wherein if the "Conquest be mine, the joy will be yours. But if I "fall, yet I pray remember that I fight after Galienus "hath raigned, and rent the strength of the Romans "in these remote Provinces, and after the Rebellions of "Lollianus, Posthumus, Eugenius, Regillianus, Celsus, "and others, who have so weakened the sinewes of "our Armes, and broken the Swords and Launces of "our defence that I may well say, We want, if not "strength, yet weapons wherewithall to fight. And "to our shame be it spoken, Zenobia a Woman com-"mands all our Crosse-bowes, and bends them against "our unarmed brests. How finall soever therefore "our performance shall bee in this service, repute it "(I pray) for great, and wish our proceedings may "sort to the weale of the Empire.

Iornandes. Gothes vanquished.

(6) Which done, with no daunted spirit he entred Battaile, and with more then wounted courage fought so valiantly, that he slew and tooke Prisoners, to the number of three hundred thousand fighting men, with two thousand Ships laden with Munition, so that whole houses were filled to their tops with Targets, Shields, Swords and Launces, and other abiliments for Warre, whereof he wrote againe to Rome: and following the Enemie with successe of Victorie, in Thracia neere Bizantium, in Macedonia, neere Thessalonica, drove the Gothes out of those parts which they had so long infested; and restored the wonted bounds of the Empire. Thence marching into German, neere the Lake called Garda, gave that revolted Nation a great overthrow, where (as Eutropius and Victor doth report) he vanquished two thousand of those strong Germans and there established againe their subjection to the Romans power. And now minding to goe forward against Tetricus and the puissant Zenobia, a Feever did first cut off his purpose, and shortly after his life: a thing very strange and rare in that age, as by the course of their raignes we have hitherto seene; not that so great a Monarch should die; (they being all of the same earthly mould that meanest men are) but that in those dayes a Roman Emperor should die in his bed, as other men doe, of a naturall death.

Flavius Claudius died a naturall death.

(7) He was of personage tall, his body well composed and strong, bright and cleere eies, his face great and full; and of life most temperate and chaste. Hee raigned one yeare, ten monethes, and fifteene dayes, and dyed the fourth of February, in the yeare of Christ, two hundred seventy one. His Statue of Gold was set up in the Capitol, & his Target of the same metall hung up in the Senate house; himselfe (in honour of his admired worth) placed among the Roman Emperours that were deified for Gods: such an estimation and love did his vertuous life procure unto him even after his death.

His personage and qualities.

Chapter XXXVIII.

A. Quintilius Emp.

An. Dom. 291.

QVintilius, the Brother of Claudius, and Vice-Roy in his absence for the Guard of Italy, was by the Armie whereof hee had command, proclaimed Emperor immediately upon the Newes of Claudius his death: The Senate as joyfully confirming his Election, as they were sorrowfull for their losse of his most worthy Brother. Brethren indeed they were by nature, and in conditions not much unlike; so that what seemed to bee lost in the one, was in the other supplied and still remaining: For this M. Aurelius Quintilius, was both wise for Civil Government, and experienced for Warres, wanting no complements of an absolute Prince.

Eutropius.

Quintilius brother to the last Emperour.

(2) But long his glasse stood not without a turne, nor his Fortunes fawning without a frowne. For the victorious Souldiers which in his expeditions had followed Claudius, and thought themselves worthy of the first voyce in Election, proclaimed Aurelianus for Emperour, a most valiant Captaine; and of whose prowesse there had beene so sufficient experience, as that Quintilius knew he could not stand against him.

And therefore mistrusting the strength of his Title, and affections of his Souldiers, repured it ignominious for a noble minde, to die with lesse honour then he attained unto, and enjoyed by his life: and therefore resolving to die an Emperour, chose rather by a voluntary cutting of his owne veines, to powre out his life with his bloud, then to hazard the chance of uncertaine warres, or to returne to his private estate.

Quintilius cut his own veins and so bled to death.

And thus no longer raigning then seventeen daies, (which short time could minister little matter of larger discourse) hee died with his brother the same moneth of February the twentieth day, and yeare of Christ his incarnation, two hundred seventie one.

Chapter XXXIX.

Val. Aurelianus Emp.

An. Dom. 271.

SO short was the Raigne of the last Emperour Quintilius, that Aurelianus who followed him may be said to be the Successor of Claudius, and not of him: being elected by his Legions in the in the East, as soone as the other had been in Italy (though confirmed before him of the Senate in Rome) continued still his rivall for Majestie, and attained the top of that high set Gole, whereof Quintilius failed, before his foot had well mounted the first step.

Aurelianus his descent.

(2) This Valerius Aurelianus was of parentage neither honourable nor rich, and yet his fortunes carried him to the height of both. Some recount his birth was of Dacia; others of Mysia; both so doubtfull, that Flavius Vopiscus, (the copious Writer of his Life) leaves it undecided, and to the censure of his Readers. His risings were by the Warres; whereunto from his childhood he had a naturall inclination: and for continuall carrying of his weapons, was commonly called Aurelianus the Sword-bearer.

Flo. Vop.

(3) His

(3) His service was sufficiently knowne to the Generals of divers Provinces, who had forty sundry times imployed him in the charge of a Lieutenant, and under Claudius in Persia, he was the Corenell of the Horse. In the warres of Sarmatia, he is reported to have slaine Forty Enemies with his own hands in one day; and in other severall times, to the number of nine hundred men, as both Vopiscus and Theoclius have affirmed. And generally so famous were his deeds, both before he was Cæsar, and after, as that he is by some compared with Iulius and Alexander.

Aurelianus compareable with Cæsar and Alexander.

(4) Vpon the ratifying of his election by the Senate at Rome, hee hasted not thither to be saluted and enstalled Emperour, but forthwith marched against the Suevians and Sarmates, who sore infested the Empire with warres: and having soone subdued them, and quieted those parts, in great haste hee came into Italie against the Germans, who with Fire and Sword had gone as farre as Milan: and them likewise with great valour hee forced thence. Then entring Rome with great pompe, caused the Walles to be repaired and inlarged, which was not lawfull but onely for Victorious Emperours. But long he stayed not, ere he returned into Syria, against the stout Queene Zenobia whose brave resolutions and warlike power for fight, her letter in answer unto him (when being sorely tired; he proffred her wealth, life, and liberty to yeeld) doth manifestly declare: the tenor thereof being as followeth.

Aurelianus inlarged the Walles of Rome.

Chap. 37. Sabellius saith she both tired him, and put him to flight also.

Zenobia her Letter to Aurelianus.

(5) "Zenobia, the most mighty Easterne Queene, "to Aurelianus, Romes Augustus, sendeth greeting: "Never Captaine to this day, in using Penne in stead "of Speare, or filed Words for Weapon points, hath "more sufficiently discharged the parts of Warre, "then thou to me in Writ hast done: wherein I well "perceive thy drift, and blame thee not, that seest me "but a Woman: which Sex you men make Subjects "onely by your smoothing tongues. But know, Au-"gustus, thou dealest not with a Roman Dame, nor "with her who upon base conditions will subscribe "her honour; but with Zenobia, the * Palmyrean "Queene, in whose womanly breast the manly heart "of great Odenatus, doth stil live and lie. These cour-"ring termes doe ill beseeme a Campe, and worser "him who would be stiled a Mars. But yet thy Gol-"den Showre hath raigned beside our Lappe; nor we a "Penus to meet thee for thy sport, but with our "Launce in hand to trie our lawfull right, and with "our Swords to answer thy demaunds in bloud. I am "a Woman; so was * Tomyris; thou knowest the rest: "in Armes against Augustus; so was Cleopatra, who ra-"ther chose to sting her self to death, then live a sub-"ject (though a Prince) under Great Octavian. Art "thou his better? thou art deceived: or I her worser "nothing lesse: who from her person doe derive my "Pedigree, and from her courage will maintaine my "cause. I am a Queene, and raigne beloved; was Romes "Empresse, obeyed and honoured; and the wife of "Odenatus, whom all you Romans greatly feared. Are "my powers weake? The Persians (whose strength "you well have tried) will supply. Are my Souldiers "few? The Saracens have more that will assist: and "the Armenians are wholly at my command. If "then Thieves and Robbers in Syria were sufficient to "overthrow thine Armie, what hope is left thee to "escape our hands, when all these our strengths shall "be thus conjoyned in one? Therefore the same of-"fers that to me thou hast sent, the same of thee I "heere returne, and will performe, if thou in time im-"brace this truce.

Zenobia vanquished.

Flav. Vopisc.

(6) This haughty answere of that undaunted Queene, put more fire to the furie of Aurelianus, who tooke the Letter in such scorne, that hee threatned death to the Inditer, (whom he supposed to be Longinus the Philosopher, who was alwayes with her, & her Instructer) which afterwards he did accomplish: for destroying her severall Aids before they could meete together, and besieging Palmyra her strong Citie, hee brought the fame to such distresse, that in the end he tooke her Captive; and glad of such a prey, carried her himselfe to Rome, where following his Chariot of Triumph, attired in Tissues and richest Robes of price, shee was led his Prisoner in Chaines of Gold: upon whose presence the Spectators with admiration so much gazed, that somewhat it dimmed the Majestie of Aurelianus: for she is said to be exceedingly faire, though not very white, but somewhat browne: her eyes blacke and bright, her teeth shining like pearles, her bodie tall, and of most stately proportion, her countenance modest, milde, and pleasing; her voyce sweet, her conversation honest, her minde chaste, and body continent; wise, temperate, and learned in the Greeke, Latine, and Egyptian tongues, having reade the Romane History in Greeke, and her selfe abridged the Alexandrian, and all the Orientall histories. Yea, the atchievement of this Conquest was held so notable that he reputed himselfe the Restorer of the East, as it appeareth by the reverse of his money here prefixed in the entrance of his raigne.

(7) These Acts of Aurelianus made him so famous abroad, and feared at home, that Tetricus which had held out against Galienus, came in under his protection, holding it more safe to be a Subject in quiet, then a Commander against an Opposite of so invincible a minde: by whom thereupon he was made Governour of Campania, and of other Provinces in Italie.

(8) Hitherto this Emperours successes were very prosperous (we may well suppose) for his indulgence to the Christians, whose assemblies he permitted, and whose Bishops he so favored, that at their request he banished Paul Samosatenus the Hereticke out of their Synods. But afterward Satan minding to sift the Wheat that the Chaffe might be his, stirred up this Emperour to raise the ninth Persecution, and to send foorth his Edicts for the destruction of Gods Saints: wch whilest he was in perusing, and about to set his hand and seale, a Thunderbolt from Heaven strucke into his presence, and so neere unto his person, that all accounted him to be therewith slaine, God warning him by this his Messenger to be wise, lest he perished in his own waies as shortly after he did, being slaine by his Servants, through the Treason of Menestheus his Secretarie, the nine and twentieth day of Februarie following, neere unto the Citie Bizantium, when he had sate Emperour foure yeares, eleven moneths, and seven dayes, the yeare of our happinesse, two hundred seventy six.

M. CLAVDIVS TACITVS.

Chapter XI.

Claudius Tacitus Emp.

An. Dom. 276.

Aurelianus being dead no man sought to be Emperour.

Senate and Souldiers striue in courtesie who shall choose the Emperour.

Eutrop. Vopiscus. Orosius. Onuphrius.

Claudius Tacitus elected Emperour.

THe former seditions ended by Aurelianus, and the state of the Empire remaining now in quiet no man appeared to sue, much lesse tumultuously to strive for that Royall Diademe; but all the great Commanders, (as though they made courtesie in giving way each unto others) stood at the foot of Majestie; no man attempting higher to mount. The souldiers sent to the Senate, to designe the man whom they best liked; the Senate requested the souldiers to elect him whom they held worthiest, in which respective complements, and most kind correspondencie of all parts, eight months passed with a peaceable Interregnum, as Writers report.

(2) It seemeth, the fresh sense and fearefull experiences of the former heady proceedings, made men more wise, then to seeke their owne death, and especially the Generals to be better advised, then to runne desperately upon their owne destructions. A change uncredible, that Thirtie ere-whiles would needs be stiled Emperours, among the tumultuous Souldiers (though they were sure to buy the use of that name with their deareſt bloud) and not one now in peace could be found, either hastly to seeke it, or very willing to accept it.

(3) At last both Senate and Souldiers, having in their eye M. Claudius Tacitus, a man very Noble and of Consular degree, of great age, singular learning, and long experience in Magistracy, him by a joint and conspiring suffrage, they all elected to their Empire: but he having before hand some inkling of this their purpose, got him out of the way, living very secretly two moneths at his Rurall Mannor, flying (saith Vopiscus) that high dignity which he fore-saw would prove his overthrow. And when they did by Embassages often sollicite him to accept of their Election; sending him the Ensignes and Stile of Augustus: he againe returned them, though with harty thanks, yet absolute deniall, alleaging by reason of his age and infirmitie, that hee was every way unable to discharge their so great expectations.

(4) But after much intercourse, and many intreaties passed, at length (the necessitie of the State so requiring) he accepted their offer, though not with much contentment to himself, who knew the weight of so great titles, would prove heavie and alwaies dangerous for him to beare; but with unspeakeable joy, was received by the whole State, which promised all blessed hopes to the Sate under so worthy, so wise, so vertuous, learned, and so just an Emperour.

Claudius Tacitus his vertues.

(5) For as before his advancement, he was of Exemplary composednes and vertuous disposition, so in this high Estate, his life was temperate, and without all pride; and so desirous to be a Precedent of moderation, and singularity unto others, as that he would not permit his Empresse to weare any Iewels of high price, nor to use other customable superfluitie, or excesse in his owne house. For learning and learned men, whom he ever embraced in his private Estate, he now by all meanes endevored to honour and advance, and publikely professed, that what Imperiall vertues hee had, hee was to ascribe them to his study of good letters. For which cause, hee was wont to call Cornelius Tacitus (that worthiest Historian of the Romans State) his Father, and commanded his workes to be carefully preserved in every Library throughout the Empire; and tenne times every yeare to be transcribed on publique cost. All which notwithstanding, many of that worthy Authors Bookes have since miscaried.

Claudius Tacitus his care to preserve the works of Cornelius Tacitus.

(6) But his vertues were too great for the world long to enjoy: and sith his Raigne was but short, it is booteleſse to lengthen it with long discourses: For his Peace continued without any memory of Warres; and his short time (wherein hee did nothing without consent of the Senate) was spent rather in reforming other mens vices, and abuses of the Lawes and State, then in displaying his owne vertues; which doubtlesse (if their faire streame had not beene untimely stopt) would have proved incomparable to any his fore-goers, and unmatchable, by any his followers. What death hee died is left uncertaine; Eutropius thinketh him slaine, by his rebellious souldiers in Asia, upon his voiage against the Persians: but Victor reporteth that hee died a naturall death, and that of a burning-fever, in the citie of Tharsus: And Flavius Vopiscus, (who wrote his life) saith his death came upon a surcharge of griefe, by reason of factions; whereby (the infirmitie of his age thereto helping) his understanding was crazed, and his heart broken; whereof hee died, when he had raigned six moneths, and twenty dayes, the yeare of Christ Iesus, two hundred seventie six.

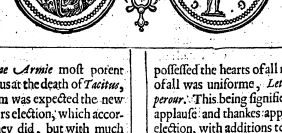
An. Dom. 277.

Florianus made himselfe Emperour.

NO sooner was the death of Tacitus divulged, but his brother Florianus (much unlike him in that point) tooke upon him the Name and Authoritie Imperiall, without expecting any election either of Senate or Souldiers; and therefore not likely long to stand sure. And although in all other princely parts he was not much unlike his brother, yet having so great an Opposite as Probus was, on whom the Easterne Armie had conferred the same Title, the blossomes of his conceived hope withered even in the budde, and perished before they had any time of growth.



(2) For, no sooner came to his eares the newes of Probus his election, but he found that heady and precipitate attempts were pleasing in their Beginnings, but full of difficulties in their Proceedings, and most disastrous in their Successe: and therefore despairing both of Men and Meanes to raise the Building, whose foundation he had so hastily (but too weakly) laid, he caused his owne veines to be cut, as Quintilius before him in like case had done, whereby he boldly bled to death, after he had enjoyed a Tituler Soveraigntie onely eighty daies, saith Eutropius: but Vopiscus saith, not altogether two moneths, and thinkes him killed by the Souldiers, in the Citie Tharsus likewise, in the yeare of Christ two hundred seventy and seven.

Chapter. XLII.

Val. Probus Emp.

An. Dom. 277.

THe Easterne Armie most potent and famous at the death of Tacitus, from them was expected the new Emperours election, which accordingly they did, but with much more wisedome and deliberate circumspection, then the Souldiers of those times were accustomed to doe. For every Captaine of the Army singled out of his owne Companies, and in severall Assemblies exhorted, that all affections laid aside, they would apply their mindes to thinke of the worthiest man, on whom they might conferre their voyces and favours. At which time, the opinion of Probus his worth had so generally possessed the hearts of all men, that the shout and cry of all was uniforme, Let us have Probus for our Emperour. This being signified to Rome, the Senate with applause and thankes approved and confirmed his election, with additions to his Title, Augustus, The Father of his Country; and the highest Bishop. For in those times, even amongst Heathens, the sacred Title of a Bishop was accounted an additament of honour even to an Emperour.

Probus called father of his Country, and the highest Bishop.

(2) He was borne in Hungary in the City Sirmia, of honourable Parentage, especially by his mothers side. His fathers name was Maximus, a man famous in Military Service, who died Tribune at the warre in Egypt: and himselfe very young, but very valorous, by by the Emperor Valerianus (who so loved him for his vertues, that he used to say of him, that of all men he best deserved the name Probus, that is, vertuous) was made a Tribune also. In which office, with great praise he served under Galienus, Aurelianus, and Claudius the Emperours: under whom, besides other exploits he fought severall single Combats to the great honour of himselfe and Country, and received as markes of victories, many Civicall Crownes, Collars, Bracelets, Launces, Banners, and other Ensignes of Martiall device and Priviledge. Preferred to be Generall in Africa, he subdued the Marmarides: In Egypt the Palmevines; under Aurelianus the Sarmater and Germans; under Claudius the Gothes; and in all places so famous for his Acts, that he was compared with Hannibal and Cæsar.

Probus comparable with Hannibal and Cæsar.

(3) His first service after he became Emperour was in Gallia, against the Germans, that had made themselves Lords thereof, where in one Battell, continuing two dayes, he slew foure hundred thousand of them, and recovered seventy Cities, from the Enemy, as himselfe signified by his own Letters to the Senate. After this warring in Sclavonia, he quieted the Province of Muscovia, Russia, and Polonia: And entring Thracia, did no lesse in Greece, Syria, Arabia, Palestina, and Iudea; whence passing into Persia, hee had honorable compositions of Narseus their mighty King. Whereupon ifsued so universall Peace, that there were no warres heard of in all the Provinces of the Empire; insomuch that it was a common Proverbe, The very mice durst not gnaw for feare of Probus. But long it lasted not, ere hee was disturbed: for the Egyptians erected one Saturninus, a Captaine both wise and valiant, for Emperour, and that so sore against his will, as he was like to be slaine by them for gaine-saying their desires; and by a speech delivered to his erectors, he made known to them his averfnesse from so dangerous an ambition; to this effect.

Saturninus chosen Emperour.

His speech to his Electors.

" (4) Fellowes and Friends; by my whose ende-
" vours I have alwayes sought to prevent that, which " now I see I cannot shunne, I meane the Throne of " Majesty, which howsoever to others, it may seeme
" full of glory and security, yet to my self, I foresee it
" will prove, both base and dangerous: Base, for that " I am no more the master of mine owne affections;
" which hitherto in my private estate were bestowed
" freely, and where I thought best; but must hence-
" forth be carried at other mens dispose, and cast upon " those that deserve them least. That litle time that I " was wont to take, in retyring my self to my self,
" must now be straitned to serve others; and my " thoughts wholly spent to prevent those weapons,
" which are borne (in shew) for my defence, but are
" (in truth) the keyes of mine Imprisonment. I cannot " go without a Guard: I cannot sleepe, without a " watch; I cannot eate without a Taster, these are but
" bondages to a free condition, and never needs in a " private fortune. That it is dangerous, it is no lesse ap-
" parant: for besides the sharpe-pointed and waighty
" sword hanging onely by a twisted thread over our " heads, Probus is not a Gallienus to compound for the " Diadem, but to touch his scepter, is to awake a flee-
" ping Lion: What should move you then, to stir up
" his wrath, to seeke my death, and your owne destru-
" ctions? For assure your selves when I die, I shall not " die alone: So all our fame purchased in so many
" yeers imploiments, shall be lost by this one dayes
" worke: and my Conquests in Africa, of the Moores,
" and in Spaine, branded lastly with the eternall scarre
" and infamy of Rebellion.

(5) These speeches (as Flavius Vopiscus the Writer therof received them from the report of his Grand-father, who was there present and heard them) could nothing at all divert the resolution of the Souldiers, but that they persisted and maintained their election against Probus: who upon notice thereof, hasting toward them with a mighty power, offered them pardon, as one unwilling to shed Civill-bloud, or to lose so worthy a man as Saturninus was: but upon refusall of his proffered Clemencie, he gave him a most sharpe battell, wherein most of the Revolters were overthrowne, and Saturninus in the assault of a Castle, besieged, was slaine, to the great griefe of Probus, who sought to have saved his life.

Bonosus and Proculus rebell against Probus.

(6) But with his death ended not all Civill Broiles: for Bonosus and Proculus, two monsters of that age (though of different kinde of vices) opposing themselves against him, and assuming the Title and Robes Imperiall, usurped the Provinces of Britaine, Spaine and some part of Gallia, knowing that in these places Probus was not much beloved. Bonosus was borne in Britaine, but brought up in Spaine, without note of action, but onely in his cups, for he was esteemed the greatest drinker of all men living: insomuch as Aurelianus said unto him, he was borne non ut viveret, sed ut biberet, not to draw breath, but to draw in liquour: and yet (as it seemeth) he was in good account under the said Aurelianus, having a charge of Ships upon the German Seas, which either by Treacherie or negligence were burned by the Enemy, in the mouth of Rhine, and (as Probus tooke it) not without the privitie of Bonosus: who therefore not daring to stand to the triall, made all his powers against the Emperour, but was in battell overcome, and despairing ever againe to make head, put his own into a haltar, whereupon it was said, that a Barrell was hanged, and not a Man.

(7) Proculus was a Lygurian borne, as unstatiate a vassall to Venus, as the other to Bacchus; and therewithall so impiously impudent, that as hee had a heart to commit any filthinesse, so a forehead to boast of it openly, as appeareth by his owne Letters, wherein hee vaunteth, how many scores of faire Virgins hee deprived of that faire name in one fortnight; but this Grand-Generall of Venus Campe was suddenly forsaken by his Souldiers, and came to his deserved end.

Sabellicus.

(8) Some stirs there were at that present in Britany by the incitements of their Governor whose name though Histories doe not specifie, yet he may seeme to be that Cl. Corn. Lalianus, whose ancient Coynes are found in this Iland, and not elsewhere: and his meanes to the place, was Victorinus a Moore, in great favour with Probus: who taking himselfe not cleare from suspicion, got leave of his Emperor to repaire unto Britaine, where giving it out that hee was come thither for safety of his life, was courteously received by the Generall. Whom secretly in the night hee murthered, and then speedily returned to Rome; having by this Expedition, both appeased the tumults in the Province, and approved his fidelity to Probus. About this time (as is recorded) certaine Vandals and Burgundians that had invaded Gallia, were sent into Britaine by the Emperour to inhabite, who though they had troubled the Romans peace in Gallia, yet did them good service in Britaine to stay their subjection; and the Britaines themselves for some good services were now suffered by these Emperours, to plant Vines and make Wines with other matters as well for pleasure as for profit.

(9) At length the Empire in these West parts standing universally quiet, Probus determined a journey into the East, to end at once all forraine wars; saying, he would shortly bring it to passe, that the State should need no more Souldiers: (which speech they tooke very indignely) and having passed Illyricum in Sclavonia, was by some of his owne Armie (for curbing, as they conceived, with an over-hard hand their dissolute and idle manners) conspired against, and treacherously murthered, in November the second, and yeare of Christ, two hundred eighty two, having raigned five yeares and foure moneths: others say, five yeares: where notwithstanding they erected for him a most honourable Sepulcher, wherein was engraven this Epitaph: Here lieth the Emperour Probus, justly for his goodnesse called Probus, of all the Barbarous Nations and Tyrants, a Conqueror.

ROBUS thus slain in the midst of his Army, without any apparant cause ministred, the Souldiers were stricken into a great feare, and mistrusted each other to be guilty of the Treason: no man therefore diligent to finde out the beginner, nor hasty to punish the bloudy executors; but holding the right of Election to remaine in themselves, they presently chose Carus for their Emperour, who had been the Pretorian Prefect, valiant, sufficient, of worth and esteem; whereunto the Senate likewise consented.

Carinus slaine by a thunderbolt.

(2) From whence or what parents we should derive his birth, is uncertaine, and of divers Writers diversly reported. For Flavius Cæcilianus, who wrote the story of his time, as Vopiscus doth report, saith, that he was borne in Slavonia, or as we call it, Moscovia. Onesimus an ancient Writer affirmeth his birth was in Rome, & that his father was a Slavonian indeed, but held for a Citizen, as he citeth by letters from Vopiscus: Aurelius Victor, Eutebius, and Paulus Orosius will have him a French man, and borne at Narbonne: but whence soever his Princely parts deserved these his princely preferments, and no wayes for the short time of his raigne, carried he himselfe under expectation. Two sonnes he had of unequall conditions; Carinus and Numerianus, these both he made his Cæsars, with the name and power of Augusti

(3) His first proceedings was to finde out the murtherers of Probus, whom he severely punished, which tooke away all suspition of treason in himself. Then marching against the Sarmates, whose fury had pierced so far into Panonia, that they threatned Italy it self, he overthrew with the slaughter of sixteen thousand, and tooke twenty thousand of them prisoners. And leaving Carinus (his elder sonne) to governe Britaine, Gallia, Illyricum, and Spaine, himselfe with the yonger, Numerianus, prepared for the East, against the Persians, in which expedition he tooke in his way Mesopotamia, Selencia, and certaine cities whom the enemy had entred: and being surprized with sickneffe, and not able to travell, pitched his Pavilion upon the shore of Tigris, where in the midst of his Army, (about the yeare of our salvation 283) garded from all suppofed dangers and assaults of man, felt the unexpected stroke of death even from the hand of God himselfe: for in his bed by a thunderbolt falling from heaven, he was slain, with many others then present with him in his Tent, and the same consumed altogether with lightning fire.

(4) The terrour thereof so daunted the courage of his whole army, that no further they proceeded in their enterprise: and his death was so grievous unto Numerianus now elected Emperour, that with continuall weeping (a fault in few sonnes who are raised by their fathers fall) his eies were so weakned, that he could not endure any light. Vpon which accident, Arrius Aper, (his wives father) took occasion to conspire his death, hoping thereby to attaine the Empire himselfe. For having at all times free accesse to his presence, at length in his closet hee secretly murthered him; pretending to the army, that his infirmity onely kept him from sight; and so leaving his body to putrifie and corrupt, in short space by the very favour thereof, the treason was descried, and the Traitor slain by the hands of Diocletian, who was both his Iudge and executioner.

Eutrop.

(5) His Empire thus ended before it was well begunne, the army proclaimed Diocletian, a Principall man in the Campe for Emperour: who to uphold his election, made all his power for Gallia, against his Concurrent Carinus, a man of profuse sensuality, who there had caused himselfe to be proclaimed, and in his fathers absence had so ruled there and in Britaine, that Porphyrio living at the same time, gave out this testimony, that Britaine was a fertile Province of tyrants. Betwixt these two Captaines, many skirmishes were fought with variable successe, till lastly in a set battell Carinus was slaine by a Tribune, whose wife he had defiled; whereby the Imperiall Title was joyntly conferred upon Diocletian.

(6) The time that these three, the father and two sonnes raigned, is reported to be two yeres and somewhat more; and this last to die the yeare of Christs Nativity, two hundred eighty foure.

Val. Diocle. Emp.

THE Empire thus devolved to Diocleſian, with approbation of the Senate, hee every way ſtudied to bee accounted worthy of the ſame, as knowing well his birth was no way anſwerable to his preſent lot: and therefore choſe for his Ceſar, Maximianus, a man of better deſcent, very honourable, wiſe, and valiant, as was manifeſt in his firſt ſervice againſt the Gaules, whom with an infinite number of peſants in that province, troubling the peace of the Romans, hee with much ſlaughter overcame. For which exploit ſo fortunately accompliſhed, the Emperour made him his Conſort in the Government.

(2) Diocleſians parentage is uncertainely reported by Writers; ſome making him the ſonne of a Notary, and others of a meere Bondman; but all agreeing that his Country was Dalmatia, and his offspring very baſe. This man being but a Common Souldier, conſulted with a Witch for his future ſucceſſe; who told him (if you pleaſe to beleeve the reporters) that he ſhould become an Emperour after he had killed a Bore: to which he gave credit, and ever was a great enemie to which he gave credit, and ever was a great enemie to that beaſt, and in time grew under Probus to ſo great account for dexterity in expediting his affaires, that he was made Steward of his houſe, and now laſtly elected to the Empire.

(3) The very firſt thing that he attempted, was the puniſhment of his predeceſſors death: for which Arius Aper being convicted before his tribunall ſeat, himſelfe riſing ſuddenly from the throne, ran him thorow with his ſword, in outward ſhew for zeale of juſtice, as not able to endure ſo foule a fact: but in truth to fulfill the Prediction of his hoſteſſe, the Druide, for that Aper ſignified a Bore. After which act, he held his Empire fully eſtabliſhed.

Carauſius a Britaine raiſeth rebellion in An. 287. Bed. hiſt. Ang. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(5) This Carauſius, by birth was a Menapian, but of low Parentage, as Beda and Eutropius ſaith; who being appointed Admirall by the Romans to guard the Britiſh Seas, from the Pyracies of the Saxons and Lower Germans, (who with continuall robberies waſted the coaſts) abuſed his authority both in ſuffering thoſe pirates to paſſe under Compoſitions, and in taking many Shippes and much ſubſtance from the true Subjects to his owne uſe: whereby in ſhort time he became very rich, and (like Cæſar to keepe mice from the larder) did more miſchiefe then the Robbers themſelves. Sabellicus reports one very politike cuſtome whereby he inriched himſelfe, and that was, by ſuffering the Pirats to take as much ſpoiles as poſſibly they could before hee would ſurpriſe them; whereby they were his inſtruments to rob others, and nothing to better themſelves.

(9) Conſtantius Clorus who had levyed an Army, and was come with great ſpeede unto Bulloigne in France, (a Towne that Carauſius had ſometime fortified and kept) hearing now of his death, determined the recovery of Britaine; and after great preparations, paſſing the Seas, in a darke fogge or miſt, upon the Shore landed his men without impeachment: which done, he fired his owne Ships, thereby to fruſtrate all hopes of eſcape. Allectus, who had layne to intercept his comming, forſooke alſo the Seas, and meeting at unawares with Aſclepiodotus, great Seneſchall of the Prætorium, as a deſperate man, haſted upon his owne death: for encountring with him, he neither ordered his Battle, nor marſhalled his men, but fought at randome very unfortunately: and having put off his Purple Garment, hee was among many other ſlaine, when he had held his eſtate the terme of three yeeres.

The Frankners and others of the Barbarous Souldiers eſcaping the Battle, ſought to ſacke London, and ſo to be gone: but as good hap was, the Souldiers of Conſtantius, which by reaſon of a miſty and foggy ayre were ſevered from the reſt, at unawares came to London, where they reſcued their Allies, and making great ſlaughter of the Enemy, ſlew Gallus their Leader, caſting his body into a Brooke that then ran thorow the City, which thence after was called by the Britaines Nant-gall, and by the Engliſh, Gallus his Brooke, thought that death was but death as well to Prince as to Peaſant: and therefore with a bold reſolution, and ayde of the Picts or Northerne Britaines, (who had beene alwayes enemies to the Romans Subjection) put on the Purple Robe, and uſurped the Authority and Title of Emperour, which hee moſt valiantly maintained in ſandry Battles, and ſo kept it for the terme of ſeven yeeres.

(8) Againſt him Maximianus ſet forward with a puiſſant Army, and marched to the Britiſh Ocean: but there underſtanding the power of his Enemy, and finding himſelfe in want of men for Sea-ſervice, hee pitched downe his Tents: and knowing Carauſius a man meete to command the Ilanders, and able to defend them againſt the other Warlike Nations, ſent him offers of peace: the making of which is remembred unto us by the Coyne of Carauſius before expreſſed, whereon are ſtamped the Portraitures of two Emperors joyning hands. So himſelfe returning againſt the Batavians, left Carauſius for Britaine, who governed the Province with an upright and unſtained reputation, and with exceeding peaceableneſſe, notwithſtanding the incurſions of the Barbarous. He reedified the wall (as Nimius the diſciple of Eluodugus writeth) betweene the mouthes of Clauda and Carunus, fortifying the ſame with ſeven Caſtles, and built a round houſe of poliſhed ſtone upon the banke of the River Carun, which (ſome thinke) tooke name of him, erecting therewith a Triumphall Arch in remembrance of Victory. Howbeit, Buchanan thinkes the ſame to bee the Temple of Terminus, and not the foundation of Carauſius.

But the date of his noble Government was brought now to a period, by the Treaſon of Allectus his familiar friend, one whom he had imployed in managing of the State, who thirſting after the Supreme Authority, betrayed his truſt, and treacherouſly murdered him by a wile, putting on himſelfe the Purple-Robe, ſtamping this his Image upon the publike Coyne as an abſolute Soveraigne, and aſſuming the Title Imperiall, about the yeere of Chriſt 294.

(10) The deaths of theſe two Vſurpers, with the recovery of the Britaines unto their wonted obedience, was accounted ſo great a benefit to the Romans, that it is moſt gloriouſly commended, and Rhetorically ſet downe in a Panegyricke Oration aſcribed to Mamertinus, in the praiſe of Diocleſian, Maximianus, and Conſtantius: where (after hee had extolled the fertility of the Britiſh Soile, and the Riches that the Empire reaped thence) he fet forth the ſtrength of the Enemy, growne to ſo dangerous a head: and concluded with this Acclamation; O what a manifold Victory was this, worthy undoubtedly of immemerable Triumphs, by which Victory Britaine is reſtored to the Empire, their Confederates brought to obedience, and the Seas ſecured to a perpetuall quietneſſe! Glory you therefore (invincible Emperour) for that you have as it were gotten another World, and in reſtoring to the Romans puiſſance the glory of the Conqueſt by Sea, have added to the Roman Empire an Element greater then all the compaſſe of the Earth, that is, the mighty maine Ocean it ſelfe: and afterwards now by your Victories (Invincible Conſtantius Cæſar) whatſoever did lye vacant about Amiens, Beavois, Trois, and Langres, beginneth to flouriſh with Inhabitants of ſundry Nations. Yea and moreover, that your moſt obedient City Autum, for whoſe ſake I have a peculiar cauſe to rejoyce, by meanes of this Triumphant Victory in Britaine, hath received many and ſundry ſorts of Artizans, of whom thoſe Provinces were full. And now by their workemanſhip the ſame City riſeth up, by repairing of Ancient Houſes, and reſtoring of Publike Buildings and Temples: ſo that now it accounteth, that the old name of brotherly Incorporation to Rome is againe reſtored, when ſhee hath you eſt-ſoones for her Founder.

(11) But leaving Conſtantius to bee further ſpoken of in his due place, let us purſue the Raignes of theſe two Tyrants, who new began the Perſecutions of Gods Saints in all the parts of the Empire, wherein the rage of Satan ſo prevailed, that ſeventeene thouſand men and women were crowned with martyrdome, within the ſpace of one month, beſides infinite numbers of ſuch as were otherwiſe puniſhed.

As in other Countries, ſo heere in Britaine the Chriſtians Churches were demoliſhed, their Bibles and other godly writings burned, and themſelves tormented with a more cruell and longer continuance then formerly had beene uſed: for this endured the terme of ten whole yeeres together, leaving no time of intermiſſion, nor place free from the ſtaine of Martyrs Bloud.

And amongſt others, it made Britaine to be honoured with the glory of many holy Martyrs, which conſtantly ſtood and dyed in the Confeſſion of the Faith; whereof the firſt is reported to bee Albane of the City Verolamium, who was beheaded at Holmehurſt (ſince called Derſwold) where now the Towne of S. Albans (bearing his name) is builc, and in whoſe honor, Offa the great King of Mercia founded a moſt magnificent Monaſtery. Of this Alban the ancient Fortunatus Priſcus in his booke of the Praiſe of Virginity, maketh mention thus:

Albanum egregium fœcunda Britannia profert.
Britaine fertill of all good,
Waſht with glorious Albans blood.

(12) His inſtructer Amphibolus afterwards apprehended, was brought to the ſame place, and whipped about a ſtake, whereat his intrailes were tyed: ſo winding his bowels out of his body, was laſtly ſtoned to death. Sundry others alſo in other places layed downe their lives for their Profeſſion ſake, as Iulius and Aaron at Leiceſter, ſaith Beda, or rather at Caer-leon in Monmouthſhire, as our Grand-Antiquary judgeth: and in Lichfield ſo many, that the place became another Golgotha, A Field of dead Corps. For which cauſe the City doth beare an Eſcocheon or Field charged with many Martyrs for their Seale of Armes even unto this day.

Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 1. 2. 3.

(15) It was the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, in the month of March, when this Tyrant ſet forth his wicked Edicts through all his Empire; that all Churches ſhould be vtterly ouerthrowne; that the Scriptures ſhould be burnt; that all Chriſtians for honour ſhould be held infamous, and all Chriſtian ſeruants ſhould bee held vncapable of freedome, that all Paſtors ſhould be inforced to offer to Idols, &c.

Euſeb. Eccl. hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 1.

(16) The fountaine and chiefe cauſe of theſe miſeries lighting on the Church of Chriſt, did ariſe from the Chriſtians themſelues, as Euſebius in theſe words declareth: After that our converſation through too much liberty and licentiouſneſſe was degenerated, and holy diſcipline corrupted, whiles every one of vs did enuy, bite, and backbite each other, waging inteſtine warre within our ſelues, and piercing one anothers hearts, with the ſharpe ſpeares of opprobrious words; ſo that Biſhops againſt Biſhops, and people againſt people were at bitter contention: Laſtly, whiles nothing but hypocriſie was in the face, deceit in the heart, and guile in the tongue, whereby miſchiefe was euen full at the brim, then began the heauy hand of God to viſit vs, &c. Where he proceedeth and ſheweth that the grieuous ſinnes of the Chriſtians, were the cauſe of drawing downe theſe iudgements on their heads.

Amos 1.3.

(17) And ſo this wicked Tyrant accordingly was but as Gods Inſtrument and Iron-threſhing ſlaile, to bruiſe the precious wheat and ſeed of the Goſpell, and to cruſh that outward glory of the Chriſtian profeſſion, which then was floriſhing in moſt parts of the world.

For after the Firſt yeere of their perſecutions, and twentieth of his Raigne, the thirteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere of Chriſts Nativity three hundred and three, hee with his Fellow Emperor (both of them by the reuenging hand of God, ſtricken with a mad humour, ſaith Euſebius) renounced the Empire, and deſcending from the Tribunall put off their Purple and Imperiall robes, whereby they againe became Priuate men.

Gal. Val. Maximianus, Emp.

Dioceſians and Maximinians reſigned up the Empire the 2. Cal. of May, in the yeere of Chriſt 304.

Galerius and Conſtantius Emperours. The Chriſtians enjoy peace.

Diocleſian and Maximianus reſigning up their Sourvaignties (as is ſaid) at the City Nicomedia in Bithynia, committed the charge thereof, and the defence of the Common-weale vnto Galerius and Conſtantius, who had beene their Cæſars: vpon which occaſion, great peace followed in the Church of Chriſt, and moſt eſpecially vnto theſe Weſterne Prouinces. For thoſe Emperours confirmed by the Senate, preſently diuided the Empire betwixt them, as two Seuerall Eſtates, and not ſubiect to one Gouernment, as formerly had beene exerciſed; which (as Euſebius hath noted) was the fatall end of the Imperiall Glory.

(2) Vnto Galerius fell the gouernment of Sclauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Egypt, and the Prouinces in Aſia, who tooke for eaſe of that burden theſe two; whoſe Coynes we haue here expreſſed:

Maximianus and Seuerus made Cæſars.

C. Galerius, Valer. Maximianus, and Aurel. Valer. Seuerus his ſiſters ſonnes, whom in the yeere of Chriſt three hundred and ſixe, hee elected Cæſars, and after Auguſti; which honours the laſt enjoyed not long, for he was ſlaine at Rome by the treachery of Maxentius, after one yeare. And the other, when hee had foure yeeres governed as Cæſar, and three as Auguſtus in the Eaſt, dyed at Tharſus in Cilicia.

Conſtantine the Great elected Cæſar.

(3) And to the lot of Conſtantius, who much at one time with his Copartner, elected his ſonne Conſtantine (ſo famous in Chriſtian hiſtory) Cæſar, fell Italy, France, Britaine, Spaine, Germany, and moſt of the Provinces in Africke: which ſeeming to him (who rather choſe to governe well then much) too ſpatious, gaue vp to Galerius all that in Africke, as too remote from the Seat of his reſidence, and eye of his direction.

Euſeb. Eccleſiaſt. lib. 8. cap. 16.

(4) This good Emperour was for his Paleneſſe ſurnamed Chlorus, by birth a Roman, his father named Eutropius, his mother Claudia, Neece to the Emperor Claudius. Himſelfe had attained the dignity of a Senator, and was both Wiſe, Valiant, Noble, and Vertuous, whoſe parts Euſebius doth thus commend.

Pompeu. Lætus.

Conſtantius was a man of ſingular clemency towards men, and piety towards God. He did not partake with him in cruelty, whoſe partaker he was in Soueraignty: neither ſtaining his Raigne with the bloud of the Saints, nor deſtroying our Churches and places of Prayer, as Maximianus furiouſly did; but rather hee reuerenced and highly honoured thoſe who truely honoured God. For which God ſo bleſſed him, that this godly Father left a more godly Sonne Conſtantine, the Heire of his well-gotten Empire.

(5) To which his vertues, other Authors adde, that hee was of great affability, loving, and gentle, little regarding his Priuate Profit, but altogether raigning to inrich his Subiects, and to that end would often ſay; That it was more behoouefull for the Weale publike, that the wealth of the Land ſhould be diſperſed into the comment hands, then to lye locked vp in Princes coffers. In which kind, ſo averſe he was from all ſuperfluities, that he may be adiudged faulty the other way: for vpon Feſtiuall dayes, and in his entertainements of Strangers, he was faine to borrow Plate of his friends (for ſuch many times are richer then their Soueraignes) to furniſh his Table and Cupbords.

(6) But aboue all other vertues, was his loving countenance and protection to the late persecuted Christians, making his Court their Sanctuary, and his Chapell their Oratory. And to winnow the Chaffe from the Wheat, hee used the like policy as Iehu King of Israel sometime had done against the Priests of Baal. For he commanded all his Officers to offer sacrifice to the Idoll-Gods, pretending to dis-court all such as refused: but contrariwise those that obeyed hee put from him, with this reproofe, that hee who is disloyall to his God, will never be true nor trustie to his Prince.

(8) Helena by birth was a Britaine, the daughter of Cœlius a British Prince, as saith Eutropius, though Nicephorus make her of Bithynia, and Beda termes her his Concubie, some an Inne-holder, and others for her person and parentage stand very doubtfull: to meet with whom, let us heare the censure of Times Chiefe Secretary, the learned Cambden in his Britannia: Constantius (saith he) what time he served in Britaine under Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Cœlius or Coelius a Britisih Prince, on whom he begat that noble Constantine the Great in Britaine; for so (together with that great Historiographer Baronius) the common opinion of all other Writers with one consent beare witnesse, unlesse it be one or two petty Greeke Authors of late time, and those dissenting one from the other; and a very learned man, grounding upon a corrupt place of Iul. This is that* Helena which in Antique Inscription; is called VENERABILIS and PIISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Christian piety, for cleansing Ierusalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord suffered, and for finding the saving Crosse, is so highly commended of Ecclesiasticall Writers.

A Church builded by Helena, in the place where our Saviour suffered.

And yet both Iewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominy and reproach, Stabularia, because she (a most godly Princesse) sought out the Cribbe or Manger where Christ was borne: and in that place where stood that Hostelry, founded a Church; for which cause she was by the Enemies of Christian Religion called an Hostesse, and (because such are commonly kind to their Guests) a Concubine also. For whose defence, let the Funerall Oration of Ambrose, made upon the death of Theodosius, answer, wherein hee doth rather commend her humility, then affirme any such base Offices in contempt of her person.

Helena buildeth another Church where the Inne stood in which our Saviour was laid in a Cratch.

They say, that this Lady was at first an Inne-holder or Hostesse, &c. Well (saith he) this good Hostesse Helena hasted to Ierusalem, and sought out the place of our Lords Passion, and made diligent search for the Lords Cribbe. This good Hostesse was not ignorant of that Guest which cured the way-faring mans hurts that was wounded by Theeves. This good Hostesse chose to be reputed a Stable-sweeper, that she might thereby gaine Christ.

And verily she was the moover and onely worker of her husbands conversion, who casting off all superstitious worships, willingly acknowledged the onely all-ruling God, suffering the Christians that had beene hid in Caves and Dens, now to exercise their Devotions publikely, and both to reedifie the old ruinate Churches, and to erect new.

(9) Of the like Piety we reade in a Queene of the like name, Helena, Queene of Adiabena (commended by Iosephus) that was a Convert to the Iewish Religion, who comming to Ierusalem to visit the Temple in time of a grievous Famine, which happened in the dayes of Claudius, sent to Alexandria for great quantity of Corne, and for dryed Figs from Cyprus, which she very charitably bestowed upon the poore. And about three stades or furlongs off from Ierusalem, built a Sepulcher with three Pyramides, wherein her selfe and her two sonnes (both Kings) were afterwards interred. But to proceed.

At which very time, Constantine his sonne escaping the hands of Gallerius, (with whom hee had beene left hostage) hasted from Rome, having belaid all the way with Posthorses for the purpose, and left them houghed for feare of pursuit, came with all speed to Yorke, and to his fathers presence; who so much joyed at his sight, that he sate himselfe upright upon his Bed, and in the presence of his Counsellors spake as followeth:

Licin. Licinianus.

An. Dom. 306.

THis Father thus departing both gloriously and peaceably, in the presence of his Sonne and sage Counsellors; the griefe in the losse of the Sire was no greater then was the joy conceived that they had gained the sonne for his Successour: all men rejoycing at the good fortune of that journey, wherein hee came to close the eyes of his dying father, and to comfort the sorrow of his mournefull Country-men. For forthwith here in Britaine by acclamation of the people, assistance of the Souldiers, and advice of Erocus King of the Alemains (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome) they proclaimed him at all hands Emperour, and Successour to that part of the world which his father held. This election was joyfully ratified by the Senate; and of all other Provinces so gladly accepted, that they accounted this Iland most happy of all other, whose chance was first to see him their Cæsar, as in these words of the Panegyrist is seene: O fortunate Britaine, and more happy then all other Lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Cæsar.

Eutrop. Eccl. hist. lib. 8. cap. 14.

Socrat. Eccl. l. 1. cap. 12.

Sabellicus.

(2) His birth (as is said) was in Britaine, and honourably descended; his father a Roman Senator, Cæsar and Emperour; his mother a Britaine, (daughter to Cœlus) a Princesse vertuous, wise, chaste, and religious: himselfe in true Piety degenerating from neither. At his first entrance hee pursued the reliques of the warre which his father had begun against the Caledonians, and other Picts, subduing the Britaines that were more remote, and Inhabitants of those Ilands that are witnesses (faith one) of the Sunnes set or going downe.

(3) Maxentius the sonne of Maximianus Herculeus, who at the death of Constantius was proclaimed Augustus by the tumultuous Pretorian Souldiers at Rome, and Romulus his sonne (whose face wee have heere with his fathers from both their moneyes expressed) was created his Cæsar (the way to that Seat of Majesty whereunto hee had too hastily and most unduly climed:) for now this Vsurper by his Necromancies, Adulteries, Persecutions and murders, was growne so untolerable and odious, that the Senate sent to Constantine, craving his ayde and redresse; who sore lamenting the sores of the Empire, and the case of the Christians, first wrote: but that taking no effect, prepared his forces against Maxentius.

Maximianus the father, either in true zeale or fained pretences (which by the sequell is more probable) tooke great offence at his sonne Maxentius unsufferable outragiousnesse; and under colour of dislikes and redresse, repaired to his sonne in law Constantine that had married his daughter Fausta, and notwithstanding his faire pretences before the face of Constantine, yet secretly he tampered with Fausta to make away her husband. But the good Lady well knowing that the bond of a child is great, but greater the love of a wife, revealed his treachery to Constantine, who caused him thereupon to be put to death, a fit end for so bloody a Tyrant. And ripe was the like destiny for his no way-degenerating sonne, against whom hee prepared his forces: and drawing Licinius Governour of Sclavonia, who was made Cæsar, to his side, by giving him his sister Constantia to wife, (a man but of an ordinary descent, though Galienus Maximinus had made him in Illyria his Copartner in the East) hasted towards Rome with an hoast of ninety thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; levyed out of Britaine, France and Germany.

(4) But knowing well that succesSe in warre dependeth more on divine assistance then humane strength, and doubtfull what God he should in this blessed enterprise invocate for ayde, (for as yet he was not fully setled in the Christian Faith, though the Gods of the Gentiles he observed altogether deceitfull) cast up in this his holy meditation his eyes Eastward to heaven, and had by divine ordinance presented to him in object the signe of a Crosse, wherein were Starres (as letters) so placed, that visibly might bee read this sentence in Greeke, IN HOC VINCE, as divers Authors report.

Eusebius.

Yet are there some from the Testimony of Eusebius himselfe, unto whom this blessed man did declare his vision, that affirme this forme being the first Greeke Character of the name of Christ (to which the reverse of Decentius hereafter expressed, as of many others may adde much probability) rather then either of these, although Tertullian and St. Ierome affirme that the latter was the very figure of the Crosse whereon our Saviour dyed: but this as a question beyond my judgement or intention, I leave to those learned Divines and others, who have laboured in that subject with curious search.

(5) This miraculous signe promising Victory and that (saith Eusebius) not in an Inscription onely, but by voyce of Angels, was so comfortable to Constantine, that with great courage he went forward, bearing before him and his victorious Army, in place of the Imperiall Standard, the forme of this vision imbroidered with gold and stones of greatest price. And as one armed from heaven, proceeded against his hellish

Pompon. Lætus Maxentius trusteth to Sorcerers. Sabellicus.

Maxentius as much depending upon his Sorcerers, was no lesse assured of the victory. In furtherance whereof, as a strategeme of warre, he framed a deceitfull Bridge over the river Tyber neere to Pons Miluius to intrap Constantine: but joyning battell, and overlaid with strokes, retired and fled, and (whether for haste, or through forgetfulnesse) tooke over the same Bridge, which suddenly failing under him, hee was with many more drowned, and Constantine remained victor. In memory whereof, he caused a triumphall Arch to be erected in the midst of Rome, wherein his Statue was imbossed, holding in his Right hand a Crosse, according to the fashion of that which hee had seene in the heavens: and upon ancient inscription in memory of this victory, this we find engraven: INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVSTISREMP. VLTVS EST ARMIS. Thus: By instinct of the divine power, with great magnanimity and helpe of his army in a lawfull warre, he revenged the cause of the common wealth, as well on the Tyrant himselfe as on his whole faction all at once. With the like successe had he warred against the Frankners in Batavia, whose victory was likewise stamped in gold, where is a Woman sitting under a Trophey, and leaning her head upon a Crosse-bow, with this inscription, FRANCIA.

(6) But as his fame increased in the minds of most, so was it as much maligned by Licinius his fellow Emperour and Brother in Law; who in his heart never favoured the Christians, howsoever for a time outwardly he suffered their Religion: but at last, seeking occasions against Constantine, he raised a cruell Persecution in the East, where he reigned with Martinianus, whom at Byzantium, and Iulius Licinius Licinianus at Arlas, he had before made Cæsars: permitting the to stampe these monies, as marks of Soveraignty.

(7) By this affliction of Gods Church, he inforced this champion of God for their defence to prepare his forces, with which he met Licinius in Hungary, where he gave him a great overthrow. But hee escaping to Byzantium, in Asia the lesse, joyned againe battell, and was there taken Prisoner: yet by the mediation of his wife Constantia, had his life spared; and was confined within the city Nicomedia; where for his treasons afterwards, hee and his sonne Licinianus that somewhat survived him, were put to death. And now the peace of Gods Saints manifestly appeared, and the progresse of the Gospell passed untroubled.

Eicinius put to death at Nicomedia, and his sonne after. Anno 326.

(8) For now (saith our Gildas) no sooner was the blasting tempest and storme of Persecution blowne over, but the faithfull Christians, who in time of trouble and danger, had hidden themselves in woods and desarts, and in secret caves, being come abroad to open sight, reedified the Churches ruinated to the very ground. The temples of holy Martyrs they founded, and erected (as it were) the Banners of victory in every place, celebrating festivall holy dayes, and with pure hearts and mouthes performing the sacred ceremonies: for the which blessednesse, he ever after had the Attributes ascribed unto him of most blessed Emperour, most pious, happy Redeemer of Romes City, Founder of Peace, Restorer of Rome, and of the whole World, most great, invincible Augustus, Sacred, Divine, and of sacred memory, &c. Howbeit, for admitting these praises, as it should seeme, he is taxed by Eutropius and Victor of pride; as also cruelty, for putting to death Crispus his sonne (by Minervina his concubine; whom he had made Cæsar, and permitted to stampe these monies here under inserted) as likewise his wife Fausta sister to Maxentius: but others affirme that the causes of their deaths were just, though (as Paulus Orosius saith) the reason thereof was kept secret, and Zosimus doth therein excuse him, as Cassiodore relateth, and so doth Rufinus and Eusebius.

(9) Touching Constantines affaires in this Iland, it appeareth by the last Author, that after his Fathers death, and his owne departure out of this Country, some aspiring mind taking advantage of his absence, in other warres, perswaded the people here to withdraw their obedience. Whereupon once againe he addressed himselfe with his Army to the reestablishing of the Ilands subjection: and passing (saith Eusebius) over into Britaine, inclosed on every side within the banks of the Ocean, he conquered the same. The joyfull memory of this expedition is registred to posterity upon his Coyne set in the entrance of this Chapter, inscribed Adventus Augusti, and by these Letters, P. L. N. the place of the Mint to be at London.

Eusebius.

(10) After this (saith the same Author) he began to compasse in his mind other parts of the World, to the end he might come in time to succour those that wanted helpe: and when he had furnished his Army with milde and modest instructions of piety, hee invaded Britaine, that hee might likewise instruct those that dwell invironed round about with the waves of the Ocean: bounding the Sunnes setting as it were with those coasts. And of the Politicall government therein by him altered, let it not seeme offensive that I, who know and professe mine owne weake sight in most of these matters, doe light my dimme candle, at the Bright-shining Lampe of that Illustrious Antiquary, who saith:

Hier. in his additions to Eusebius.

Cambden in his Britannia.

(11) About this time (saith he) as evidently appeareth by the Codeof Theodosius, Pacatianus was the Vicegerent of Britaine: for by this time the Province had no more Propretors, nor Lieutenants, but in stead thereof, was a Vicegerent substituted. And againe, Seeing that Constantine altered the forme of the Roman Government, it shall not be impertinent to note summarily in what sort Britaine was ruled under him, & in the next succeeding ages.

He ordained foure Prefects of the Pretorium, to wit, of the East, of Illyricum, of Italy, and of Gaule: two Leaders or Commanders of the forces, the one of footmen, the other of horsemen in the West, whom they termed Præsentales. For civill government there ruled Britaine, the Prefect of the Pretorium or Grand Seneschall in Gaule, and under him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, and honoured with the title, Spectabilis; that is, notable or remarkable: him obeyed respectively to the number of the Provinces two Consular deputies, and three Presidents, who had the hearing of civill and criminall causes.

For military affaires, there ruled the Leader or Commander

mander of the footmen in the West, at whose disposition were the Earles or Lieutenants of Britaine, the Earle, Count, or Lieutenant of the Saxon coast along Britaine, and the Duke of Britaine, stiled every one Spectabilis.

Amianus Marcell.

The Earle Lieutenant of Britaine seemeth to have ruled the Inland parts of the Iland, who had with him seven companies of footmen, & nine coronets or troopes of horse.

The Earle Lieutenant of the Saxon coast, who defended the Maritime parts against the Saxons, and is named by Amianus Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coast, had seven companies of footmen, two Guidons of horsemen, the second legion, and one cohort.

The Duke or Generall of Britaine, who defended the Marches against the Barbarians, had the command of thirtie and eight garrison forts, wherein their Stations kept, consisting of fourteene thousand foot, and nine hundred horse. So that in those daies (by Pancirolus account) Britain maintained nineteene thousand, two hundred footmen, and seventeene hundred horsemen, or there about in ordinary.

Nineteene thousand foote and seventeene hundred horsemen maintained in ordinary in Britaine.

Besides all these, the receiver of the Emperors Finances or publike revenewes: the Provost of the Emperors Treasures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Draperie in Britaine in the which the clothes of the Prince and Souldiers were woven: and the Count also of private revenewes had his Rationall or Auditory of private State in Britaine: to say nothing of the sword-fence-schoole Procurator in Britaine (whereof an old inscription maketh mention) and of other offices of inferiour degrees.

(12) After the setling of these affaires, to the end that he might with the more facility bridle the untamed Persians that feldome were in quier, he removed the Imperiall seat of his Residence into the East; for now Galerius and Licinius both dead, the rent and divided State of the Romane Empire was in him united: and purposing to build there a Citie, as an eternall Monument of his name, he chose the plot at Chalcedon in Asia: but whiles they were measuring out the circuit, an Eagle scouping at the line flew with it over the Sea towards Byzantium in Thracia, to which place (the thing seeming ominous) he transferred his new foundation, and there built a most Magnificent Citie, naming it New Rome (as appeareth by an inscription of his statue). In imitation whereof, he circulared seven hils with a Wall for Height, Thicknesse, and Beauty, the fairest in the world: and not onely erected Temples, Towers, and most stately Palaces himselfe, but by his publike Edicts, commanded all the Princes of the Empire to raise therein some Monuments and memorable Edifices, beseeming the Majesty of so glorious a foundation.

L. Vives in Annotation upon Augusti Civit. Dei lib 5.2.25. Sabellicus.

A Iewish Doctour thus described this Citie, in an epistle which himselfe delivered to our English Ambassadour, remaining in Constantinople in anno 1554.

(13) Hither also from Rome hee caused to bee brought many renowned Monuments of Antiquities, as the famous Goddesse Pallas of old Troy, the Image of Apollo in brasse of an unmeasurable bignesse; the statues of Iuno, Minerva, Venus, and the like: whereupon Hieronie saith; That Constantine to inrich this one Citie, impoverished all others in the Empire: and other Writers which saw it in the perfection of beautie, report it to be rather an habitation for the Gods then the dwelling place for Earthly men. Herein also was built the Proud Palace of that Publike Library, wherein were contained one hundred twenty thousand of the chiefest Written Bookes, and in the midst thereof were the Guts of a Dragon, in length one hundred twenty Foot on which was admirably written in Letters of Gold, the Iliads of Homer: The New Name of this new Citie lasted not long; for the affection of all men to the Founder, afforded it rather the name of Constantinople; as a trophy then of this Emperours renowne, though now a brand of infamy to another of that name, who lost it in the yeere 1452. to Mahomet the Turke: and as New Rome was reared and ruined in one name, so had Old Rome in Augustus her pitch of height, and in Augustulus her period.

Hier. Marcellinus.

Constantinople built by Constantine.

(14) He drew likewise hither those Legions that lay for defence of the Provinces, as well in Germany and Gallia, as in Britaine: from whence he brought (saith Malmesbury) a great power of British souldiers, through whose industry and forward service having obtained Triumphant Victories to his hearts desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were past service, and had performed the painefull parts of Souldiers their full time, he placed in a certain part of Gaule Westward, upon the very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posterity remaining, are wonderfully growne even to a mightie people; in manners & language somewhat degenerate from our Britains.

Will. Malmesbury.

In which his doings; hee laid open the Provinces to the irruptions of their Enemies, and is therefore by Zosimus hardly censured, as being the only man that by this meanes first subverted the flourishing estate of the Empire. And indeed, by withdrawing his Forces out of Britaine; the Piels and other their wonted Enemies had the bolder and easier entrance into the more civill parts of this Iland, whereby ere long, being altogether abandoned of the Romans, it became a prey of Conquest to the Saxons, as shal be shewed in due place.

(15) But howsoever his policy failed, carried (as it seemeth) by a Divine inspiration to leave Rome; yet is this good Emperour much commended by all Writers for his many vertues, especially for that hee so laid the foundation of the Christians securitie, that the fame hath stood under the protection of Princes ever since, even unto this day. And albeit that many Cæsars his successors, have often attempted to shake it by their authorities, and the sharpe instruments of heretikes dangerously have undermined it, yet hath it borne out the Stormes of all their boisterous assaies, and stood in the strength that this Emperour first laid it.

Zozimus. Euseb. de Vita Constant. lib. 1. c. 2. & lib. 2. c. 46. Socrates lib. 1. cap. 16. Hieronymus. Sabellicus. Sozomenus. Orosius. Eutropius. Cassiodorus. Eusebius in Vita Constant. lib. 4. Sabellicus.

(16) And upon this foundation, that a glorious building might be raised, hee congregared three hundred and eighteene Christian Bishops in the Citie Nice in Thracia, where himself was present, and also President of the same Councell (though now his Beadsmen (the Popes) put him and his Successors from that right) and as another Moses, he then pacified the contentions of the brethren, and reestablished the authorities of the Bishops for the godly government of the Church in that Primitive age.

(17) But as the cleerest Sunne hath his set, and the fairest day his night, so Constantines glorious life drew to an end, though his living-glory shall be endlesse: for intending a voyage against the Persians, hee fell grievously sick, and counselled by his Physicians to be carried unto Nicomedia, a Citie in Bythinia, to the Hot Bathes that naturally there sprang (which caused some erroneously to write that he became a Leaper) he died on the way neere to the place, and in great devotion commended his departing Soule to his Crucified Redeemer, May 22. the yeere of Christ Iesus three hundred thirtie seven, of his happie victorious raigne thirtie one, and of his age fixtie five; whose body was interred at Constantinople, in the Church of the Apostles that himselfe had therein founded.

(18) Eusebius writing this good Emperors life, saith that he deferred his Baptisme untill his old age, in desire that he might receive it in Iordaine, where our Saviour himself was baptized; yet others thinke that he was baptized with his Son Crispus, what time he created him his Cæsar: for the Celebration whereof, he caused a most sumptuous Font to be made in Rome; which Platina and Sabellicus affirme to have continued to their times. And the ingenuity of the same Sabellicus is much to be approaved, in that speaking of Constantines Donation, which some so much vaut of (though the vanitie of that forgery is now laid open to the view of all by sundry learned men) he acknowledgeth himself (being a Romanist) that he findeth no mention of any such matter, in any of the ancient Records which he followed, and so leaveth it to the Patronage of those Crafts-men, out of whose forges it first was formed. He left to succeed him in the Empire as Augusti (with distaste of the eldest) his three sons, Constantine, Constantius, and Constance, whom before he had made Cæsars, and designed by Testament Delmatius, the son of Annibalinus, (his brother) Cæsar: and therefore we have inserted his memory in ranke of those that succeeded this great and glorious Emperor.

HOr the Empire being divided among theſe Brethren, Conſtantius the eldeſt, whoſe portion was Britaine, France, Spaine, and part of Germany, tooke himſelfe wronged in this partition; whereas Conſtans his ſecond brother had Italy, Africa, Sclavonia, Dalmatia, and Greece; and Conſtantius the youngeſt poſſeſſed Thracia, Syria, Meſopotamia and Egypt, Provinces much greater in his ſight, then his owne ſeemed to be; and therefore at laſt ambitiouſly bee attempted to inlarge his upon the Frontiers of his brother Conſtans, at that time in Dacia, and in warres againſt the Gothes, who there alſo invaded his territories, but was met with and ſlaine by a Captaine of his brothers, neere to the Citie Aquileia in Italy, when he had held his Seignories the terme of three yeeres.

(2) Hercupon Conſtans grew exceedingly proud, and ſeiſing his deceaſed brothers Provinces, joyned them unto his owne Poſſeſſions, and with his brother Conſtantius came into this Iland. This Battaile, and their arrivall heere, by the words of Iulius Firmius, chanced in the Winter ſeaſon: for (ſaith he, ſpeaking to theſe Emperors) you have ſubdued under your Oares the ſwelling and raging waves of the Britiſh Ocean, even in the deepe of Winter; a thing hitherto never ſeene before.

And the Britaines were fore afraid to behold the unexpected face of their Emperour. This Conſtans was he that called a Councell to Sardica againſt the Arrians, whither were aſſembled three hundred Biſhops, and among them, ſome of the Britiſh, as formerly we have mentioned. But this Prince being yourhfull, caſt away all care of the Empire; and drowned in his owne pleaſures, followed ill counſell, (the uſuall way to Princes ruines.) Thus growne grievous to the Provinces, and nothing acceptable to the Souldiers, was by Magnentius a Captaine of his owne ſlaine, as he was hunting neere the Caſtle of S. Helens, ſituate amongſt the Tapory, a Spaneſh people under the Pyrene Mountaines. And as hence this Murderer of his Soveraigne Lord and Maſter, was branded with the name of Taporus, ſo in this Emperour there murdered, was fulfilled a Prophecie, which ſaid that he ſhould die in his Grandmothers Lap.

A Councell againſt the Arrians called by Conſtans.

Olympias the Widow of this Conſtans was given to Arſaces King of Armenia, by Conſtantius his brother to be a bond and purchaſe of his furer friendſhip, of which his need was much, as the times required: for after the death of Conſtance, one Vetranio was proclaimed Emperour by the Pannonian Army, though ſhortly diſtrobed, and ſent to end his decrepit age in a private fortune. Neophanus the nephow of Conſtans by his ſiſter Eutropia, at Rome by the abject Rous was ſaluted Auguſtus; which he enjoyed not much above twentie daies, being ſuppreſſed by Magnentius, who had now made the truncke of Majeſty, his Soveraignes body, the Baſſe, whereby he meant with Decentius and Deſiderius, his two brethren, to aſcend the Throne.

(3) Simon Dunelmenſis ſaith that Great Conſtantine at his departure from Britaine, left one Octavius to governe the Land, who ſhortly rebelled, and after divers conflicts was ſlaine by Traherne, Commander of a Romane Legion. Galfridus makes the ſaid Octavian a Britaine, and will have him to raigne with great Victories over this Iland the ſpace of fiftie foure yeeres, which (as Fabian hath accounted) doth extend to the time of Valentinians Rule in Rome: ſo farre doe our Britiſh Hiſtorians differ from the Romanes. But from them moſt certaine it is, that Magnentius before mentioned, a Britaine by his father, though borne among the Letti in France, inveſted himſelfe into the Imperiall Dignitie, uſurping France, Spaine, and Britaine, thus ſtamping the face of himſelfe and his brother Decentius, by him made Ceſar at Millan, upon the currant Monies of ſuch revolted Provinces as he uſurped.

For this event (no other occaſion mooving) Conſtantius both ſhut the Temple of Ianus in Rome, as a token of an univerſall Peace; and glorioully triumphed with more then a unſuall aſpect.

(4) At this time the Generall of the Armie in Britaine was one Gracianus, the father of Valentinian the Emperour, by birth an Hungarian, and ſo ſtrong of limme, that no five men could pull a rope out of his hand with all their force; whereof he was ſirnamed Funarius, the Roper. This man giving entertainment to Magnentius, was condemned in confiſcation of all his goods by Conſtantius, that now ruled ſole Emperour, unto whom alſo the Britaines ſubmitted themſelves, and whoſe Deputie after Gratianus, was aged Martin, a man (no doubt) vertuous and upright, as he witneſſed by his death: for Conſtantius, whoſe baſe and diſtruſtfull heart feared the wagging of every leafe, by the ſlaughter of many guiltleſſe, fought to make himſelfe ſecure: and egged on by his Flatterers, (to ſerve their purpoſes) ſent one Paulus a Notarie into Britaine, to apprehend them that had aided Magnentius.

(5) The ſaid Notarie was a Spaniard, of a peſtilent wit and ſubtiltie, eſpecially in finding out all quirkes and devices to endanger mens eſtates: whoſe buſineſſe being now to apprehend and bring away ſuch Martiall men as had entred action in the foreſaid conſpiracies, he under that pretence drew into danger many that were guiltleſſe, and the Emperours true Subjects: ſome of which he impriſoned, others he tormented, and many with Manacles and Chaines ſo bruiſed, that therefore he was called Catena. Old Martine the Deputie, much lamenting their miſeries, beſought the Spaniard to forceaſe, and not with the Offenders thus to puniſh the Innocent; whereat the proud Catch-pole ſo much diſdained, that hee threatned and ſought to bring Martin before the Councell, and that in bands in manner of a Traitor; which ſo much incenſed the aged man, that with his dagger he aſſailed him; but perceiving the wound he gave was not deadly, he ſtabd the ſame into his owne ſide, and thereof preſently died: unfortunate in this fact, but otherwiſe a moſt righteous man (ſaith Amianus) that thus attempted to eaſe the wrongs of theſe oppreſſed Britaines.

(6) But beſides theſe their diſtreſſes, the outrodes of the Scots and Picts breaking into the Marches of the Britaines, ſore moleſted their peace: for redreſſe whereof, Iulian the Ceſar wintring at Paris, and diſtracted into ſundry thoughts, was afraid in perſon to paſſe thoſe Seas himſelfe and to leave Gaule without a Ruler, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when the Almans had ſtirred up a moſt cruell warre: wherefore he ſent Lupicinus at that time Colonell of the Infanterie, and Maſter of the Armorie, to withſtand their fury; a warlike man certes, and skilfull in feats of Armes, but withall proud of heart and countenance, looking high, and ſpeaking bigge, and in geſture demeaning himſelfe in his charge as an Actor upon a Stage, and otherwiſe ſo qualified, that men doubted a long time whether he were more Covetous or Cruell. He from * Rononia imbarked all his men, and with a good gale arrived in the Haven * Rutupi, marching in all haſte to * Lundinium, that from thence, after advice taken, according to the qualitie of the buſineſſe, hee might make more haſt to come into the field, and giue battle But with what ſucceſſe his affaires afterwards proceeded, I finde not recorded: and therefore I returne againe to the Emperour Conſtantius.

(7) Flavius Claudius Conſtantius Gallus his coſen-german he elected Ceſar, permitted him to ſtampe this money, and linke him in mariage with his ſiſter Conſtantia. But he, deſigned to governe the Eaſt, and make good thoſe Frontiers againſt the Perſians, forgot the duty of his charge, and gaue himſelfe up at Antioch to all licentious luſts and cruelties: of which when Conſtantius (infected afore with ſome jealouſie of his ambition) was informed, he ſo plotted, that this loſt man, drowned in his owne vicious fecuritie, was ſurpriſed, and with his hands bound backward (like a Felon) given up to the common Headſman for execution. His brother Iulianus was then made Ceſar, and this Emperours other ſiſter Helena beſtowed upon him, whoſe Victories againſt the Germans and Gaules gained him ſuch applauſe, that he was againſt his will by the Souldiers elected Auguſtus, and made Conſort with Conſtantius in Power Imperiall.

Gallus executed. Iulianus made Ceſar. Iuliani epiſtole.

(8) Whoſe fortunes thus ſticking in a tumultuous State (for, with others, Nigrinianus whoſe conſecrated memory is left to poſterite upon this money, attempted the diſquiet of this Emperour, by an ambitious affectation of rule, that was both ſhort and fatall to him) did plainely foreſhew, that neither his Raigne nor life would laſt long.

For beſides the affections of the time that then followed that new riſen Starre Iulian, his nightly viſions and imagined apparitions did both terrifie and appall his minde; for as he thought, his fathers Ghoſt preſented unto him, a Babe of an ingenious countenance, which ſtrooke the Ball (that the Romans call Tuſa, a Globe borne onely by a Monarch) out of his right hand betokening nought elſe but a change of State. Which howſoever his Diviners interpreted for pleaſing things, yet himſelfe thought his owne Genius did ſtill follow him, in a forlorne, poore, and mournfull habit.

Conſtantius apparition.

(9) For all theſe dumps, Conſtantius meant this new Election to disavow; and Julian for his part resolved in point of honour to maintaine and uphold. Whereupon warres prepared, Constantius set forward to encounter him, and comming to Tharsus, from Antioch in Syria fell there sick of a fever, which still increased as he further travelled, and in the borders of Cilicia, at the place called Mopsus Welles, situated at the foot of Mount Taurus, died the third day of November, the yeere of Christ by Ieromes account, three hundred sixtie foure: by others, three hundred sixtie one, when he had ruled twentie foure yeeres, and lived fortie and a few moneths, as Amianus Marcellinus, and Pomp. Lætus affirme. But Socrates and Zosimus say, that he lived forty five yeeres, and raigned thirtie eight, that is, thirteene a Cæsar, in the life of his Father, seven a Competitor in the lives of his brethren, and seventeene yeeres Emperour alone.

The time of his raigning.

He is neither accounted with the best, nor worst Emperours, his Vertues seeming to hold scoale with his Vices: temperate, courteous, liberall, and affable; not eloquent, yet desirous to speake well; blunt witted, yet a great favourer of learning; a most skilfull Archer, and apt to take paines, but withall very suspitious; led by Flatterers, and most cruel to the accused, and in exacting importable Tributes, drew more hatred upon his head then money into his coffers. But especially is he stained with the hereſie of the Arrians, for whose sake he banished many of the Christians, and amongst them Athanasius, that excellent light of the Catholike Church. In favour of those hereticks, he caused to be summoned 400. western Bishops unto the Councell of Ariminum, whereof three are reported to come out of Britaine. And he is by Amianus his Life-writer, condemned for mingling foolish doting superstitions, with the sincere doctrin of the Christian Religion, given rather to a more intricate search therein, then to settle his opinions upon gravities; and stirring up schismes and discords in maintaining of words and contentious disputations, which as they spread more and more, gat wing even unto this Iland of Britaine, as by the words of our lamenting Historian Gyldas is seene. When (saith he) the sweete content of Christ the head, and his members the body, had continued untill such time, as that deadly and perfidious Arrianisme, like to a Pestiferous Serpent from the other side of the Sea, casting up her venome upon us, caused brethren dwelling together, to be disseyned piteously one from another. And thus the way as it were being made over the Ocean, all other cruell and fell beasts where soever, shaking out of their horrible mouthes the deadly poison of every hereſie, inflicted the deadly stings and wounds of their teeth upon this our Country, desirous evermore to beare some novelтie.

IVLIAN succeeded, whose birth had as much of Nobilitie as either the greatnesse of place; (for it was New Rome); or the high blood of parentage could adde unto him; for his Father Constantius, was the brother of great Constantine, not much his unlike: and his mother Basilina was not lower in her birth, though most unfortunate in bearing him, her owne destruction. An Orphant hee was left together with Gallus his brother, long tossed betweene the furges of his owne imperfect constitution, and the bloody jealousie of his ruling-kinsmen (not long before the fatall ruine of his Father) for beeing too neere allyed to their Crownes.

Meane he was of stature, yet carrying from head to foot a just proportion and uniforme knitting of his lineaments, whereby hee had agilitie and strength: big and broad his shoulders, his necke fat, bearing his head forward, lovely and gracefull was the cast of his quicke and cleare eye, straight his nose, and no feature of his face amisse, but the greatnesse of his mouth, and the parting of his nether lip; the soft haire of his head he wore in a decent length, and his rough beard he cut in a pointed fashion.

His proportion and feature. Amian. Marcell. lib. 25.

(2) His education was under many masters, of which Mardonius a Scythian Eunuch was the first. From him he was sent to the publike Schoole at Constantinople, where of Nicocles the Lacedemon, he learned his Grammar, and of Ecebolius the Sophister his Rhetorike; and of both of them (as Eusebius Bishop of Nicodemia hath it) the Christian Religion, in which his delight was such, that he betooke him to the function of

of a Deacon, reading in publike to the people the sacred Bookes; and aimed at no further marke of greatnesse then the reputation of a holy man: led on with the love of knowledge, he went to the Schooles of Nicomedia, where, of Iamblicus, who succeeded Porphyry in the Chaire, hee learned the Philosophy of Aristotle and Plato. There bewitched at length with the fame of Libanius Eloquence, though detesting his religion; from reading in private study his prophane labours, hee grew a publike hearer of his invective Lectures: and imitating at first in exercise of wit onely this Rhetoricians forme of declaiming, hee grew in the end the profanest Railer, and deadliest Enemy of all other himselfe against the Church. And to fill up this vessell of iniquity, Maximus, the onely Impostor and Magician then of the world; (worthily after for his impious doctrine put by Valentinian to the sword) must come to Nicomedia. From him did Julian learne such Astrology as setteth Nativities, and such Magicke as invoketh Spirits. And here was the Schoole of this mans Errour, and Mistris of his impiety. The seeds of whose Nature and Education having thus observed, let us search with an impartiall Eye into his manners and conditions, and see what vertue was in the fruit.

(3) His temperance is commended to us with admiration. He slept little, and could awake at pleasure: his bed was ever with the hardest, and his dyet of the meanest meat, and the moderatest measure, whereby he never but once, and that by accident, disburdened his stomacke by vomit; and would often say, that it was the safety of his life, that he never had any war with his belly. Such was his chastity, that having lost at once in France Helena his beloved wife, and her infant, his onely Sonne, he never so much as in suspect, had an incontinent desire. And therefore of all the Persian beauties taken in those warres, as the richest spoiles, Nec contrectare aliquam voluit nec videre: Neithered suffer in his Army either Cooks or Barbars, as being deliciarum atque intemperantiæ ministros.

Arceo me ipsum à Theatris: I force my selfe (saith he) from the view of Stage-playes, and never but once a yeere permit my Eye that delight in Court; wherein the distaste of my mind is, tanquam pauper agricola tributum aliquod pendens iniquo Domino. And when the action was performing; similior sum detestanti eos ludos quàm spectanti. Yet doth Marcellinus tax him of much verbosity and affectation of vaine glory. And Gregory Nazianzen charging him with intemperate passion as unconstability, saith; That by his ranging and furious aspect, his unsteady and halting pace, his fleering looke, and immoderate laughter, Talem ante opera vidi qualem in operibus cognovi.

(4) The love of Iustice in this Prince is remembred to us in his rules of DIRECTION: for he so amended the Lawes, Ambagibus circumcisis, that the Iudges might cleerly see, Quid liberet fieri, quid vetaret: and in his EXAMPLE for imitation. For when to an innocent denialI before him, Delphidius the Orator inveighed saying; Nocens esse poterit ut quam si negare sufficerit: himselfe replyed, Et quis innocens esse poterit si accusasse sufficit? and so discharged the party.

As for his clemency and charity, which ought to attend the sword and Scepter of a Soveraigne, since the one is Magnum timoris remedium, and the other will be, post cineres tributum, Nebridiuse and Lucillianus are Registers of the one, whom notwithstanding their conspiracies in favour of Constantius, hee not onely pardoned, but defended with perill of his owne person from the furies of his owne followers. And for the other, those his letters to Arsacius is a sure record. Let there bee in the Cities of your charge, many Hospitals erected, that the want of the wayfairing may be relieved by our benignitie; and not of them only of our Religion, but of all the rest: for it suites not well with the goodnesse of our Government, that when the Iewes permit none of theirs to begge and the wicked Galileans releeve not onely theirs, but ours; that ours should be disconsolate of other helpe.

Mere. Epig.

Ex Iulian Epist. ad Arsa. patri Galatiæ.

(5) Some have blemished his bounty with the brand of vaine glory: thus did the Antiochians for depressing so much the reasonable price of Graine in their Markets, by a profuse expence of his owne Treasure, gaining thereby at first onely the applause of the light multitude, after which he haunted, and drawing on in the end a miserable dearth, through the licentious excesse of their improvidence: which often happeneth.

(6) And as the banishment of Palladius into Britaine upon a weake suspition, Taurus to Vircillum, in whom the eye of Iustice could find no skarre; and to death Vrsulus, with Pigmeus (the first his Treasurer, that had spent with him and on him his owne meanes, when being Cæsar, he had little of his owne: the other the guide of his youth, and to whom he truly ought the greatest part of his goodnesse) may justly staine him with lawlesse severity, and ungratefull cruelty; so may his malicious spirit against the Christians, (howsoever masking in more Art then many that went before him) set him up in the ranke and top of the greatest Persecutors. And although there be some passages in his Government more easie then in some others that may imply a gentle disposition toward them, (sometimes taking the gods to witnesse, that the Galileans (for so he named the Christians) should not undergoe the least of injuries, neither be led to Pagan sacrifice, or forced to any thing beyond the compasse of their owne contents: and that he not onely revoked the Edict of Constantine the Arrian Emperour, whereby those holy men stood long exiled: but taking the advantage of an uproare begun by the Arrians (their Enemies) at Edissa, seized upon their goods, swolne too great in number and fortune by the gracious aspect of his Predecessors, to whom hee dissembled himselfe a Christian): yet did he whiles he had in his owne hands the reine of Government, by all his actions and ends, declare himselfe an heavy opposite unto them. Sometimes by allurements to assay to corrupt them; sometimes by a subtill siding with one faction of the Church, as he did with the Catholikes against the Arrians, to counterpoise their power, ut facilius regnaret, that by such licence of sedition, Non timeret unanimantem plebem; he need not feare the power of their unity, as himselfe professed.

(7) From this unfortunate plot of earthly policy (but with worse succesſe) hee incited the Iewes to reedifie the Temple at Ierusalem, and renew their Sacrifice, remitting to them their debt of tribute, and vowing that at his returne from Persia he would visit that holy Citie, and (as he saith to them) ut unà nobiscum in ea Deo optimo gratias agam; well believing that by raising such an opposite to the Christians, he should suppresse their increase, and annihilate their Prophecy of Ierusalems desolation. To repaire these cursed wals against the providence of Divine Iustice, Alipius of Antioch, that had beene Governour of Britaine, was sent: but his indevour, saith Amianus, and the worke of all his Ministers, was interrupted by fearefull flaming bals of fire, which issued from the Earth neere unto those foundations, consuming very many of the Iewes and worke-men, by reason whereof, this Element still giving fresh assault on them, the place became unaccessible, and the enterprise given over: so vaine it is for Man to strive against the decreed purpose of God. And it is by others affirmed, that at the same time an Earthquake so shooke those Foundations of the Temple which were left by Titus untouched, that one stone thereby was not left standing upon another, but were all laid levell with the ground: by which miraculous sights many Iewes were turned to the embracing of the Christian Faith, upon whose garments fell formes of Crosses, which shined as the beames of the Sunne, neither could they by any meanes be washed or wiped away. Alipius that had beene chiefe in this businesse, was afterward confined into Banishment, with the losse of his goods, by Valens upon suspition of Treason. And thus farre of Iulians veiled hatred: now of his open actions of despight against the Christians.

(8) Constantius no sooner dead (under whom as before is is said hee dissembled his Religion) but that he opened the Temples of the Pagans Gods, repaired their Altars; declaring to future ages, the memory of this his detestable act, by minting a Bull prepared for sacrifice, upon the Currant money of that State, with this inscription; Securitas reipublicæ; as if Romes Empire should lose her security, and the fatall destiny of Command, when the Genius of that City and the Gods of her foundation should bee forsaken. And where there remained any antique Monument of the Infant Christian Church, or any new erected badge of Religious devotion, those he caused to bee defaced. Thus did he in Cæsarea Philippi, with that Brasen figure of our Saviour arrayed in a short vesture, and the Woman cured of her bloudy issue, kneeling and elevating her hands to him; and at whose feet in the said Pillar grew a certaine Herbe, in height unto the Hem of his Garment, which cured all kind of maladies; placing his owne figure, to the intent that it should bee worshipped: but suddenly it was with Lightning from Heaven destroyed, breaking with violent force the Brest thereof asunder, and striking the Head fast into the earth; whose Reliques, as Zosimus saith, remained there to be seene a long time after, a witnesse of mans presumptuous error, and Gods just displeasure. Many lawes he made against them, and many rights of Subjects hee tooke from them. By Edict he forbad the Christians the publike Schooles, and study of the Arts and Tongues; jesting away the reason of this injustice with scoffes, as he did the rest; saying, that Aristole, Isocrates, and Plato, (who must bee their guides in such liberall learnings) adoring Mercurie and the other gods, hee held it absurd that they should reade and learne of their Bookes, that loath and raile at their Religion.

Ex Edictis contra Christianos.

(9) The equity of this extended power may appeare by Marcellinus censure, a man of his owne Religion, who of it saith, Inclemens obrutendum perenni silentio; Let the Edict bee damn'd to eternall silence. When hee seized upon the goods of the Christians, which was often, and upon weake pretences, he used to invert the Letter of their owne Doctrine, in warrant of his foule act, saying that he did it, vt facilius in Regnum cælorum veniant. When hee had disabled the Christians of all command, either in the Field or Common-wealth, (as he did Iovinian, Valentinian and Valens, after Emperours) he would say, he did it because their Gospell taketh from them Potestatem Gladii. And wheresoever any poore Christian implored the hand of Iustice against wrong and violence, they returned with no better redresse, then that it was the rule of their Religion, perferre injurias, it was the duty of their Profession to beare all injuries. And although most Authors agree that hee stained not his government with the bloud of any Catholike, well knowing that gore of Persecution is the seed of the Gospell; yet some affirme that when Apollos Oracle, neere Antioch, had lost his power of answer, by the holy presence of Babillas body (there martyred and intombed,) and that the Christians in removing it away, sung solemnely the Psalme, Let all them be confounded which worship graven Images: this Emperour (although the Act was his direction, though not the order) grew so inraged, that hee put then many Christians to the sword.

(10) Of the prudence and learning of this man there be many notable monuments remaining: for in all the course of his life he did rather labour to content the parts of his understanding, then of his sensuallity, often being heard to say, Turpe esset sapienti, cum habeat animum, capture laudes ex corpore: and therefore writing to Ecdicius, Prefect of Ægypt, to helpe him to the Bookes of George Bishop of Alexandria, hee saith, Where others delighted in Horse and Hawkes, I have beene from my infancy inflamed with the love of Bookes. Many workes there were of his owne penne, though now raked up in the ruines of the time.

Misopogon vel Antiochensis.

As for his Misopogon (where playing with his owne person and beard, he sharply reprehendeth the Antiochians of their intemperance in frequenting Stage-Playes; of their impiety, in changing Iupiter and Apollo (gods of their Forefathers, into the Christ of the Galileans; and of covetousnesse in their Magistrates, in selling Iustice) it is one of the wittiest Invectives extant of those middle times.

His Religion.

(12) In the course of his Religion he is by the writers of his own affection and time rather reported superstitious then devout; and his fancies therein rather to them accounted ridiculous then religious. Such was the excesse and wast of Oxen in his sacrifices, that it is beleeved if his returne had been from the Persicke Expedition, there would have beene want of them to supply his Rites, and therefore they might happily say as the white Oxen did of the Emperour Marcus; Situ vixeris, nos perimus. Yet were his rules of order to the Priests of his superstitious zeale, such as may well become the most religious Church-men of our age to imitate: for he prohibited those Priests from gaze of Stage-Playes, frequenting Tavernes, or exercising any foule or illiberall profession, perswading them to imitate the Christians, whose bounty to strangers in distresse, charity in burying the dead, and whose humble manners and sanctity of life (though but dissembled) had so much increased their Profession.

Marcel. lib. 25.

His fortitude.

(13) His fortitude appeareth in the processe of his Martiall Actions: At three and twenty yeeres he was made by Constantine his nephew, Cæsar, matched to his sister Helena, and sent in person to restraine those barbarous Nations that had forced in upon the Roman Limits. But whether this imploiment was grounded upon the Emperours owne feare to adventure his person against these Savages; a desire to nurture this meere Scholler his brother in law in more princely manners, who then was rude; or to expose him (in respect of some jealousie in State) to an assured perill: it remaineth doubtfull. Onely himselfe saith, that he that bestowed his Title of Cæsar, libenter dabat; & qui accepit, omnino recusabat: for in it he gained nothing but ut occupatior interiret, taking this his Expedition against those Inrodes, as a banishment into the Hercinium Desert, ut tanquam venator cum feris bellaret: and beleeving himselfe rather thereby called out to an expected death, then intended honour. But this man then neither of opinion or hope, and who should have seemed to have effected a point of excellent service, if hee had no more but defended the frontiers, and repelled the Enemies, did by his valour performe no lesse then deeds of admiration.

Amian. lib. 16.

(14) He sent to Rome Chonodomarius and Badomearius two of their greatest Kings, as spoiles to adorne the Trophey, and attend the triumph of Constantius. Hee forced on every side those to feare his power, that had so long beene fearefull to the Roman Empire. And had he returned home, borne up onely with the merit of this his service, and opinion of the world, and not beene blowne beyond the bounds of his old moderation by a new desire, hee had escaped the imputation of ambition and treachery, and beene esteemed a just successor, against whom he is deemed now an unjust usurper. But it may be said that it was a divine power that inspired it, and a strong hand that inforced him to it: for from above the Porch of his entrance, into one of the regained Cities, the Wreath of Laurell (reserved an ornament of that place) fell in wonder upon his head. The Genius of Rome in many apparitions chiding and reprehending his slow desire to to affect the Empire, and restore the State. As touching his election, he calleth the gods to witnesse his unwillingnesse, and the publike protestation he made against it at Paris, when he was there by the tumultuous Army saluted Augustus. And although by the great provision made by him of Corne from Britannie, to hold a foot the Armie against the plots of Constantius (that grew now envious of his fortune,) he may seeme to have intended the ruine of his Soveraigne; yet doth hee by the gods of his greatest confidence, Iupiter and the Sunne, protest; Quod Constantium occidere nunquam optavit, imo me id accideret exoptavit.

(15) But Constantius ending this quarrell and competition by his death, Iulian, whom a Pithonisse had deluded with the hope of Persia, telling him that his fortunes should be as his feature, like Great Alexander, bred in him a thirsty desire after the surname Persicus: whereupon he prepared an Army for this expedition, and seeking the favor of his gods the Moone, Fortune, and Mars, embrued their Altars with the Bloud of an hundred Buls at once; though many ominous signes, as they were interpreted by his Philosophers and Southsayers, forbad the same. Such was the great Earthquake happening in Bithynie, that swallowed up the Citie of Nicomedia. Rivers likewise are said to stand dry, even in the heart of Winter; and Springs forgetting their usuall boilings, yeelded not foorth their wonted waters: yea and if we will beleeve the reporters, his successe was foreshewed by the departure of an Angell, and by a Meteor gliding in the Aire. All which he sought to prevent, by pacifying his Heathenish gods with multitudes of Sacrifices: and with an Army, extended ten miles in length, entred Persia, cutting asunder the Bridges by which he passed over his men; to addeto them more of resolution as their meanes were lesse of returne, refusing all humble submission and composition offred him by their King; and at the place then called Phrygia, joyned Battle against Surena, a great Commander among the Persians, and Merenes, Generall of their Horse, accompanied with two of the Kings sonnes, whose powers not able to resist the Romans, gave backe and fled.

(16) Iulian either upon a vaine confidence, or sudden Alarum, had forgot to arme himself with the Corslet or Brigandine; & in following the disarrated flight of the Persians, lift up his hands in signe of victory: at which very instant a Javelin flucke thorow his left Arme into the short Ribs, and strucke in the neather lappet of his Liver; which whilest he endevoured to plucke out, did cut the sinewes of his fingers: whereat altogether distracted, he fell forwards upon his horses maine, and thence was carried unto his Pavillion. From whose hand this Javelin came (saith Amianus) God only knoweth. Some report the Caster to have been a fugitive Persian: others say, that from the hand of one of his owne Souldiers it proceeded; and Calistus one of his owne Guard, that wrote this Battle in Heroicall Verse, affirmeth, that by some wicked Fiend or Divell this Javelin run him thorow. Howsoever, there are that report that in pulling out this Launce and casting it into the aire with his bloud, he should utter this blasphemous speech, and say Thou hast overcome me, O Galilean. At his setting forth he vowed to his gods a Sacrifice of Christian bloud, if hee returned Conquerour, but he performed it with his owne. His slaine Corps was carried to Tarsus a City in Cilicia, where, with small pompe of Funerall Obsequies it was interred neere to the Cities side, which place himselfe to that purpose had formerly assigned: although Nazianzen affirmeth the earth to have opened, and in a flame of Sulphur to have sucked up his body into her Wombe.

Iulian struckē into the body with a Dart.

(17) Thus ended this Emperor, the twenty sixth of Iune, in the two and thirtieth yeere of his age, and three hundred sixty and three of Christs Nativity, when he had raigned Augustus neere three, and Cæsar full seven yeeres. Whose wit and eloquence needs no further testimony then the Monuments of his owne Pen; nor his religious zeale more then the Functions his youth so worthily performed in the Christian Church. His Imperiall Vertues we see match him in story with Titus, in moderation with Aurelius, and for successe in warre, with Trajan; three of the most excellent Princes; and his fortune was to see bounded within his sole greatnesse, what the hand of right and sword of tyranny had so late disperied. But now one Errour, his Apostacie, disroabing him of all his Morall vertues, leaves him an object naked to the vulgar eye; but a Monster of men, and marke of infamy. I hold it therefore fitting no lesse the use, then the justice of a Story, to doe him (as I have done) all his right: since in him we learne that all those admirable endowments of Nature, embellished with all the morall and internall graces that Art could adde, are not the base of prodigalnesse, without divine grace; nor dalliance of Fortune, and fulnesse of Empire (that made this man wanton and forgetfull) is the center of securitie and happinesse without heavenly protection: since from the sense of Sacred Diets hee fell to Pagan Superstition: for many are called, but few are chosen, and in the seat of Presumptuous Majesty he felt the rod of Divine revenge.

CHAPTER XLIX.

An. Dom. 364.

THE minds of the whole Army being much distracted by the death of Iulian; the next day, Iune twenty seven, they met, and consulted upon a new Emperour: where for a while two factions were maintained, and with equall deserts argued, till lastly in one accord they both agree upon * Salustius a man very honourable and wise, but withall aged and weake, and therefore he absolutely refused the election. Iovianus by them then was nominated, in regard of his fathers deserts indifferently commended, saith Amianus: but Rufinus, Theodoret, and Socrates attribute great worths unto him, and confidently affirme his unwillingnesse unto him, and confidently affirme his unwillingnesse to accept of that dignitie, for that the whole Army

Army had yeelded to Iulianus Idolatrous Edicts, openly professing himselfe to be a Christian, and withall protesting that he would not be a Soveraigne over an Ethnicke Empire, untill by the instance of the Souldiers which declared themselves likewise to be Christians, he did accept of the same.

Iouianus his parentage.

(2) His Father was Varonianus, by birth an Hungarian, a Captaine of good note, who not long before had laid downe his charge of warre, and retired into his Country, to a more quiet course of life. Himselfe served Iulian the Apostata in his Campe; from whence he departed by vertue of his Edict; commanding all Christians out of his pay, among whom * Iouianus (as wee haue said) chose rather to cast from him his Sword and Girdle, (marks of honour to Military Professors) then to forsake the Ensigne of his Heavenly Chiefetaine, and the Badge of his Christian Profession.

* Iouianus his piety.

(3) No sooner was he clad in the Purple Robe, but one Iouinianus (a Roman Ensigne bearer, lately at variance with this new Elected Emperour, then a private man) fearing the danger of so powerfull an Enemy stepped now above the degree of the common sort, revolted to the Persians; and having good accesse, informed King Sapor of the death of Iulian, (to them till then unknown) and disabling Iouianus for an Vnskilfull and Effeminate Captaine, both incouraged the Enemy, and gave directions how to take the advantage. The Persian as ready to execute as joyous to heare, set forward his forces, his Elephants leading the way, whose terrible brayings and fearefull approach much affrighted the Romane Souldiers. A fore battell was fought, and fountaines of blood drawne from the sides of both parts: wherein, with an infinite number of Persians, Iulianus, Macrobius, and Maximus, three Roman Tribunes, of those Legions that then were the Principall of the whole Army, were slaine: in regard whereof, and especially for want of victuall (whose scarsitie then was such, that for one Pecke of Meale, ten peeces of Gold were given) Iouianus made Peace with the Persians for thirty yeeres, giving them five Provinces beyond Tigris, some Cities and Forts in Mesopotamia, whereof Nisibis is named for one that had beene the very sinewes and strength of the Confines, ever since the Warres of Mithridates: for which his doings, he is taxed by Eutropius and Amianus (who both lived in his dayes) and of most the deed is held very dishonourable to the greatnesse of the Romane Empire: howbeit divers others excuse him very justly considering the extreame misery and famine wherein Iulianus left the Army, which was in apparant hazard to be given over for a prey to the Enemy, to the indangering of the whole Empire, had it not beene thus prevented: and therefore they highly commend him heerein, as the onely Preserver of the Romane Army.

(4) Howsoever, he is highly commended by Socrates (the continuer of Eusebius his History) who flourished above Twelve hundred yeeres since; for his constant faith grounded upon the Nicen Creed, and for his Loving Reverence to the Christian Bishops, recalling from banishment those that Constantius and Iulian had exiled; among whom, Athanasius of Alexandria was one: putting downe the Idolatrous Temples of the Gentiles, and restoring to their Offices both in Court and Campe, those who for their Conscience had beene expulsed.

Bishops recalled from banishment.

(5) At his departure from Persia, hee visited the City Tarsus, where he caused the Sepulcher of Iulian (though otherwise he had found him averse, both in Affection, and Religion, yet for that he was his preceding Emperor) to be richly adorned: and taking Antioch in his way, for many dayes together was troubled with some accidents, which that age did take for Ominous signes. For the Statue of Maximianus Cæsar, standing at the entrance into the Kings Palace, let fall the Ball or Globe out of his hand, no force moving it: horrible sounds and noises were heard within the Consistory: and Blazing-Starres appeared at Noone-day.

Thence therefore in great haste he marched, and at Ancyra, declared his sonne Varronianus his Cæsar, a very Infant, whose Wrooslings and unwillingnesse to ride in the Imperiall Chariot, portended (saith Amianus) that which after hapned. For hasting still towards Constantinople, he came to Dadastana, a place that divideth Bythynia and Galatia asunder, and there dyed suddenly of the obstructions and stopping of the Lunges; caused by the dampe of a new mortered Chamber wherein he lay; or (as others write) by coales there set to dry the new seeling, whose vapors having no issue, stifled him to death, the seventeenth day of February, the yeere of the worlds redemption, 364. after he had raigned seven moneths, and twentie two dayes, aged thirtie three yeeres.

Sabellicus.

(6) For his personage, he was of goodly presence, both tall and big, his gesture grave, his eyes gray, and countenance pleasant: an affectionate lover and professor he was of the Christian religion, of indifferent learning himselfe, but a most honourable imbracer thereof in others, very precise and considerate in chusing of Iudges and Magistrates; facile and familiar to his servitors about him. His Blemishes were these, that he was a great feeder, and given to wine, and somewhat to that other Vice which usually accompanieth such intemperances.

CHAPTER. L.

Flavius Valentinianus, Emp.

Flavius Valens, Emp.

An. Dom. 364.

PResently upon the death of Iovianus, by a secret whispering and running rumor, Equitius, Tribune of the Scutarii, was nominated Emperour, a man naturally rigorous, and rude; and therefore disliked of the better advised, and no further followed. But from him, their voyces turned to Ianuarius, a Kinsman to the last deceased Iovianus, at that present Governour of Illyrium. But he also rejected, Valentinianus then absent, was elected at Nice, as a fit and meet person for the managing of their Warres, and good of the Weale publike.

Amianus Marcellinus lib. 26. cap. 5.

Socrates in eccles. hist. lib. 4. cap. 1.

(2) His birth was of Pannonia, in the City Cibalæ, of meane and poore parentage; the sonne of Gracian spoken of before, who by trade was a Rope-seller but of great strength: and therefore by service preferred to places of account, and had beene made Ruler of Britaine. His owne life likewise was spent in service of Warre, and was ere-while a Captaine over the Targatiers: but Iulian requiring him either to Sacrifice to his Gods, or to leave his place; he chose rather to lay aside his Belt then his Faith and Christianity, as likewise Iovianus had done; and so for neglecting a little honour then, he had now a farre greater bestowed on him by the disposer of all Earthly Kingdomes. The Estate so urging it, he made Valens (his Brother) Partner in the Empire, the Trumpers every where sounding Warres throughout the Roman World. For the Almans invaded Gaul and Rhætia, the Sarmatians and Quadi made spoile of Pannonia: the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacots infested the Britaines: the Austorians made roades into Africa: the Gothes ransacked Thracia, and the Persians entred Armenia. For which cause, Valens remained to defend the East, and Valentinianus tooke his progresse into the West, where, in three Battles under the conduct of Iovianus, hee discomfited the Almans: and Valens likewise overcame and beheaded Procopius; whose feature we have here expressed, a dangerous Vsurper in the East.

(3) But in Britaine things prospered not so well: for by the generall bandings of the foresaid Nations, their old Enemies, the Province was sore distressed and brought to extreame misery. For Nectaridius, Admirall of the British Fleet they slew, and Balchobandes Lord Warden of the Marches, by a traine of these barbarous people, was forelaid and assailed on every side. The intelligence of which occurences, when it was brought to Rome with great horrour, the Emperor first sent hither Severus, Steward of his House; if fortune would happily speed his hand, to redresse whatsoever had happened amisse. But he in short time being called away, had not the hap to see the wished successe. Then Iovianus, famous for his Wars in Germany, came into the same parts; and seeing the puissance of the Enemy, meant to crave ade of the Auxiliary Forces, the urgent necessity requiring so much: at last, in regard of many (and those fearefull) accidents, which rumor continually reported, touching the state of this Iland, hither was deligned Theodosius, a man esteemed most happy, and approoved for his Martiall prowesse, who with a bold resolution and select power both of Horse and Foote, set forward for Britaine.

(4) The Picts at that time were divided into two Nations, to wit, * Deucaledones and * Vesturiones. The Attacots likewise a warlike kinde of people, and the Scots ranging in divers parts, wasted all where they went.

went. As for the Tracts of Gaule, the Frankners and Saxons their nere confined neighbours, wherefoever they could breake forth, and make Roades by Sea or Land, made havocke heere by feizing of Booties, firing of Townes, in killing of men and women; and leading away Captives. To ſtay theſe woefull miſeries, if the Heavens had beene ſo benigne, this valiant Captaine intended a voyage to this * our end of the World: and comming to * Bononia, which lyeth divided from the oppoſite tract of Land by a narrow Channell ebbing and flowing with terrible Tides, where the Waters are ſeene ſometimes to match the higheſt Mountaine, and againe to ſettle with the levell of the Plaines, without any harme of Sailers or Paſſage: this Sleeve with a gentle courſe he ecroſſed, and arrived at * Rutupy, a quiet Roade and Harbour over againſt it: from whence after that the Batt'avians, the Herull, Iovii, and Victores (Companies bold and confident in their ſtrengths) were come, he marched towards Lundinium, an ancient City, which poſterities afterwards named Auguſta: and having ſevered his Troopes into ſundry parts, he charged upon thoſe companies of roving and robbing enemies, even when they were heavy laden with Booties and ſpoiles, and were driving away before them both Men and Women bound for their Captives, beſides much Cattle, and a great Prey. Theſe hee ſoone diſcomfited, and reſtored to the poore diſtreſſed Tributaries their Liberties and Loſſes, beſtowing ſome ſmall parcels thereof among his weary and well deſerving Souldiers: and entred the City with exceeding great joy, in manner of a Petty-triumph, which ere-while was over-whelmed with Calamities, but now on the ſudden refreſhed and ſet in perfect ſafety.

* Bretaine ſo called * Bologne.

* Rhichester.

London called Augusta.

(5) Vpon this proſperous ſucceſſe encouraged to greater attempts, he abode yet doubtfull of the future, caſting with himſelfe many projects, which poyſed Fortunes Scales alike: but laſtly by certaine Captives and Fugitives he learned that thoſe Companies of ſundry fierce Nations, ſpread ſo farre and diffuſedly upon the face of the Province, could not be vanquiſhed, unleſſe it were by ſleights and ſtratagemes. By Edicts therefore he firſt proclaimed impunity to ſuch as had forſaken their Colours, if they would returne; whereby many which had run to the Enemy, or at their owne pleaſures had beene diſperſed into divers parts, came in, and by their countenance declared their reſolutions in his behalfe: notwithſtanding, miſtruſting the event, and penſive ſtill with cares, he thought good to call to his aſſiſtance Civilis, a man of great underſtanding, quicke ſpirit, and withall an upright Iuſticer, who was to rule Britaine as Deputy, and likewiſe Dulcitius a Captaine, renowned for his skill and deeds of Armes.

Theodosius joyfully received into London.

Amian. Marcell. lib. 28. cap. 7.

(6) After Conſultation with them, having gotten courage, and departing from Auguſta with a power of Souldiers, which in his politicke induſtry hee had levyed and trained to his hand, he brought exceeding great ſuccour every where unto the troubled and confuſed ſtate of the Britaines; gaining before hand ſuch places in each part, as might give advantage to annoy the barbarous Enemy; and enjoyned the Common Souldiers no ſervice, whereof himſelfe tooke not the Aſſay with a cheerefull heart: in this ſort performing as well the offices of an Active and hardy Souldier, as the carefull charge of a right-noble Generall, he diſcomfited and put to flight divers Nations, whom inſolent Pride (fed with ſecurity) had incited and ſet on fire, to invade the Romans Territories: and ſo reſtored wholly unto their former ſtate the Cities and Caſtles which had ſuſtained many loſſes, and eſtabliſhed a ſure peace for a long time following.

(7) Now there happened whiles hee atchieved theſe exploits, a dangerous matter likely to have broken out into great miſchiefe, had it not beene quenched in the beginning of the enterpriſe: for one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud ſpirit firſt deputy Lieutenant and after preſident, for ſome notable offence baniſhed into Britaine, as Frontinus immediately before had beene, as one impatient of reſt, like ſome noyſome wilde Beaſt, upon a certaine ſwelling pride, roſe up in commotion againſt Theodoſius, whom he perceived to be the onely man able to withſtand his wicked deſignes: Howbeit, caſting about many wayes, both cloſely and apparently, as the gale of his unmeaſurable deſire roſe higher, he ſolicited as well the baniſhed perſons as Souldiers, promiſing (as thetime would affoord) rewards to allure and draw them on to ſome actuall attempt. Yet when the day came wherein it ſhould have beene effected, Theodoſius having intelligence thereof, ſurprized Valentinus with ſome few of his inward complices, and delivered them unto Dulcitius, to be put to death accordingly. But in his military skill and policie, (wherein hee was reputed to have exceeded all men living in thoſe dayes) gheſſing at future dangers, hee inhibited all Inquiſitions to be made touching the reſt of the Conſpirators, leſt ſo generall a feare ſurprizing at once, and ſpread abroad among many, thoſe tempeſtuous troubles of the Province, which were now well allayed, ſhould revive againe.

Valentinus a Rebell put to death.

Theodosius an expert Warriour.

(8) Therefore turning himſelfe from this buſineſſe to the reforming of ſuch enormities as were of moſt conſequence, now that all dangers were quite over-blowne, he reedified the Cities, repaired the Garriſon Caſtles, and fortified the Frontiers with ſtanding Watches, and ſtrong Fore-fences. And thus having recovered the Province againe which had yeelded ſubjection to the Enemies, he reduced it unto the priſtine Eſtate, ſo as by his meanes and motion it had againe a lawfull Governour appointed, and alſo named it VALENTIA, in honour of Valentinianus the Emperor.

Gulfes of the Sea laid bare, and many Cities drowned.

Britaine called Valentia.

(9) The Arcani, a kind of men (as witneſſeth Amianus) inſtituted by thoſe of ancient times for politicke imployments, who by little and little were fallen into diſorders and vices, he removed from their Stations, as being manifeſtly convicted, for that (induced with the greatneſſe of rewards received or promiſed) they had divers times diſcovered unto the Barbarous whatſoever was done or debated betwixt the Preſident and his Councell: for indeed their charge was to runne to and fro by long journies, to intimate and make knowne unto the Romans Captaines upon the Marches: what doings and ſtirres were among the Neighbour-Nations; whereby they had great opportunities both to know and reveale the ſecrets of the State.

Amian. Marcell. lib. 28. cap. 7.

Arcani removed from their Stations.

(10) And thus Theodoſius having managed moſt excellently theſe affaires, was ſent for to the Emperours Court; who leaving the Province over-joyed for their Peace, was no leſſe famous for his many important Victories, then was either Furius Camillus, or Papinius Curſor. And being honourably accompanied and attended unto the Narrow-Seas, with the hearty love and favour of all men, departed, and with a gentle gale of winde paſſed over, and came to the Princes Campe, where (being received with joy and praiſe) hee ſucceeded in the roome of Valens Iovinus, who had the conduct of the Horſemen. For theſe his Martiall deeds ſo happily atchieved, in honour of him there was a Statue erected, reſembling a Man of armes on Horſeback, as by Symmachus may be underſtood, thus ſpeaking to his ſonne Theodoſius: The Author of your kindred and ſtocke, Captaine Generall both in Africke and Britaine, was (among other ancient Titles) conſecrated by the moſt honourable Order with ſtatues of Knighthood. And in his commendations, Claudius with full note thus poetically ſang:

Dreadfull ſights and fearefull Earthquakes. Amian. Marcell. lib. 26. cap. 14.

(11) Strange and dreadfull were the ſignes that in the third yeere of this Emperour chanced; as Earthquakes, Inundations, and the like; whereof Marcellinus thus reporteth: A little after the Sumne-riſing (ſaith he) the weighty and ſteddy maſſe of the whole Earthly Globe ſhooke, flaſhes of lightning very thicke and fierce going before: the Sea alſo driven aſide, and the waves and billowes ſo prepoſterouſly tumbling and retiring back, that the deepe Gulfes being diſcovered and laid empty, a man might have ſeene ſundry ſorts of ſwimming creatures ſticking in the mudde: Alſo the vaſt Vallies and Rocks, which Nature had ſet farre away under the huge Waters, did now behold the Beames of the Sunne; inſomuch that many Ships were bedded faſt in the dry ground, and flocks of people ſtragled at their pleaſure in the ſmall remaines of water, to take up Fiſhes as the Sea-ſpoile, when on the ſudden the waves diſdaining to be thus diſpoſſeſſed, returned with ſuch violent beating upon the Ilands and Promontories, which lay farre into the Sea, as that they over-flowed, and laid levell an infinite number of buildings and Cities. And therefore in this furious diſcord of the Elements, the ſurface of the world being covered, repreſented ſtrange and wonderfull ſights. Among which S. Ierome reporteth, that there rained Woull from Heaven ſo perfect and good, that no better grew upon the Sheepe, the naturall Producer. But to returne.

(12) Fraomarius, whom Valentinianus had ordained to be King of the Bucinobants in Germany, was made Tribune and Colonell over a Regiment of Almains in Britaine, which for number and valour in thoſe daies were renowned; where (no doubt) matter enough was miniſtred for him to worke upon. But the death of the Emperour preſently following, admits no mention of further diſcourſe which happened in this manner: The Quadi after many moleſtations done to the Roman Legions and their Confederates, ſent their Ambaſſadours unto him, deſiring pardon for their former faults committed, and an abolishment of all remembrances thereof: with whom being in earneſt conference, ſuddenly the blood guſhed out of his mouth; and being laid upon his bed, ſhortly after dyed of an Apoplexie, or rather of the Plague, as the blew Markes appearing upon his dead body gave conjecture: November the ſeventh; of his age fiftie five yeeres, having raigned eleven yeeres, eight moneths, and two daies, in the yeere of our Chriſt three hundred ſeventie five.

Socrat. Eccl. hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 26. Valentinian ſo death.

Valentinianus his perſonage and vertues.

(13) For preſence, he was Majeſticall, of body fat, his complexion faire, his eyes gray, and having therewith ſomewhat a ſcue caſt, his haire ſhining bright, his joynts ſtrong and well knit: he was a Prince mercifull and loving, and mitigated many Tributes formerly impoſed on the Provinces: a wiſe Warrier, ſterne in countenance, haſtie of ſpeech, and chaſte of body, a good Iuſticer, and impatient of all delaies. But theſe his Vertues with ſome Vices were accompanied: for he is taxed with envy and partialitie, in puniſhing ſeverely the poore Souldier for ſmall offences, but remiſſive to the faults of their Captaines and Leaders, and that was the cauſe (by Amianus his report) of the troubles in Britaine, the loſſes in Africke, and the waſts in Illyricum.

Valens Emperor in the East.

(14) His Arian brother Valens ſurviving him, raigned Emperour in the Eaſt; by whoſe ſufferance the Barbarous Gothes entred Thracia, which preſently proved to be the bane of the Romane World, for that theſe Gothes (a ſtrange and unknowne People till then) being forced out of a ſecret Nooke in Scythia, by the Hog-Backt Hunnes, ruſhing as an unreſiſtable Whirlewinde from thoſe High Mountaines, infeſted the Coaſts about Danubius, and obtained licence from Valens to paſſe the River Donaw into Thracia, where long in quiet they ſtayed not, but like a violent Flood running with a full current, they over-whelmed all before them, overcomming the Romans in many Battles, and in one ſlew the Emperour Valens, with moſt of his approoved Captaines, and twenty five Tribunes that had charge of Regiments, the third part of his Armie hardly eſcaping unſlaine. Some report that Valens flying the Field, tooke into a houſe neere Adrianople, whither being purſued by the Enemy, and his Hold fired upon his head, was therein burned to aſhes, after he had fate Emperour fourteene yeeres.

An. Dom. 376.

Ammian. Marc. lib.27.cap.5. Gracian & Valentinian Emp.

GRACIANVS, the Eldeſt Sonne of Valentinianus, by his Empreſſe Severa, was made his fathers Collegue in the Empire in the fourth yeere of his Raigne: notwithſtanding ſixe daies after his death, his ſecond Sonne Valentinian, a Child of Foure yeeres old, by the advice of the Councell and generall conſent of the Camp, was alſo ſtiled and proclaimed Emperor. Theſe Brethren lived in much love, and ruled in the Weſt, as the uncle Valens did in the Eaſt, of whom we laſt ſpake. And albeit Gracian had cauſe of diſpleaſure, that this his younger Brother was thus advanced without his allowance; yet he as a Prince kind and naturall, regarded his Brother exceedingly, and brought him up in all tender affection, forgetting the wrong offered unto himſelfe and his owne Mother for Valentinianus mothers ſake.

Lib.30.cap.12.

Gracian loving to Valentinian.

(2) The Mother of this Valentinian was Iuſtina, a damſell of an admirable feature and exceeding beautie, ſurpaſſing all other women ſo farre, that the Empreſſe her ſelfe fell in love with her, and uſually converſed with her familiarly as her equall, imparting her moſt private ſecrets unto her as her truſty Counſeller, and often bathing together in the ſame Bath. Neither was her ardent affection contained within the meaſure of Womaniſh modeſty, but that ſhe refrained not in the hearing of the Emperour (her Husband) to extoll her incomparable beautie, preferring her farre above any creature in the World. Whereupon Valentinian ſo farre affected this Lady, as that he took her to his Wife; by whom he had this young Valentinian, and alſo three Daughters, notwithſtanding Severa was yet living.

Socrates eccleſ. hiſt.lib.4.ca.25.

Valentinianus marrieth Iuſtina, by whom he had young Valentinian.

(3) The ſtormes of the Gothes as a violent tempeſt beating ſtill againſt the Shores of the Romane Provinces, cauſed Gracian to beare Sayle toward the ſafeſt Harbour, and to commit the guidance of his Ship to the moſt aſſured Pilot: their forces being ſo great, and their outrages ſo terrible, that he thought it beſt not to adventure his owne perſon, but to imploy ſome other approoved Captaine. For which exploit, none was held more ſufficient then Theodoſius, the Sonne of that Theodoſius who was ſo famous for his Britiſh Warres, and whoſe life was taken away by Valens the Eaſterne Emperour. Him he made firſt Captaine Generall of the Romane Empire, and immediatly upon his firſt ſervice againſt the Gothes, his Fellow Emperour and Auguſtus, allotting him thoſe parts in the Eaſt, that his uncle Valens lately had enjoyed.

Theodoſius Captaine generall of the Romane Empire, and fellow Emperour.

(4) In many Battles, fought to the laſt drop of blood, this worthy Generall overcame the Gothes, ſo that their King Athanarius was laſtly inforced to ſue for his Peace, which upon honourable compoſitions was granted, and himſelfe in moſt princely manner entertained by Theodoſius in the Imperiall Citie Conſtantinople; where falling ſicke after three moneths, he died, and was both much lamented, and ſumptuouſly buried by the Emperour. Theſe reports cauſed Sapor, the moſt puiſſant King of Perſia, to ſubmit himſelfe unto Theodoſius, and by his Ambaſſadours, attending his Court, obtained his Amitie. Thus gloriouſly raigning and perfect peace eſtabliſhed, he ordained his young ſonne Arcadius his Fellow Emperour in the Eaſt.

(5) But the affaires in the Weſterne Empire proceeded nothing ſo fortunately: for Gracian a meeke and ſoft ſpirited man, ballanced with Theodoſius, was held without regard; and Valentinian by his Prefect Probus, held both Rome and Italy at his devotion; onely Gallia obeyed Gracian. For Clemens Maximus borne in Spaine, but deſcended lincally from Conſtantine the Great, by his affability and liberall carriage, had won the affections of the Britaines to ſide with him; a man no doubt, both Valiant and Wiſe, had he held his allegiance to his Soveraigne Lord. But the time fitting his purpoſes, when the Scots and Picts with their wonted inroades ſore indamaged the Province, he ſet himſelfe for their deliverance, and therein ſped ſo well, that the Souldiers by cõſtraint (as Oroſius ſaith) forced him to aſſume the Imperiall Stile and Purple Robe. And of ſo haſting into Gallia, with all the flower and ſtrength well neere of the Britaines forces, arrived in the mouth of Rhene, unto whom alſo the Germans Army joyned, and now accounting himſelfe an abſolute Monarch, admitted Victor his ſonne, then Ceſar, to be partner of his Empire, whoſe Stamp therefore with his fathers we have annexed.

(6) Thus Maximus eſtabliſhing his throne at Triers, Spread his wings (ſaith Gyldas) the one into Spaine, the other into Italy, and with the terror of his Name, levied Tributes and Penſions for Souldiers pay, of the moſt fell and ſavage Germans.

Againſt him Gracianus made his power, but after five daies skirmiſhings was forſaken of his own Souldiers, and ſo put to flight. And now dejected and deſtitute of meanes to maintaine his quarrell, hee ſent Ambroſe (a great Doctor of the Church) his Ambaſſador unto Maximus, to intreat for Peace, which in outward ſhew was granted, but was far otherwiſe intended, as the ſequell prooved. For ſeeking his death, he did ſhortly after effect it in this wiſe: He cauſed Letters, and reports to bee given unto Gracian, that his Empreſſe was in journey to viſit him, and withall ſent forth a Carroche ſtuffed with Souldiers, and with them a deſperate Captaine named Andragathius. Gracian greatly rejoycing for his Wives approch, prepared himſelfe to meet Her accordingly, and opening the Litter, thinking to embrace his Empreſſe, was by theſe Ruffians treacherouſly murthered neere unto Lyons, when he had raigned fifteene yeeres, and lived twentie nine. Valentinian with his Mother Iuſtina, fearing the like conſpiracies, became ſupplicants unto Theodoſius in the Eaſt againſt Maximus.

Gracian, his death and raigne.

(7) He therefore preparing his forces, marched as farre as Aquileia in Lombardy, where Maximus remained both confident and ſecure. For having fortified the ſtraits of the Mountaines with ſufficient Garriſons, and dammed the Havens with ſtrength of Ships, himſelfe and aſſiſters with great boldneſſe proceeded againſt Theodoſius, and gave him a battle before the Citie Syſcia in Pannonia, and againe moſt valiantly received him in another, under the leading of his brother Marcellus; but in both of them was overcome. From this laſt, he ſecretly retired unto Aquileia, where of his own Souldiers he was betraied, and delivered to Theodoſius his purſuer; and by him to the Executioner to be beheaded: of which his unfortunate, but deſerved end, the famous Biſhop Martinus Turonenſis being in Britaine, did foretell him long before. Andragathius alſo, the Murtherer of Gracian, whoſe ſtate was now deſperate, caſt himſelfe headlong into the Sea, and made an end of his wicked life. Victor the ſonne of Maximus, made his Ceſar in France, as we have ſaid, was defeated, taken Priſoner and ſhine. This Victory was held ſo worthy and memorable, that the Romanes from thence forward ſolemnized that day every yeere as feſtivall, ſaith Procopius.

Sabellicus Enn. 7. lib. 9.

Andragathius drowned himſelfe.

(8) But theſe Britaines that had aſſiſted Maximus, as by Writers is recorded, did forcibly invade Armorica, and there planted themſelves: From whence (ſaith Beda, the Britaines firſt arrived into this Iland. But ſurely himſelfe as either greatly miſtaken, or elſe we miſtake him altogether, and that rather, for that by Ceſar thoſe Coaſts that lie upon the Sea ſhoares, are called Armorica, and there the Celtes ſeated, being the Originall of our Inhabitants, as is holden; and ſo from thence they might ſpread themſelves further into theſe Britiſh Ilands, long before it received the name of Little Britaine. The like troubles fell to other Provinces at the ſame time, by the inteſtine Warres of the Empire: for the Gaules were moleſted by the Franks; Spaine by the Suevians; and Africke by the Vandals: the Eaſt parts by the Heruli, Oſtroges, and Hunnes; Italy by the Lombards, and ſhortly after by the Gothes.

Bede Hiſt. Angliæ lib. 1. cap. 1.

(9) Theſe troubles in the Provinces, cauſed the Emperours to call home their Armies with Aides of their Allies, and all too little to ſupport their owne declining Eſtates, which now began to end of it ſelfe, and theſe Emperours raignes to be cut off by their untimely deaths.

But to returne into the path of our Hiſtory, from whence (by the intangled occaſions of theſe foure Emperours raigning together) we have wandred; let us remember what occurrents happened upon the death of Maximus the Tyrant, and haſten to end the greatneſſe of the Empire, which in moſt Provinces began to end of it ſelfe. For Valentinian being rid of his feares, unto which he had beene ſubject; and Theodoſius of his Collegue, unto whom he was enforced; great hope was conceived of a flouriſhing Eſtate, but it brought forth onely the remaines of their downefall: for the one returning to Conſtantinople in great Triumph, lived not long after; and the other left peaceably in the Weſterne World, was (as you ſhall heare) ſoone made away by Conſpiracie.

(10) Valentinian remaining at Vienna in France, free from Hoſtile Enemies, retained in his Court thoſe that ſought his life, whereof Arbogaſtes, a Captaine of a haughtie ſtomacke, politicke, adventurous, and of great power, but withall of a baſe parentage, a ſtranger and an Infidell, was one; Eugenius a Grammarian, but now bearing Armes, and of great account, was another. Theſe corrupting his Chamberlaines, compounded for his death, which they as wickedly performed, by ſtrangling him in his bed, giving it forth that the Emperour had hanged himſelfe; which was ſo confidently avouched, that Proſperus in his Addition to Euſebius writing his death, ſaith, that it was acted by himſelfe, after hee had lived twentie fixe, and raigned fixteene yeeres, being ſtrangled in the yeere of Grace three hundred ninetie foure.

Chapter LII.

Flav. Theodosius. Emp

WE have declared in the life of the last preceding Emperour, the Birth and Fortunes, Warres and Victories of this most worthy Theodosius, untill the death of Maximus the Britaine, (for so most Writers terme him:) and now onely remaine his latter Acts in Warre and Peace to be further related.

An. Dom. 379.

(2) This Emperour returning from Aquileia in Lombardy unto Constantinople in the East, long time there staied not, but was drawne againe into the West, both to revenge the death of Valentinian his Fellow-Emperour so treacherously strangled, and also to oppose the proceedings of Eugenius, whose Coine we have heere expressed, being one of the Murderers then usurping that portion of the Empire, and sided by Arbogastes the other,

Theodosius goeth against Arbogastes and Eugenius.

Eugenius usurper.

(3) Theodosius marching with his forces towards the Confines of Italy, found the passages stopped at the foot of the Alps, and his Enemies powers farre surmounting his: Therefore a while to deliberate on these businesses, he pitched his Tents, and their staied. In the meane time Eugenius and Arbogastes his opposites had forelaid the countrey, and hemmed him about in such a strait, that no victuals could be brought unto his Campe.

Theodosius praieth to God for victory.

(4) No meanes being now left, but either to cleere the passages, or be overthrowne, he first became supplicant with Fastings and Teares unto his God, whom hee knew to bee the God of Hosts, and whom ever he had served, and whose aide had hitherto never failed him: whereupon boldly incouraging his men, hee accepted of the Field. But the Battle furiously begun, fell so fore against him, that ten thousand of his Souldiers were presently slaine; and the rest despairing, ready to flie, himselfe at that instant had beene surprized, had not God turned the heart of Arbitio, a Captaine of his Enemies, suddenly to come to his side, and to rescue him. Theodosius much daunted by these unfortunate beginnings, yet conceived better hopes of the following successe, trusting to the uprightnesse of his Cause, and the helpe of his God, which still he implored, till the Heavens were propitious to his earnest desires.

Sabellic. Ennead. 7. lib. 9.

(5) For suddenly a violent tempest arose, and a raging winde rushed so extreamely on the faces of his Enemies, that they were in no wise able to withstand it, the power thereof beating backe against their darts into their owne sides; whereas the arrowes shot from the Emperors part, where thereby forced with double strength to pierce thorow the Rebels Iron plates, whereby a most glorious victory was obtained; and Eugenius taken, who lay groveling at the Emperours feet, deploring his estate, and craving his pardon; but even as he kneeled with cries and teares, the Souldiers standing up strucke off his Head. And Arbogastes the Author of these evils by flight escaping, two daies after ran himselfe upon his Sword, and so revenged on himselfe his owne wicked actions. This victory was atchieved the sixth of September, in the yeere of grace three hundred ninetie sixe, by Socrates account: and was so famous, that besides the Records of Christian Historians, Claudius a Heathen Poet thus eternizeth the same in his Heroicke Poeme.

Gods darling deare, the heavens thy soldiers were in armes,
And winds conspir'd to aide and follow thy allarmes.

(6) Theodosius thus delivered, repaired unto Millan, where, worne with yeeres and travels, shortly after he sickened unto death. And sending for his Son Honorius, made him Emperour of the West, and to Arcadius gave the East, wherein hee had before made him his Cæsar. The Province of Africa he assigned to the government of one Gyldas in his Sonnes behalfe, and in the Non-age of Arcadius appointed Rufinus for Constantinople, and Stilicho Tutor to young Honorius in Italy, three most worthy men undoubtedly, had the greatnesse of their spirits beene contained within the lists of their trust and places.

Theodosius dyeth.

Honorius and Arcadius made Emperours.

Gildas Governor of Africa. Rufinus Governour of Constantinople. Stilicho Governour of Italy.

(7) This last named Flavius Stilicho, famous for a long time, and an inward companion with Theodosius, had beene imployed in the Britains warres against the inroades of the Scots, Vandales, and Picts, and therein had borne himselfe with fortunate successe, as the Poet Claudian implieth, where he bringeth in Britaine thus speaking:

Stilicho sometimes imployed in the British Warres.

Me quoq; vicinis pereuntem Gentibus, inquit,
Munivit Stilicho, totam quum Scotus Hibernem
Movit, & infesto spumavit remige Thetis.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem
Scotica, nec Pictum tremerem; ne littore toto
Prospicerem dubiis venientem Saxona ventis.

Stilicho commended by Claudian for his service in Britaine.

And I, saith she, that ready was by bordering foes to perish,
When Scots did cause the Irish stirres, then Stilicho did me cherish.

When

When Seas did foame with strokes of Oares, that beate the billowes backe,
His force effecting with his cares, prevented still my wracke:
He bade me feare no forraine powers, that Scots or Picts could make;
Nor of the Saxons that on Seas, uncertaine courses take.

So that being by him freed from those many dangers, and all her enemies overthrowne, shee singeth her security by the same Poet thus:

------ Domito quid Saxone Thetis
Mitior aut fracto secura Britannia Picto:

My Seas, though rough, are calm'd, sith Saxons conquer'd are,
And I securely rest,
now Picts are queld in warre.

But this her joy, through the Treasons of these three Governours, was soone turned into laments and teares, and the whole Empires glory brought to a fatall period as presently it will appeare.

Theodosius his vertues.

(8) This Theodosius for his Princely parts, by all writers is ranked among the very best of all the Emperours: And as he is likened to Trajan for his feature and personage, so may he be compared in wisedome to Marcus Aurelius: In temperance with Antoninus Pius: For his Christian profession and devotion, with Constantine the Great: and for his meekenesse, equall to any: whereof among many other, we have one example very remarkeable. Vpon an offence committed by the Inhabitants of Thessalonica, hee commanded most severe punishment to be inflicted, which was so unadvisedly executed, that as well the innocent, as the offenders were involved therein. He then coming to Millan, would have entred the Church to have communicated with other Christians in their sacred devotions; which Ambrose, the great Doctor, and Bishop of that Sea (though otherwise a man of admirable mildnesse) resisted and forbad, in which estate the Emperour stood for eight moneths continuance: and then with great humility and submission, acknowledging his offence, was absolved, and againe received into the congregation. For preventing of the like rash offences by him committed, hee then enacted a Law, that thirty dayes should passe betwixt the sentence of death, and the execution of the Malefactor: And to suppresse his hasty choller (whereunto he was much subject) his usuall manner was to recite the Greeke Alphabet, before hee uttered any speech favouring of that humour.

(9) He dyed January the seventeenth, the yeere of the worlds happinesse three hundred ninety five: when hee had raigned seventeene yeares, and lived sixty; as Aurelius Victor writeth, with whom he ends his History. His first wife was Flacillia, a religious Lady, the mother of Arcadius and Honorius; by his second wife he had a daughter named Placidia Galla, first married unto Athaulpus King of the Gothes, and after his death unto Constantine, whom Honorius her brother made Augustus and his fellow Emperour.

{ARCADIVS / HONORIVS} Emperours.

Chapter LIII.

Arcadius Emp. East.

Honorius Emp. West.

AN. DOM. 395.

ETATALL was the Act of Theodosius, in his Election of the three foresaid Protectors, whose greatnesse carried with a glutted prosperity, grew to a surfeit after his death in their ambitious thoughts, and was the downefall of the now aged and drouping Empire: first Gildus in Africa, not contented with the title of Comes or Earle, cast off all subjection, and as an absolute Lord, acknowledged neither Arcadius, nor Honorius for his soveraigne.

Gildus rebelleth.

Paulus Diaconus.

Mascelzerius overcommeth his brother Gildus.

(2) Against these proceedings, his owne brother Mascelzerius opposed himselfe, and both in words and acts assayed to set him in his wonted place of obedience, which by no other meanes could bee brought to passe, but by assistance sent him from Honorius; with which, though much too weake, hee marched against the Emperours Enemy, and as Paulus Orosius writeth, more by force of prayers to God, then power of men, in his encounter prevailed, and beheaded Gildus for his Treason. But himselfe becomming mighty, and forgetting that which in others he remembred, himselfe usurped the command of Africa against Honorius, casting off all subjective obedience, and as a free Prince ruled the Province: The Souldiers that had lately assisted the Emperours cause, now well perceiving his ayme levelled at the Crowne, thought best to cut the string before hee loosed the shaft, and made him shorter by the head.

Paulus Orosius. Gildus beheaded.

(3) Ruffinus in Constantinople as boldly bare himselfe, thinking Arcadius both too weake and yong to sound the depth of his designes, whose thoughts did also worke upon conceited Soveraignety: he therefore secretly solliciteth the Gothes to warre upon the Empire, that so Arcadius might either be slaine or intrapped trapped, or else himselfe in those dangers, set up as the more sufficient. But these things thus dangerously complotted by Ruffinus, were as politically prevented by the Emperour, although a Child: for before the Seed of this Treason could bring forth either Bud or Blade, it was discovered, and the Author slaine by an Italian Band, his head (which as some affirme, first tooke breath in Britaine) was advanced over a Gate in Constantinople.

Ruffinus slaine.

Stilicho set at liberty and the whole Empire.

(4) Thus Peace obtained by the deaths of these two Traitors, the Third stood up with more danger in the West: for Stilicho, Tutor to young Honorius, thought it not sufficient honour for him to have his Daughter an Empresse by the Marriage of his Ward; but set at hazard (for himselfe and sonne) his owne Conscience, both their Lives, and the fatall ruine of the Now-declining Empire. For first sowing seditions amongst the Lieutenants of the Provinces, picked also quarrels in the Emperours Court, Cashiering with disgraces those Gothes that had served with good proofe of their fidelity above twenty yeeres; since their entertainement by Theodosius. These to revenge their wrongs, chose for their Chiefetaine a valiant Gothe name Alaricus, which shortly prooved the Scourge of Rome: with whom joyned the Vandals, Alanes, and Suevians, who joyntly with great fury began to warre in Austria, and Hungary, increasing their Powers with such multitudes, that as Paulus Orosius, an Author of that time saith, The World was amazed and stood in feare. For unto these Colonies resorted two hundred thousand Gothes more, under the leading of Radagasius their King, who together with united forces, subdued Thracia, Hungary, Austrich, Sclavonia, and Dalmatia, and spoiled all in such manner, that it seemed Divels and not Men had passed that way, as Saint Jerome (who lived at that time) expresseth: Those brute Beasts (saith hee) suffered by the wrath of God in this warre, have laid Cities waste, slaine the People, and left the very Fields bare and desolate, whereof the Provinces of Thracia, and Sclavonia, with the Country wherein my selfe was borne, beare too true, but lamentable Records.

(3) The Roman Empire thus daily declining, and these fierce nations making havocke where they came, the Armies in Britaine were put in great feare, lest the Flames of their Neighbours fire might Flash out, and take hold of them also. Therefore providently to prevent that danger, they elected one Marcus their Lieutenant for Emperor, yeelding him their obedience some short time, and then finding his defects, immediately murthered him.

In whose stead they Inthroned one Gracian a Britaine: whose carriage not answering their expectations, they Murthered also, within foure Moneths after his Royall solemnity.

Gracian chosen Emperour. Gracian murthered.

The features and Imperiall Title stamped on the Romish Mony of these two Vsurpers, (according to the usuall manner of the like in Estate) wee finde not, neither stands it with credit of our History to faine them at pleasure: therefore till time bring them forth from the Caves of obscurity, we have allowed them place onely by these circles inserted, that others may supply what presently we want, and accomplish by pencil, what we cannot by Presse.

(6) Yet time to Constantine hath beene more favorable in preserving his remembrance by his minted Moneys, which here with his Story wee present to sight. At the fall of these former, no better at all then a Common Souldier, but upon confidence onely conceived of his Name, was made Emperour, who with more respect of honour, and liking of his advancers, bare himselfe better then the others had done. For putting to Sea, and landing at Bologne, he easily induced the Romans forces as farre as the Alps, to side with him: Valentia in France hee manfully defended: the Rhine, which long had been neglected, hee fortified with Garrisons: upon the Alps as well as upon the Maritime Coasts, where passages were frequented, hee built Fortresses: Spaine likewise hee held under the hand of Constans his Sonne, whom of a Monke hee had made Augustus, and by whose valour he subdued all from the Pyrenean Mountaines to the Ocean. Whose Moneys wanting to expresse his Image and Stile, we have also supplyed with another Blanke.

(7) Constantine prospering as wee have said, sent Letters of excuse unto Honorius, affirming constantly that he was compelled by the Souldiers to doe what he did: whereby he so pleased the Emperor, that commending his valour, and holding him fit, he sent him of free gift a Purple Robe. Whereupon their new-growne blade began to bud faire, and at Arles planted his Imperiall Seate, commanding the City to be called Constantina from him, and ordained that the Assemblies of the affaires of Seven Provinces should bee therein held. But this his Sunshine of prosperity was soone overcast with the Clouds of adverse fortunes, and his Crowne and Life laid together in the dust. For in Spaine against him was arreared Maximus a Vassall, whose Generall Gerontius intercepting Constans, (his Sonne and Cæsar) at Vienna in France, slew him: and Constantine himselfe within the wals of Arles, besieged for foure Moneths, after the Raigne of foure Yeares, laid aside his Purple Robe, and entred the Church in Order of Priesthood, and surrendring the City with his Stile Imperiall, was lastly led into Italy, and there beheaded.

Honorius alloweth Constantine Emperour.

Constans slaine.

(8) From that time Britaine renewed her obedience to Honorius, and the Province a while was refreshed by the Wisedome and Prowesse of Victorinus her Lieutenant, who often represt the incursions of the Scots

Victorinus Lieutenant in Britaine.

Et quacunque ferox arva Britannus arat:

The Ocean wide and Thule, his vertues witnesse will;
And all the Champion Fields, which Britaines fierce doe till.

(9) But Rome at this time being sore afflicted, and by Alaricus with his Gothes and Vandals presently sacked, Honorius sent for Victorinus with his Army out of Britaine, to the rescue of the City, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth up among other Aydes, the British Legion sent thither: whereof the Scots and Picts had soone notice, and (according to their wonted manner) with fire and sword molested their neighbours.

(10) The Britaines therefore resolutely engaging themselves into dangers, tooke Armes, and freed their Cities and States from those Barbarous People: by whose example, the rest of their Nation in Armorica, with the Provinces of Gaulois, delivered themselves also from their oppressions, and all of them cast out the Roman Presidents; settling a forme of Commonwealth to their owne liking. But these our Britaines growing too weake to withstand the continuall inroades of their Northerne Enemies, humbly besought Honorius for succour; whose returne of comforts consisted onely in words, exhorting them by Letters, to stand upon their owne Guard. But they knowing it was not words, which must helpe them, againe deplored their misories, and so obtained of him the assistance of one Legion, which in their ayde drove backe those Assailants into their owne Marches, and fortified against the Wall betwixt the Frith of Edenburgh unto Cluid: so then departing, left the Britaines to defend themselves; who now, besides the Common Enemies so often mentioned, were much molested, and their Faith corrupted by one Pelagius, by birth a Britaine, by profession a Monke, and by leaud doctrine an Hereticke, who was brought up in the famous Monastery of Bangor in Wales; who had also travailed Italy, Sicilia, and Ægypt for the study of learning, and grew into great favour with Paulinus Bishop of Nola, and with Saint Augustine also, till his Heresies of Assertions, which had beene by him and his disciple Celestius (a Scot secretly taught, and by Saint Jerome discovered) were afterwards condemned by Innocentius the first, Bishop of Rome. But the Arch-heretick returning into Britaine, began againe obstinately to maintaine the same, together with Agricola, one who spread the venome of that Heresie into Forraine parts: whose doctrines were. 1. That Man, without the grace of God, was able to fulfill all the Commandements. 2. That man in himselfe had Freewill. 3. That the Grace of God was given unto us according to our merits. 4. That the just have no sinne. 5. That children are free from originall sinne. 6. That Adam should have dyed, though he had not sinned. And therein also one Timothy most impiously disputed against the Divine and Humane Natures of Christ. Notwithstanding at the same time flourished Fastidius, a most learned British Bishop, and Chrysanthus also the Deputy or vicegerent of Britaine, who with great honour governed the affaires of the Church and Common-wealth, and was afterwards (as elsewhere we have shewed) made Bishop at Constantinople of the Novatians against his will.

(11) Thus were the affaires of this Land managed under these Brethren Emperours: the elder of which Arcadius, dyed in peace at Constantinople, leaving his sonne Theodosius, a child of eight yeeres, to the succession of the Empire, and to the tuition of Hisdigerdes King of Persia; a matter which seemed at first very dangerous, but prooved at the last very profitable. He raigned thirteene yeeres, and dyed the first of May, the one and thirtieth of his age, the yeere of Christs birth foure hundred and ten. At which time one Iovinus, of an obscure beginning, had raised some Tumults in Gallia, stiled himselfe Emperour, usurped the Purple Robe, and stamped his Coynes with the Title of victory, as is seene in one which we heere present.

THEO-

THEODOSIVS. 2. VALENTINIAN. 3.

Chapter LIV.

Theodosius 2. Emp. East.

Valentinian 3. Emp. West.

An. Dom. 408.

GReat have beene the Warres and strange the Alterations, which both here at home, and thorow the World abroad, have chanced unto States, since the first attempts of Iulius Cæsar; unto these present Emperours, Theodosius the second; and Valentinian the third, his Associate; whose Lives and Raignes, did conclude the Successions of the Romish Monarchie within this Iland of Great Britaine, and threw downe their Triumphall Arches, in many other Provinces, which for long time had beene obsequious to Romes soveraigne Command. So uncertaine is the Glory of this World, and her Seeming Strength so lyable to Mutability, that the Powers and Periods thereof, held in His hand that holdeth the Vniversall Ball, are suddenly turned from their high-mounted site and beauty of the Sunne, unto their high-mounted site and darke fide of the Globe; and either the Downe-fall and darke fide of the Globe; and either fall againe into the small Circuit of their first compasse, after they have expired their Number, Waight, and Measure: or else with Daniels Image are utterly extinct and blowne away, as the chaffe from the Summer flower.

Theodosius and Valentinian the last Roman Monarkes in Britaine.

(2) The continuance of whose Estates; seeme they never so Great and Durable in Power, Circuit, Defence, and Multitude, hath seldome extended much the limit of Five hundred yeeres, but that their high and mounted Flames, fall in the ashes of their owne consuming decayes, or else hath received some other alteration of Empires encrease, as many learned Writers have observed in most Common-wealths. So was it in the State established by God himselfe among his Peculiar People. As from the Promise to Abraham, made of Christ the Blessed Seed and Life of Man (where ceased the words formerly used computation from the Ages of Men) unto the Law delivered upon Mount Sinai, declaring condemnation and death, were foure hundred and thirty yeeres: from Israels departure out of Ægypt, when their Common-wealth began to bee ruled by Iudges, and Gods service celebrated in the Tabernacle under Curtaines, unto the Building of their Glorious Temple erected by King Salomon, were yeeres foure hundred and eighty. From the Annointing of David, the first King, set upon Iudahs Throne, unto the death of Zedekiah the last King thereof, slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, and that Holy Temple consumed by fire, were yeeres foure hundred and seventy. And other Politike Estates have stood much upon the like Space of time. For the Kingdome of Athens set up by Cecrops the first King thereof, unto Codrus the last, when they changed their Monarchy to a Democracy, is said to have continued foure hundred and ninety yeeres. The Lacedemonians State from Lycurgus their Law-giver, unto Alexander the Great, that overthrew it, flourished the space of foure hundred ninety one yeeres. From the expulsion of Romes Kings under Tarquinius unto the affected Empire in Iulius Cæsar, were foure hundred ninety and nine yeeres. And omitting many others, to come to our selves; from Cæsars first Invasion of Britaine, unto the dayes of this Valentinian the third, wherein the Romans did quite abandon it, were five hundred yeeres. From the Saxons intrusions and division of this Realme, into an Heptarchy under their Government; untill the united Monarchy made by King Egbert, in the yeere eight hundred and nineteene, were yeeres foure hundred fixty nine. But from thence, untill their issue failed in King Edward Confessor, were yeeres onely two hundred forty seven. And from the Normans Conquest, unto the death of that most sacred Soveraigne of eternall memory, Queene Elizabeth, when began againe the name of GREAT BRITAINE; and the union of the whole Iland to be brought into one entire Monarchy by the rightfull Succession and thrice-happy entrance of our most gracious King IAMES, are yeeres five hundred thirty fixe. But of these three last, wee are to speake hereafter, and now returne to finish up the falling Estate of the Romans Greatnesse.

Iacobus, the time between the Promise made to him, and the giving of the Law. Galath. 3. 17.

1 Kings 6. 1. Israel, the time between their departing out of Egypt, and the building of the Temple of Salomon. Daniel the time between his annointing and the death of Zedekiah.

The time between Cecrops his setting up, and Codrus the last.

(3) Theodosius the sonne of Arcadius began his Empire in the yeere of the worlds salvation foure hundred and eight, and was Governed with a speciall protection by the Persian King during his Minority, under the charge of Antigonus an excellent man. But now growne to yeeres, and some variance happening betwixt him and his Tutor, he was left to the disposse of himselfe: and his Vncle Honorius leaving at his death great troubles unquenched in the West, the mightiest Potentates assayed to make themselves Emperours over severall Dominions, and from the richnesse of the Imperiall Diademe, each one sought to plucke a Iewell to beautifie his owne Crowne. So the Barbarous Nations out of this one Monarchy began the foundations of many succeeding Kingdomes. For in Spaine the Vandalis, Suevians, and Alanes, not contented with their portion there assigned, betooke themselves to Armes. The Frankes and Burgundians, which had been driven out of France, resolved again to returne. The Gothes, that were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, and Tolosa, did as the rest. The Hunnes entred Hungary. Iohn the Tyrant held Rome: and in Africa, Boniface became a Nester: These stirres mooved Theodosius to nominate Lycurgus, the time betweene him and Alexander the Great.

Tarquinius, the time betweene him and Iulius Cæsar.

Cæsar, the time betweene his invasion of Britaine, and Valentinian the third.

nominate Valentinian his kinsman Emperour in the West; whose raigne and affaires (so farre as they touch Britaine) we will follow, being the last of the Roman Emperours that held out the succession of our British Monarchs.

(5) This Valentinian was the sonne of Constantine, made Augustus, as is said, and of Placidia Galla daughter to the first Theodosius Emperour: which Lady in the sacking of Rome by Alaricus the Gothe, was taken prisoner, and by him given in marriage to his neere kinsman Athaulphus, who afterwards was king of that Nation; and by her sweete demeanour, and prudent meanes, a Peace was concluded betwixt her husband and her Brother, but with such dislikes to the Gothes. that they presently killed him, and raised one Wallia for their King; who likewise comming to composition with Honorius, delivered Placidia according to Covenants, whom the Emperour her brother bestowed in marriage upon Constantine his Generall, in regard of his good service and Victories by him atchieved.

(5) Shee, with young Valentinian new made Emperour, being sent into Italie, selected the best approved Captaines to secure her sonnes estate; whereof Aspar was one, that in Rome slew Iohn the Vsurper, who had there made himselfe Emperour, stamping this his face and stile upon the currant Money of the State, and by his Tyrannies held his fortunes for five yeares continuance.

Aetius likewise, that had been Governor of Spaine was imployed into Gallia, where the Frankes and Burgundians (under the Conduct of Clodius their second King) fought to establish (as shortly they did) their Kingdome in that Countrey, giving it the name of France, according to their owne, by which name they were never knowne to Cæsar, Strabo, Plinie, Tacitus, Mela, nor Ptolemy; whereby the great blaft of their Antiquitie is shewed to be but a puffe of winde.

(6) At this time the Britaines were againe sore oppressed by the Scots and Picts, who having notice that the Aides sent by Honorius were returned, passed over the Water in their Boats at both the ends of the Wall, and invaded the Province with such force, that they bare downe all before them. The Britaines in this lamentable plight, sent their Ambassadours to Rome, with their Garments rent, and dust upon their heads, unto Valentinian the Third, bewailing their most miserable Estates, and craving his help. The Emperour mooved to remorse, sent a Regiment of Souldiers into Britaine, under the Command of Gallio of Ravenna, a most valiant man, who having put backe the Enemie, with the assistance of the Ilanders, gave some small comforts to the distressed Britaines. But the Burgundians passing the Rhene, and threatning to waste Italie, Aetius was compelled to recall Gallio with his Legion, to secure the Countrey about Paris, whileft himselfe with his, followed the dangerous Enemie.

(7) He now ready to depart for France, told the Britains that it was not for the Romans to take so long and painfull Iournies, neither at that time especially when their own Empire was in danger to be over-ran. Therefore he willed them thence forth to stand upon their Guard and to provide for their owne safeties: and to that end, in regard of their good services done to the Romans, he taught them the use of their Armor and Weapons, as also to strengthen their Fortification, and wall of Turfe, which now they began to build with firme Stone, laid eight foot in thicknesse, and twelve foot in height. This wall (saith Gildas) they drew in a straight line (at the publike charges of the State) from East to West, and from Sea to Sea, planting Bulwarkes, and raising Turrets, with convenient spaces distant one from another; which gave a faire and farre prospect into the Sea. And so the Romanes gave a finall Farewell, meaning never to returne againe: and burying part of their Treasures heere in the Earth, whereof much hath beene found, and more is still fought; left Britaine about the yeare of Christ five hundred, after the first invasion thereof made under the conduct of Iulius Cæsar.

(8) This unfortunate Emperour Valentinian lost not only Britaine, but suffered also Africa, France, and Spaine to be plucked from his Empire: and the weaknesse of the Romans power (whose strength consisted most in Forraine Aides, (as Tacitus saith) was left unable to defend it selfe when they had bereft this Province of all the Flower and Choice of Men, as Gildas in that age complained, saying; Britaine is disfeited of all her armed men, with her militarie forces: her Rulers (cruell though they were) are wasted, her Garrisons withdrawn, and defences laid open, and an exceeding great number of her stout courageous Souldiers taken from her, to serve the Romans in their Warre. With which his sayings the Roman Writers themselves agree, and record the Musters and great multitude of Britaines that have beene transported by them out of this Iland: as well Trebellius Maximus with his British forces made strong the Faction against Otho in Germanie: and then also Honorius Flaccus brought thence eight thousand chosen Souldiers to uphold Vitellius in his cause.

Clodius Albinus banding against Severus the Emperour, took out of Britain the flower of their chivalry under whose banner most of them perished, when in the fields of France, and neere unto Lyons, they spent their bloud in his cause; whereby the sinewes of their owne Countries defence was fore weakened, and laid open to Forraine Invaders. Constantine the Great also (as Malmesbury noteth) carried hence a great power of British Souldiers with him in his warres, by whose puissance (as he saith) he obtained Triumphant Victories, and the Empire of the whole World: and after affigned them that part of Gallia to inhabit, which was called Armorica, lying Westward upon the Sea Coasts, where they seating themselves, their posteritie was increased, and continueth a Mighty People even unto this day.

Constantine transported a great power of Britaines.

Armorica is part of Gallia given to the British Soveraines.

Armorica conquered.

(9) This Countrey afterwards (being conquered by Maximus, and his reconciled Enemie Conan Meriadoc, Lord of Denbigh-land, by the prowesse of those British Souldiers whom hence he carried in his quarrell against Valentinian the Emperour) was received in free gift of Conan, after the slaughter of Iubates the King, and the name thereof changed to Little Britaine, as being a Colonie or Daughter of this our Iland. The Province is large, pleasant, and fruitfull, and containeth in her Circuit nine Bishops Seas, whereof three are called Cornovaille unto this day, which are Leonenses, S. Paul, and Tregniers: the other fix are Dole, Rhenes, S. Malo, Nanetenfis, Vannes, and Brien, whose language differeth from their neighbours the French, and retaineth as yet the British Dialect. I omit to speak of those other Numbers of men sent for out of this Kingdome by the said Conan, whereof our British Historians make mention; besides the sending of Vrsula with eleven thousand Virgins to be matched in marriage with these their Countrey-men, all of them perishing by Sea or by Sword, but none of them returning hither againe; whereby the bane of the land presently followed, her hopes being cut off, and deprived of wonted Posterities.

nie Countries to these his Britaines, even from the Poole which is on the top of Iupiters Hill, to a Citie called Cantguic, and unto the Westerne Mountaines. These (saith hee) are the Britaines in Armorica, who never returned to this day, in regard whereof Britaine was Conquered by Strange Nations. With whom agreeth Gervasius a Monke of Canterbury, Iohn Anglicus, Ranulphus of Chester, and others. Thither also in the downfall and desperate Estate of the Britains, many of them fled from the rage of their Enemies, as hee that was borne in Armorica, and lived neerest to that age, even the Writer of the Life of S. Winguloef the Confessor, doth sufficiently prove. An of-spring (saith he) of the Britaines embarked in Flotes, arrived in this Land, on this side the British Sea: what time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons fierce in Armes, and uncivill in manners, possessed their Native and Mother soile, &c.

Britaines fled into Armorica in the time of the Saxons.

(11) And lastly, in the cause of that other Constantine, who was elected only for his Name, most of the Flower and Strength of the Britaines were transported into Gallia and Spaine, where in his variable fortunes many of them perished. And Malmesbury writing of these times, saith, that the Romanes had emptied Britaine of all her Flower and Chivalry of Warre, leaving none in her countries but Halfe-barbarous-men, and in her Cities only Epicures, unfit for service. In confirmation whereof, the most learned Cambden out of Antike Inscriptions, and the Booke named Notitia Provinciarum, hath observed, that these Companies under written served the Romans in their Warres, and were dispersed here and there in their Provinces, which also were from time to time evermore supplied out of Britaine.

Constantine who was elected for his name, transported great multitudes of Britaines.

(12) No mervaile is it then if Britaine lay weake; being thus continually exhausted of her strengths, which these approved Records make so apparant, as we needeno t alleage the doubtfull story of Ipus of Norwey, for the depopulation of the Iland, who is said by subtilty under pretence of Kindred, and Honour to be atchieved, to have gotten an infinite number of Britaines to follow him in his interprise, which never returned againe, or the booke Triades mentioned by the Author of the Reformed History of Great Britaine, that bringeth an Army hence, consisting in number of one and twenty thousand men, into Aquitaine and Gaule: which, as he saith, was the aide mentioned by Cæsar, that out of Britaine assisted the Gauls against him. Which may partly seeme to be gathered from Cæsar himselfe, as hath been said: where he affirmeth, that the Britaines and Gaules were governed under the same King: and is further confirmed by the fashion and Inscriptions of Antique Coynes, which we have seene stamped in Gold, the Forme round, and Shield-like: Imbossed outward in the Face, and Hollow in the Reverse; a Forme unfallible to be of the Britains Coynes, and the word Comes inscribed upon the Imbossed side, we imagine to be the same Governour of Artoys in Gallia, whom Cæsar mentioneth.

(13) Thus then was Britaine first made weake by the Romanes exhaustings, and then quite abandoned of their helpe, and left as a tree in the Wilderneste, to lose her faire leaves by the continuall blasts of these sharp Northern winds, whose beautie before had been as the Cedars of Lebanon, or like unto those in the Garden of God. BOOKE VII. CHAPTER. I.

Britaine abandoned of the Romans Garrisons.

THE Britaines thus abandoned of all the Roman Garrisons, and emptied of Strengths that should have supported her now downe-falling-estate, lay prostrate to confusion and miserable calamities; no lesse burdened with the tumultuous uproares of her owne great men, who strove for the supreme government, than of the Barbarous Nations, which with continuall incursions made spoile where they came. These times (saith Ninius) were full of feares, and were prolonged with forty yeares afflictions: wherein Vortigern then king was troubled with the violence of the Romans, the dreads of the Picts and Scots, and the oppositions of Aurelius Ambrosius, who surviving his slaine Parents, that had worne the Imperiall purple Robe, fought their revenge upon their wicked Murderer: besides the Intrusions of the Germane Saxons, called in for Friends, but proved indeed the greatest Enemies. During the conflict of these tempestuous stormes, some small comforts were ministred unto the Britaines by Bishop German his presence, who from France assisted them against the Pelagian Heresies, and the perilous assaults of the Scots and Picts, who in divers skirmishes overcame them.

(2) These dolorous times of Britaines destruction, Gildas the mournefull Historian, who lived not long after, doth declare. As soone as the Romans (saith hee) *had left Britaine, and were returning unto their home, forthwith hideous multitudes of Scots and Picts came swarming out of their Carroghes, (wherein they passed the * Scitick Vale) like whole Armies of duskish Vermine, which at high noone, when the Sunne is in his greatest heat, beganne to crawle foorth of their narrow holes an infinite number of hideous Scots and Picts; which two kinds of people, though in conditions somewhat different, yet they conforted too well in greedy desire of bloud-shed: and having intelligence, the associates of Britain were now returned with utter disclaime of further assistance; with more confident boldnesse then ever before, they seize all the* Northerne and uttermost part of the Iland, as if it had been their owne inheritance, even as farre as to the Wall. Against these attempts there were ranged in the high Forts along the Wall, Garrisons of Souldiers, but such as were both slothfull, and also unserviceable for Martiall Affaires: which white-livered Lozels with quaking hearts fate still waiting day and night, till their joynts were as benummed and stupid as the stones whereon they sate: insomuch as the naked Enemies did with long hooked Engines plucke from off the Wall those miserable Warders, dashing their bodies against the ground. This good yet they got by their untimely deaths, that being thus suddenly dispatched out of the world, they escaped the eminent lamentable calamities that their brethren and children shortly felt. To be short, having abandoned their Cities and this high defensive Wall, once more they tooke themselves to flight, and were dispersed in a more desperate manner then ever before. For the enemie was more hot in pursuit, and more cruell in the slaughter, the wofull Inhabitants being by their enemies massacred, and rent in peices like Lambes by their enemies massacred, and rent in peices like Lambes in the hands of bloudy Butchers, or in the jawes of cruell and savage Beasts. In these most miserable times, (necessitie so compelling) the poore distressed people forbare not to rob each other of that sustenance, which could helpe them but for a very small season: and so their hostile oppressions were increased by their domesticke vexations, for that the whole Country by these continuall direptions, was utterly deprived of the staffe of food, having nothing left to prolong their life, but that onely what they got in hunting.

Scots and Picts catch the Britaines with long hookes.

Whereupon about the thirty nine yeare of Theodosius and of Christ foure hundred forty six, the distressed Remaines of the down-cast Britaines, addressed their missive Letters to Aetius, whom Gildas calleth Agitius, President of Gallia, in most lamentable manner, and thus inscribed:

Britaines send for help to Aetius President of Gallia.

Beda lib. Anglor. Hist. cap. 13.

TO ÆTIUS Thrice Consul, the groanes of the BRITAINES.

"The Barbarians drive us backe to the Sea; the Sea againe putteth us backe upon the Barbarians: thus betweene two kinds of deaths, we are either slaughtered or drowned." And the more to intimate their miseries, and to move his affistance, thus they further urge: "We (say they) are the Remnant that survive of the Britaines, and are your Subjects, who besides the Enemie, are afflicted by famine and mortalitie, which at this present extreamely rageth in our Land. And putting him in mind that it much importeth the Majesty of the Roman Empire to protect and succour their Province, seeing it had now stood upon the point of five hundred yeers under their obedience, whose strength of Souldiers taken from thence to serve their Emperors in their Wars else-where, was now decayed, and their wealths wasted by maintaining their many Legions in their own Land and abroad: All this notwithstanding the Romans either would not, or could not relieve, having enough to doe to uphold their owne; but returned them againe with heavy hearts into the hands of their most cruell Enemies, who now knowing themselves free from the Romans interceptions, as a violent floud brake thorow the Province, and bare downe all before them; the Inhabitants flying like chased Deere, some taking over Seas into Britaine in France, some to South-wales, North-wales, Cornwall, and parts of Devonshire, leaving the best of the Land to the will of their Persecutors, and much of their Treasures hid in the ground, which never after they enjoyed.

Britaines flie into France, South-wales, North-wales, Cornwall, Devonshire.

(4) But the greevous Famine still increasing, though it had this woful issue with some, that it made them yeeld themselves into the Enemies bloudy hands (onely in hope to gaine a little sustenance of food for the present,) and for many yeeres after left lamentable tokens (saith Beda) of great desolations wrought by that dearth: yet with those other which were of more noble and resolute spirits it produced a better effect; insomuch as from out of the Mountaines, Caves, and thicke woodes, they assailed their enemies, reposing their truft not in Man, but in God, whose help is then most at hand, when mans help faileth. These in many skirmishes gave them the overthrow with much slaughter, and that for many yeeres together, when they made their incursions for booties and spoile, which caused these Ravening Irish to returne home; and the Picts awhile rested from further molestation. Notwithstanding the Britaines returned not from their owne wickednesse, growing strong not in dayly repressing the Enemie, but stronger in their owne sinnes and civill dissentions. By meanes whereof, though a surcease of Hostile Warres was imbraced, and the skarres of famine cleerly skinned up, yet another sore as dangerous as either, secretly bred, and shortly brake forth. For the Land being free from the Enemies wastes, yeelded such plenty and abundance of all things, as the like before no age had seene; and therewithall such riot and excesse, that the peoples sins grew to a plentifull harvest, as by the words of Gyldas is apparant.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 14.

Britaines trusting in God, overcome their enemies.

(5) Certainely it is heard (saith he) that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. Truth with the maintainers thereof is hated: Lies with the Forgers thereof highly esteemed. Evill is entertained for good, leudnesse respected more then uprightnesse, darknesse desired before the bright Sunne, and Satan accepted for an Angel of light: Kings then were anointed, not according to Gods liking, but such as excelled others in cruelty; and as cruelly againe by their anointers were they murdered, not for any demerit, but that they might advance others more savage then the former. If he were milde, or inclining to truth, the darts of hatred were on every side levelled against him, as the onely subverter of the Britains estate. What was pleasing or displeasing to God, was all one with them, saving that the better things commonly wrought most discontent: so that rightly the saying of the Prophet, which was denounced unto the people in old time, might be applyed to our Countrey: Tee lawlesse and corrupt children have forsaken the Lord, and provoked unto Wrath the holy One of Israel. Why should ye be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquity? Every head is sicke, and every heart is heavie: from the sole of the foot unto the crowne of the head, there is nothing found therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their safety, as if that medicine which was bestowed by that truest Physitian of all, was needlesse for the world. And not onely the prophaner sort did this, but also the selected flocke of the Lord, and the Shepheards thereof, who ought to have given example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them lay senseleese and weltring in Wine, swelling with pride, contention and griping envie, putting no difference of judgement betweene good and evill: insomuch that it seemeth the sword was powred forth both upon Prince and people: and all of them seduced by vanities, wandred in errors and by-paths, not led in the right way. When God therefore was minded to purge his family, and to recure them thus infected with the corruptions of sinnes, by heare-say onely of tribulation, the winged flight of an often-tried rumour pierced the attentive eares of all men, giving notice of their ancient Enemies, ready to arrive, and fully minded to destroy them utterly, and to inhabit (as earst they did) the whole Countrey from one end to another. Yet all this could not reclaime them, but like unto mad horses, which taking the bit fast between their teeth, run away with their Riders, so these leaving the way that leadeth (narrow though it be) unto salvation, ran at randome in the wide way of all wickednesse, which leadeth directly to death. Whiles therefore (as Solomon saith) the stubborne servant will not be amended with words, he is scourged for a foole, and feeleth not the whip: for loe, a pestilent contagion fell heavily upon this foolish people, which (though the enemies sword was gone) in short space destroyed such multitudes of them, that the living were not able to bury the dead. Neither yet also were they thereby bettered, that the saying of the Prophet Esay in them might be fulfilled: God called them to mourning, to baldnesse, and sacke-cloth: but behold, they fell to killing of Calves, and to slaying of Rammes 3 loe, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall; Let us eat and drinke, for to morrow we shall die. And indeed the time now drew neere, wherein their iniquities (like as those in times past of the Amorites) should come to the fulnesse. And even at that instant the like measure began to be heaped upon the Britaines.

(6) For the common enemie now invading the Southerne parts, was entred as farre as Stamford upon the River Welland; whom to resist, the Britaines assembled together, and having experience what civill jarres had formerly done, they jointly unite their meanes and powers, and with one consent elect a King to manage these affaires, which was Vortigerne, by birth extracted from the British Line, nobly descended, had not his many vices blemished the same. The British Historie saith, that hee was Earle of Cornwall, and of great command in the dayes of Constantine their King, whose simplicitie hee much abused, and whom lastly he caused to be murdered by the Guard of his Person, the Scots and Picts by him so placed, and to that end instigated: whom nevertheless with death hee severely punished, to avoid further suspition. In whose revenge, these fierce Nations so assaulted his Dominions with rape and spoile, that hee was forced for further assistance to send for these Saxons to his aid. Whether thus, or otherwise, most true it is, the Saxons were sent for, and of hoped Friends, became the tried Enemies to the Britaines and their Estates, as out of Gildas their Historian wee shall anon declare.

The Saxons first arrivall on the East part of this Iland.

(7) The occasion and manner of this their inviting and comming, is set down by a Country man of their owne Witikindus, a Writer of good antiquity, who thus relateth the circumstance thereof. Britaine (saith he) by Vespasian the Emperour, long since being reduced among the Roman Provinces, and held in their subjection, stood them in no small stead: but their Legions abandoned, and destitute (as it seemeth) *determining the downefall, became soone assaulted by their neighbour Nations the Northerne Borderers. For the people of Rome after that the Emperor * Martiall was slaine by his Souldiers, being tired out with forraine wars, were not able to assist their friends with supply of accustomed aides. And yet had they built a mighty peece of worke for the defence of the Country, reaching betweene the confines from Sea to Sea, where it was thought that the Enemies would assaile the Inhabitants left in the Land. But no difficulty it was for them so fiercely bent, and ever ready to make war (especially where they dealt with a Nation feebled and left unable to make resistance) to destroy the said worke. Therefore hearing of the worthy and fortunate exploits atchieved by the Saxons, they sent an humble Embassage to require their aid, and these having audience, spake as followeth.*

Martian his meaneth.

The Romans worke for the Britaines defence raced by the Northerne Borders.

"Most noble Saxons, the poore and distressed "* Brets, outworn & tired by the many incursions of "their enemies, hearing the fame of those victories "which you have most valiantly obtaind, have sent "us Suppliants unto you, craving that you would "not deny them your helpe and succour. A large "and spacious Land they have, plentifull and abun- "dant in all things, which we yeeld wholly to be at "your devotion and command. Hitherto wee have "lived freely under the patronage and protection of "the Romans, next unto whom wee know not any "more powerfull then your selves, and therefore we "seeke for refuge under the wings of your valour. So "that we may by your puissance be superiour of our "enemies, whatsoever service you shal impose upon "us, that will we willingly abide.

To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefely made answer in this wise.

"Know yee that the Saxons will be fast friends "unto the Brets, and ready at all times both to "assist them in their necessity, and also to procure "their wealth: with joy therefore returne yee Am- "bassadors, and with this wished for tidings make "your Country-men glad, Hereupon (according to promise) an army was sent into Britain, and joyfully received, which in short time freed the Land from the spoiling enemies, and recovered the country unto the behoofe of the Inhabitants.

(8) But how true this last clause is, may appeare out of the ancient Gildas, who thus recordeth it: To represse (saith hee) *many invasions of those their ancient enemies, which with cruell slaughters and booties continually afflicted them, the Britaines fell to consule upon some convenient course therein to be taken. Lastly, all the Counsellors, together with the proud Tyrant, being blinded in judgement, devised such a protection, as in the end proved their Countries destruction; namely, that these fierce Saxons, a people savage and of hatefull name, odious both to God & man, should be let into this Iland, as it were wolves into sheepe-folds, so repulse (forsooth) the Northerne Nations: then which project doubtlesse nothing was ever more pernicious and unhappy unto this Land. O senses senseleese and plunged into deepest mists of errour! desperate dulnesse, and blind blockishnesse of minde! Those who in absence were feared more then death, now of their owne accord are invited by these Princes of Egypt (if I may so say, thus sottishly counselling their Pharaoh) to come and rest with them under one roofe. Presently out of the Denne of that barbarous Lioness, rushed forth a kennell of her whelpes, in three long vessels, called in their language * Cyule, carried under full saile, and with ominous presages fore-prophecying that for 300 yeares they should possesse that Land unto which they then directed their course, and for halfe of thus space, (viz. one hundred and fifty yeares) they should waste and depopulate the same. These being put on shore first in the East part of the Iland, and that by Commandement of this unfortunate Tyrant, shere set fast their terrible pawes, pretending to the Islanders, defence of their Country, but more truely intending the destruction of them. The foresaid Lioness finding that her first troupe of whelpes sped so well, sends againe a greater Rabble of the same Litter, which here arrived in Flotes, bringing with them some other Associates of bastardy and unnoble brood. And these beginnings, the slips of iniquity, and the roots of bitternesse, (an accursed plantation well besitting our demerits) have sprung up, and put forth in our soile their haughty boughs and spreading branches. This barbarous Nation thus admitted, professing themselves our Souldiers and such as would endure all hazards (so they fained) in defence for their good Hosts, first they craved supply of victuals only, which being given them, for some time stopped (as we may say) the Dogs mouth: howbeit, afterward they complaine that their wages was not bountifully enough paid, devising of purpose colourable occasions of quarrell, and threatning that unlesse they might have more munificent entertainment, they would with the breach of covenant spoile and waste the whole Iland. And without further delay, they second these threats with deeds (for our sinnes, the cause of deserved revenge, were still nourished) and the fire kindled Eastward, was set a flaming by these sacrilegious men from Sea to Sea, ceasing not to consume all the Cities and Countries bordering thereabout, untill such time as burning weinere all the Inland Soile of the Iland, it licked (as it were) with the red tongue of the flame the very Westerne Ocean it selfe. In this violent invasion, comparable to that of the Assyrians against the Land of Israel in old times, is historically fulfilled also in us, that which the Prophet by way of sorrowfull lamentation uttereth: They have set fire upon thy holy places, and have burned the dwelling place of thy Name, even unto the ground. And again: O God the Heathen are come into thine heritage, thy holy Temple have they defiled: For all the Fortifications demolished with their Engines, and the Inhabitants together with the Bishops of the Church, and also the Priests and people with glittering swords and crackling flames, were all at once laid along upon the ground, yea, and (which was a most lamentable spectable) the stately Turrets, high mounted Walls, and the sacred Altars, lay all tumbling together (all purpled with the broken and bloudy Quarters and goared Carcases) mixed as in a horrible Wine-presse. Neither were there any other Sepulchers abroad, save the ruines of buildings, and the bowels of wilde beasts and birds.*

(9) During this most wofull, desperate, and tempestuous season (saith the mournfull Historian) some poore remaines of Britaines being found in the mountains, were slaine by whole heapes: others pined by famine, came and yeelded themselves unto their enemies, upon composition to serve them as Bond-slaves for ever, so they might not be slaughtered out of hand: which granted, was reputed a most high and especiall grace. Others went over seas into strange lands, singing under their spread Sailes with a lamentable and mourniug note, that of the Psalmist: Thou hast given us, O Lord, as sheepe to be devoured, and hast scattered us among the Heathen. Yet others remained still in their own Country (albeit in fearefull estate, and continually suspecting hazard) committing their lives and safety to the high steepe Hills, to craggy Mountaines naturally intrenched, to thicke gromne Woods and Forrests, yea and to the Rocks of the Sea.

THE ROYALL STEMME OF THE SAXONS, FROM PRINCE VVODEN AND HIS WIFE FRIA; BRANCHED VNTO THEM THAT FIRST LAID THE HEPTARCHIE OF GREAT BRITAINE.

BEfore we enter into the diſcourſe of thoſe SAXONS, that by ſubtilty firſt fought, and by ſtrength at laſt obtained the faire inheritance of great Britains Crowne, let us firſt ſhew from what ancient Stem theſe ſeven faire branches tooke ſappe of growth or beginning: that ſo the eye may be led, and the minde delight, to view, and to reade the manners of them, that ſince Noah, Gomer, and Iavan; are of fureſt record, to be our knowne parents. And from this tree-like body behold the boughes that grew & aſpired to the hight of their owne wiſhed glory: laying the foundation of their ſeven kingdoms in Great Britains Iland; which no ſooner was enjoyed, but each of them ſought by his owne, to over-ſhaddow the next, untill Fortune & warre brought all into one. And by the ſucceſſors of that one, the Crowne is ſtill worne, for fame and continuance far fairer then any. Theſe Saxons thus branched, by Florentius monke of Worceſter, is brought from Prince Woden their deified Mars, and from Fria his princeſſe, by them adored for the goddes Venus: and that with no litle imaginations of both their great powers. I need not to commend the credire of this monke, ſeeing Bale in his Centuries, 66. hath done it before me; and time the touch-ſtone of truth hath ſet him ſo necre unto their times, that his life might well touch the lives of ſome of theſe Saxons: for he wrote in the dayes of king Henry the firſt, and died in the yere of grace a thouſand one hundred and nintteene; being the firſt recorder of our Normane Stories, and the director of all after-followers. See therefore from him (if you pleaſe) theſe SAXONS deſcents: and from him, and others their originalls; manners, religions, lawes, and names: reſerving the credit thereof unto them; but the errours and paynes to our ſelfe.

THE SAXONS ORIGINALL.

CHAPTER II.

AS Times decayed Ruines have ſtopped the paſſage of thoſe ſmall Springs, iſſued from the firſt fountaine of Nations beginnings, and have diverted their ſtreames farre from any ſure Courſe or certain known Heads; ſo the originall parent place, and name of our Engliſh Saxons, have been written with a penne of ſlight touch upon the leaves of oblivion, or elſe recorded in thoſe obſcure Roules, that as yet ly bound up in the Office of times forget-fulneſſe: whereby it reſts doubtful from what root theſe branches firſt ſprang; ſome bringing them from Aſia, ſome from Africa, ſome from Macedon, ſome from Denmarke, and ſome without all likelihood from Britaine it ſelfe.

Occa Scarlenſis a Friſlander borne, affirmeth theſe Saxons to come of Saxo a Prince of India, who with his two brethren, were baniſhed by lot to ſeeke their deſtinies abroad, their owne Countries being peſtered with over-many people at home. Theſe (ſaith he) following Alexander the Great into Greece, became Progenitors to their countries, that from them received their of-ſpring and names: as that from Friſo the eldeſt, his Friſlanders deſcended; from Saxo the ſecond the Saxons upon the River Albis, and from Bruno the youngeſt, the inhabitants of the Dukedome of Brunſwic. And of this opinion alſo Sufridus Petri ſeemeth to be. Crantzius doth derive them from the Catti in Germany and the Phrygians a Region in Aſia; to omit others who would bring them from Saxo the brother of Vandale.

(2) F. Alianus a learned Author, doth thinke the Saxons to be deſcended from Sace, a people in Aſia, and that afterward in proceſſe of time they came to be called Saxons; as if it were written Sax-ſons, as much to ſay as The ſons of the Sace. To this opinion Maſter Henry Ferrers, a Gentleman of ancient deſcent, great reading, and a judicious Antiquary agreeth; whoſe judgement for my particular, I have alwayes honoured, and from the Progeny of his Engliſh Monarchs have taken my principall proceeding in theſe Saxons Succeſſors.

(3) As touching the ancient place of their aboad, Ptolomy the Alexandrian placeth the people Saſones in the Inner Scythia, betwixt the Mountains Alani and Tapuri; and Amianus Marcellinus ſiteth the Sacæ (no doubt the very ſame) a fierce and ſavage Nation, to inhabit overgrowne places, commodious onely for Cattell, at the foot of the mountaines Aſcamnia and Comedus, neere unto which the City Alexandria, Tribatra and Dreſpa were adjoyning, and are ſo ſet by Ptolemie. Neither is it leſſe proioyning, and are ſo ſet by Ptolemie. Neither is it leſſe proiobable that our Saxons deſcended from theſe Sacæ in Scythia, then the Germans from thoſe Germans in Perſia, Aſia, then the Germans from thoſe Germans in Perſia, of whom Herodotus writeth. And Joſeph Scaliger, a renowned Authour, ſheweth, that theſe words ſader mo-der, brader, tutcher, band, and ſuch like: are at this day found in the Perſian tongue in the ſame ſenſe, as we uſe Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter and bound, &c. a great inducement (as ſome thinke) for the Saxons originall from thoſe parts; though in my opinion the Latine, Pater, Mater, Frater, have no leſſe affinitie of ſound, and in all likelihood were the Primitives to theſe of ours. Of theſe Sacæ, Strabo writeth that they made invaſions into countries lying farre off, as namely Armenia, where they left the memory of their ſucceſſe in a part of that Countrey, by calling it Sacaena, after their owne name.

Saxons coming into Europe.

(4) From theſe parts or Aſia, as Scithia and the reſt one Band of them, conſiſting chiefly of their Youth, proceeded by degrees into Europe, and poſſeſſed the Neſſe, or Forland, which the Romans called Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, being at this day the continent part of the kingdome of Denmarke. In which place they were firſt knowne by the name of the Saxons. And here alſo they among themſelves began firſt to be diſtinguiſhed into other Tribes, as Holt-Saxons (for ſo Verſtegan, out of their old Chronicle, ſaith they were called) for their keeping in the Woods: but more properly (we may ſay) into Saxons Angles, and Iutes. From hence afterwards they departed, and paſſing over the River Elbe, divided it themſelves into two Companies; whereof the one taking into the upper parts of Germany, by little and little intruded themſelves into the ancient Seat of the Suevians, which now of them is called Weſtphalia and Saxony: and the other incroached upon Friſland and Holland (then called Batavia) with the reſt of thoſe Countries that lie along the German Seas.

(5) The time wherein theſe Saxons ſhould thus infeſt Germany, by Occa Scarlenſis verdict is as ancient as great Alexander: others account it long after, in the raigne of Tiberius. But before Ptolemy we finde them not mentioned by any Author, who flouriſhed in the dayes of Antoninus Pius, about the yeare from Chriſts Nativity 140. And moſt certain it is by Eutropius and Beda, that before the yeare three hundred when Dioclesian ſwayed the Roman Scepter, the Saxons out of Cimbrica Cherſoneſus fore offended the coaſts of Britaine and France, with their many piracies, and were fearfull even to the Romans themſelves. Theſe multiplying in number and ſtrength, ſeated in the Maritime tract of Iuteland, Sleſwick, Holſatia, Ditmarſe, Breme, Oldenburgh, all Friſland and Holland: and indeed, according to the Teſtimony of Fabius Queſtor, Wholly all the Sea coaſts from the river Rhene unto the Citie Donia, which now is commonly called the Denmerc; and with him Henry of Erford affirmeth Saxon-land to ſtretch from the River Albis unto the Rhene; the bounds of no one people of all the Germans extending any way ſo farre ſaith he.

(6) But theſe ſpreading boughes, are brought by others from a neere Root, planted not in Aſia, or Scythia, but rather in Europe and in Germany it ſelfe; grounding their opinion from Cornelius Tacitus, who maketh them to be bred in the ſame Country, though diſtinguiſhed by Name from the reſt, as others more beſide them were. Which Saxons (ſay they) though they were not mentioned by Tacitus in his Deſcription of Germany, yet in Ptolomy, that wrote not much above fortie yeares after him, they are named, as alſo the Gute and the Angli, Copartners of there Conqueſt. Tacitus placeth among theſe Germanes that worſhiped Herthum the Mother-earth for their Anwordſe Goddeſſe; at firſt but one people, but afterwards divided into three ſeverall Tribes; that is, the Saxons, Angles, and Iutes, who left the remembrance of their Names ſtamped (as it were) in the ſoile from whence

(7) Potolemy, among the Suevians in Germany placeth the Saxons, neere to the mouth of the River Albis, in the continent of Cimbrica Cherſoneſus. And in this Iland of Britaine, Beda telles us that the Kingdomes of the Eaſt and Weſt Saxons were of them peopled: Whoſe originall Name, beſides the Indian Saxo, or the Scythian Sace, ſome will have Etymologed from Saxum a Stone, becauſe forſooth theſe people were hard or Stony-hearted and ſome againe from the Axones in Gallia, of whom Lucan maketh mention in this his verſe:

Longiſq; leves Axones in armis.
And nimble Axons in their Armour light.

Juſtus Lipſius and Engelhuſius affirmeth of the Name Saxon.

(8) Juſtus Lipſius conjectureth, and Engelhuſius affirmeth (as Verſtegan ſaith) that the name Saxon, tooke the appellation from the Faſhion of the Weapon that uſually they wore; which was a Crooked Bowing Sword, ſomewhat like unto a Sithe, with the edge on the contrary ſide, called by the Netherlandes, a Saiſen, and by themſelves Seaxen; and the ſhorter of like faſhion for hand-weapons, Seaxes; ſuch as were thoſe that were hid under their garments in the Maſſacre of the Britiſh Nobility upon Salisbury Plaine, when Henziſt gave the watch-word, Mem eour Seaxes, that is, Take your Swords: three of which knives Argent, in a Field Gules, were born by Erkenwyne king of the Eaſt-Saxons, upon his ſhield of Armes, as ſome of our Heralds have imblazed. And that their names was ſo given them from their weapons, ſome alleage their accuſtomed maner in wearing thereof, which uſually was to truſſe the ſame overthwart their backs when they went forth to battle; whereby notice was taken, and the name attributed unto them, as the like hath beene upon like occaſion unto others: for ſo in Aſia the Scythians were named for their skill in ſhooting; in France the Picards for their long Pikes uſed in fight; and in Ireland the Gallogleſſes, which bare the Pollax as their principall weapon: and of latter times, upon leſſe occaſions have Surnames growne both to particular men, as alſo to whole Societies; which may appeare in ſuch as having vowed their voyage and ſervice for Ieruſalem, were continually upon their backs a red Croſſe, whereby the name Croſſe-back, or in old Engliſh, Crauch backe, was to them attributed: in wch ranke, Edmund Earle of Lancaſter (ſecond ſonne to King Henry the third) was a principall, and thereby got that name, which he could not claw off from his backe ever ſince. So likewiſe theſe men which entred that Religion of Monaſticall life, wore uſually upon the outſide of their Garments the ſigne of a Croſſe, whereby that order was diſtinguiſhed and noted from others by the name of Crouched or Croſſed Friers. But whence or howſoever the name aroſe, among all the Germans there were none in reputation for Military deeds comparable unto theſe Saxons: neither had any adventured by ſea and land, ſo farre to purchaſe renowne and praiſe, or perhaps (and that more likely) to ſupply their owne wants, ranging often from place to place, as men alwayes ready to enter any action: and in Germany to this day a great Dukedome retaineth from them the name of Saxony.

(9) The Gute (no doubt the Iuta) Ptolomie likewiſe placeth in the Iland Scandia, lying very neere the Coaſts of Germany, upon whoſe uttermoſt Promontorie, (as ſaith an ancient Manuſcript) the Iutes did for certaine inhabite, which unto this day of the Danes is called Iutland. Theſe Iutes, Gutes, Getes, or Gothes, or (as Beda calls them) Vites, gave names to thoſe parts of Britain which they inhabited, as to this day the Ile of Wight beareth their impreſſio. This variety of names we wil no further inforce, then that theſe Gothes were not the ſame that had paſſed Iſter by Pontus Euxinus, and over-ran Europe, who were alſo called the Gete by Iohn Maior. Their name, as Verſtegan will have it, was taken from their agilitie, or ſwiftneſſe of foot: and ſome of them (as Sebaſtian Munſter declare th) went and inhabited among the Mountaines that divide Germany from Italy, whereupon their name grew to be called the Hil-Vites, wch are now the Helvetians.

(10) The Angles (by Fabius Queſtor Ethelwardus an ancient Writer, and a Noble Perſon of the Saxons Royall blood) are brought from Old Anglia, a Portion lying betwixt the countries of the Saxons and the Gi-ots, as he writeth them; whoſe chiefe Towne was by them called Sleſwick, and of the Danes, Haithby: but (more particularly) it lay betwixt the City Flemburg and the River Sly, which Country by Albertus Crantzius is called Anglia. From hence (ſaith Henricus Rantzovius) the Saxons, who were alſo called the Angle-Saxons, went to aide the Britaines, And at this day there is a little Provincein the Kingdome of Dania, named Angell, beneath the City Flemburge, which Lindebergius calleth Little Anglia. Their fire notwithſtanding is placed by moſt Authours in Weſtphalia, where the Citie Engern ſtandeth, and where Tacitus and Potolomy rangeth them among the Sueviens; which in their times might very well be. Others would have them in Pomerania, where the Towne Engloen doth ſomewhat found their name: ſo doe Engelheim, Engleburg, and Englerute, places in Germany, beare witneſſe, and are prints of their footing among the Longobards and Suevians. But the moſt glorious remembrance of that their name hath beene for theſe many ages in this Kingdome of England: though Saxo Grammaticus (as erſt we touched, Lib. 5. Cap. 2.) will needs have Angla named from Angul the Sun of Humblus, and Giant-like brother of Danus the firſt King of Denmarke. But Albertus Crantzius being offended at his folly, tels him that England had the name of Britaine many hundred yeares after that Angul was dead. Others there are that derive the name England from the maner of this Ilands ſituation, being narrow in the Weſt and North, for that Eng in the ancient Teutonick Toung, as well as in the moderne, doth ſignifie Narrow, Strait, or a Nooke; and to that purpoſe doe produce this verſe of a Portugals alluſion.

Or that of Goropius, from the Angle or Fiſhing-hooke, becauſe, ſaith he, they hooked all things to themſelves, and might very well therefore be called Good Anglers: a very meane conceit inſooth. But however, moſt certaine it is that theſe Angles ſtole the name of this bleſſed Iland from their elder brethren the Saxons (as Ioab did the birth-right from Eſau) and called it after their owne; as we ſhall further ſhew when our Hiſtory hath gotten to the age of the Saxons Monarchy.

Chapter. III.

Crantzius.

THese Germans, and among them the Catti and Suevians, our Ancestors (according to Albertus Crantzius) were a people (saith Tacitus) well set, sterne of countenance, tall of stature, gray eied, and of a fierie aspect, and their haire yellow. Vnto whom, Witichindus the Monke addeth and saith, that They were faire of complexion, cheerefull of countenance, very comely of stature, and their limbes to their bodies well proportioned; bold of courage, hardy in fight, and very ambitious of glory: for which parts (saith hee) the Franks had them in great admiration, and wondred at their new and strange attire, their armour and their bushie lockes of haire, that from their heads overspred their shoulders; but above all, at their constant resolution and valiant courage. Their heads and beards they suffer (saith Tacitus) to grow at length, and never put off that vowed ornament and bond of valour, untill they have slaine an enemie: but then upon blood and spoile, they have slaine an enemie: but then upon blood and spoile, they uncover their forehead, and say they have paied backe the price of their birth, and thinke themselves worthy of their Country and parents. Their curled locks (saith he) they bind up in knots, and standing on end, tie it in the crowne onely: that is the harmelesse care they have of beautie, to seeme more terrible to the Enemy. And by Sidonius Apollinaris his testimony, they used to shave off the haire of their heads, reserving onely a tuft in the crowne, about which they wore a hoope or plate of copper, which caused the haire to stand upright, as by these his verses appeareth.

(2) And that they were indeede bold upon the Seas, Agathias witnesseth. The Saxons (saith he) a most valorous kind of men, excell all others in Piracies. In imitation of whom, Isidore affirmeth, that for their valour and nimblenesse in service they had their name. A people (saith he) stout, hardy, and most valiant, and farre out-stripping all others in piracies, seemed more fearfull to love on Land then at Sea. Whose intrusions and sudden violence both France and Britaine with great dammages felt: for in Gallia they seized into their possession the Country of * Baiocasses, as is to be seene in Gregorius Turonensis, who thence termeth them Saxones * Baiocassiones: and in Britaine an Office of Charge was instituted to defend the Coasts from their irruptions, the Captaine whereof was commonly called the Count or Earle of the Saxons Shoare: of whose Piracies and savage Cruelties, let us heare Sidonius in his Epistle to Nummantius complaine: So many Rowers as you see (saith he) so many Arch-Pirats thinke you beholds, they all of them together so command, obey, steach, and learne, to rob and steale. There is no enemy so cruell as this, that setteth upon others as unawares, and as occasion serves, as warily slips himselfe away. Hee setteth at nought such as encounter him: hee bringeth to nought those that take no heed of him: whom he overseth, he surely overtaketh: when he flieth, he is sure to escape. To this service, shipwracks inure him, they terrifie him not. Be there a tempest up, the same terveth them, and to assaile others. They never weigh Anchor upon the enemies Coasts, but with a resolution again to returne: and their manner is to kill every tenth Captive with a lingring and dolorous torment: for to such Vowes they binde themselves, and with such sacrifices they discharge their Vowes again, being indeed not so much purified by such Sacrifices, as polluted with Sacriledge: and the bloudy and abominable Murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a Prisoner unto death, then to set him free for a Ransome.

(3) Their Apparell was much different from others, and seemed strange to the Gaules, as Witichindus hath told us: and Tacitus declareth the manner thereof, which (saith he) was a kind of Cassocke, called Sagum, clasped, or for want of a clasp fastned with a thorn, having otherwise no garments at all, but going starke naked. Nevertheless, the richer sort were distinguished from others, by their garments which were neither large nor wide, as the Sarmates and Parthians use to weare them but straite; and shewing the proportion of everie part of their bodie: besides they wore Pelts made of beasts skins.

The Man and Womans attire differd in nothing, saith he saving that the women use linnen Garments trimmed and interlaced with purple, and without sleeves, their armes bare, and bosomes naked and uncovered. Yet Paulus Diaconus speaking of the Longobards, comparing them to the Saxons, saith that their Cassockes were large and worne loose, most of linnen, trimmed and set out with very broad Gards or welts purfled, and embroidered with sundry colours, and the richer sort with Pearles: their haire, bound upin a copper hoope, flood in tufts upon the crowne, the rest curled and falling downe upon their shoulders: their beards they kept still uncut, till they had killed an enemie; and for another note of ignominie, they wore an Iron Ring, as a signe of bondage, till they had cast it from them by the Conquest of a Man. Great Knives, or rather broad bending Swords, they trusted upon little Shields thwart their backes, from which (as we shewed) Engelhusius avoucheth they had their appellation. Hee that abandoned or lost this [shield in battle (saith Tacitus) was debarred from their publike Sacrifices and Assemblies, the greatest disgrace that could be; for very shame and griefe whereof, many, many times hanged themselves. And upon these Shields their manner was to lift up their new elected General, and with acclamations so to carrie him thorow their Campe.

(4) For Warres, the Germans by Tacitus are reputed the best, who for two hundred and ten yeeres held tack with the Romans. Not the Samnites (saith he) not the Carthaginians, not the Spaniards, or the Gallois, no not the Parthians have so much troubled us: for what can the East object against us, saving the death of Crassus, when he had defeated Pacorus, before trodden downe by Ventidius? But the Germans having either slaine, or taken Carbo, and Cassius, and Scaurus Aurelius, and Servilius Cepio, and M. Manlius, have defeated also five Consularie Armies, and Varus with three Legions in Cesars time. Neither have C. Marius in Italie, or Iulius in Gallia, Drusus or Nero, and Germanicus molested them at home in their Country, but to their more smart. And yet these Saxons among those valiant Germans were accounted the best for courage of minde, ſtrength of body, and enduring of travell, as Zosimus saith. Terrible also they were, and full of agilitie, by the reported of Orosius: and for their sudden invasions, most feared of the Romans, saith Marcellinus.

(5) Their fashion was to goe forth singing to the Warres, (or rather they especially are said to march to battle, whereas others are said to goe) carrying before them certaine Images taken out of their consecrated Woods. Their manner was before they joyned Battle, to trie by single Combat (therein arming one of their own against some caprived enemie) what ſucceſſe was to be expected: and this they kept as a Law unviolated, that none might presume to beare Armes before hee was solemnly admitted, where in a frequent Assemble a Shield was given him by his Parents or Kindred: and this was the pledge (as it were) of his first honour, he being till then reputed but a particular of a Familie; but thence-forward a member of the Common-wealth. They are very sensible, wise, and considerate in their service, in preferring choice Captaines, in following their Leaders, in observing their rankes, in taking the advantage and benefit of the day, and intrenching in the night, holding Fortune ever doubtfull, but valour alwaies certaine. Their weapons, as reſpecteth Ioannes Pomarius, were long Speares, broad Swords, and the Crosbow: these they held in such esteeme, that with a horse furnished, Shield, Sword, and Lance, their Virgins were received in mariage, accounting them for the greatest bonds, and the very Patron-Gods of Matrimony: which custome might well bee taken from their neighbours the ancient Saxacens, whose Maidens usually presented to their husbands a Tent and a Speare, in way of Dowrie at the entrance of their Nuptials. And among these Germans those Martial habiliments were in such use, that they did meet neither at Feasts nor in Counsell, but in their Armour.

A People (saith Tacitus) whom thou canst not so easily perswade to manure the ground, as to provoke the Enemie, and adventure wounds, holding small esteeme of that which is gotten by the sweat of their browes; when it might have been obtained by the expence of their blood. A strange diversitie (saith he) that the same men should so much love sloth, and hate quietnesse. It is with them a great shame for their Prince to be overcome in Valour; but for any one to returne alive from that Battell wherein the Prince is slaine, is a perpetuall infamie and reproach. And that their resolutions were ever noble, and their courage nor danted in distreſſe or bondage, it well appeared by a whole band of them taken by Symachus, and designed for the Romans pastime of Sword-players, who the same morning that this spectacle was expected, strangled themselves rather then they would incurre such infamine and baseneſſe, as to make others pastime with the ignominious usage of their owne persons.

Tacit. de scr. Germ.

(6) Their Lawes were severe, and vices not laughed at, and good Customs of greater authority among them, then elsewhere were good Lawes; no temporising for favour, nor usury for gaine; but bounteous in hospitality. and liberall in gifts, accounting both due to be given and received, yea and that without thankes: no Nation freer from adulterie, or punishing that sinne more severely. For the woman offending, having first her haire cut off, was turned starke naked out of her Husbands house, and that in presence of her owne kindred; thence she was scourged with whips thorow the Towne, without regard of birth, beauty, age or wealth, and never after could find another Husband. Those that were unnaturally leand of their bodies, their manner was to drowne them in filthy mud, and to cover them with hurdles. Yea and greater punishments then these the Pagan-Saxons executed upon such offenders, as by the Epistle of Boniface an English-man, Arch-bishop of Mogunce, which he wrote unto Ethelbald King of the Mercians, in reproouing his adulterous life, is manifeſt. For (saith hee) in the ancient Country of the Saxons (where there was no knowledge of God) if either a Maid in her fathers house, or one having a husband, became a whore, she should be strangled with her owne hands closed to her mouth, and the Corrupter should bee hanged upon the Pit wherein she was buried. If shee were not so used, then her Garments being cut away downe from the Girdle steed, the chaste Matrons did scourge and whip her, and did pricke her with knives, and so was she sent from Towne to Towne, where other freſh and new scourges did meet and torment her unto death.

And their severe Lawes a long time remaining in the daies of Christianitie, declare with what rigour (without regard of person) they both examined and punished this offence: whereof that of Queene Emma, the mother of King Edward the Confeſſor, is a sufficient example, who being accused for incontinencie of body with Alwin Bishop of Winchester, was enjoined to passe over nine Plough-share Irons glowing red hot, she being blind-fold and bare-footed; by which triall shee is said to have acquitted her selfe, insomuch that having passed them all before shee knew it, cried and said; O good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation? This punishment beginning in these Pagans, and continuing unto the yeere 750. Stephen the Second, and most pontificall Pope of Rome, did utterlie abolish, as too severe and over-rigorous for Christians to undergoe.

The Virgins of these Saxons were never to bee married but once, that they might have no other thoughts, nor further desire but in case of matrimony: neither had the men pluralitie, excepting great Personages, and they sued unto in regard of procreation; for to be without Children, was to be without reputation. So that the testimonie of Salvianus, which lived among them, fitteth well our purpose, saying; Though the Saxons are outragious in cruelty, yet for chastity they are to be honoured.

(7) But as in these vertues they out-stripped most Pagans; so in the Zeale of their heathenish superstitions and Idolatrous service, they equalized any of them: for besides Herthas, the Mother-Earth, whom the Angli our Ancestors accounted for a Goddesse of Aide: they worshipped Mercurie under the name of Woden

* Hence Thursday seemeth to be named.

Woden for their principall God of Battell: after whose victories they usually sacrificed to him their Prisoners taken in warres, and of him named one of the week dayes Wodensday, whereon he was chiefly worshipped: whose wife named Frea, was by the like foolery held to be Venus a Goddesse, unto whom another of their weeke dayes was assigned for name and service; which of us is called Friday..

Isis, likewise with them, was a goddesse of great account, so was Easter, unto whom they sacrificed in the moneth of Aprill; whence it commeth (saith Beda) that they called Aprill Easter-Moneth: and we still name the Feast of the Resurrection, Easter. The Images of all these they stil bare before them in battle, reputing no small confidence in their aides: and yet (saith Tacitus) they thought it unbeseeming to paint their gods in the shape of men; having even by Nature doubtlesse written in their hearts, a regard to that demand of the Lord: To whom will ye liken me that I should be like him, sayth the Holy-one IEHOVAH. They gave great heed also to the neighing of their Horses, and to the flight and singing of Birds, as ominous fore-shewers of future events.

(8) These Superstitions, Ethelward even in his dayes complained of: That they had infected the Danes, Normans and Suevians, with the worship of this god Woden; unto whom those barbarous Nations offered sacrifices, that they might be victorious where they fought. And as Crantz. recordeth, Herald the first of that name, and Norwayes King, was so farre overgone, that he sacrificed two of his Sonnes unto his idols, that he might obtaine a tempest to disperse, and put backe the Armado, which Herald King of Denmarke had prepared against him.

This generall defection of Gods true worship, Adam Bremensis maketh mention of in this manner: In a Temple, saith he, *called in their vulgar and native speech Vbsola, which is made altogether of Gold, the people worship the Statues of three gods, in such manner, as that Thor the mightiest of them hath only a Throne or Bed: on either hand of him Woodan and Frisco hold their places. And thus much they signifie: Thor say they, beareth rule in the Aire, and governeth the Thunder and Lightning, Windes, Showres, Faire weather, Corne, and Fruits of the Earth. The second, which is Woodan, that is stronger, maketh Warres, and ministreth manly valour against Enemies. The third is Frisco, bestowing largely upon mortall men, peace and pleasure, whose Image they devise and pourtray with a great virile member. Woodan they engrave armed, like as we use to cut and expresse Mars.

(9) Their controversies and doubtfull matters were decided by drawing of Lots, which they ever made of some fruit-bearing tree, and was performed after this manner: If there were publike cause, the Priest; if private, the Goodman of the house, or worthiest in the company, tooke those slitted slips, distinguished with certaine markes that had beene scattered at hap hazzard upon a white garment: and after praiers and invocation on their God, with eyes fixed upon heaven, and three times lifting the same lots aloft, gave their interpretations thereof according to the markes therein inscribed; which was received and beleeved for a most sure Oracle: as the like was observed upon other occasions, both by the inspections of Beasts intrals, and singings of Birds, after the accustomed manner of other Gentiles, that doted upon the augurations for things of future successe.

Tacit. in vita Germ.

The government of the Saxons.

(10) For the generall government of their Countrie they ordained twelve Noblemen chosen from among others, for their worthines and sufficiency: These in the time of peace rode their several circuits to see justice and good customes observed, and they often of course at appointed times met together, to consult and give order in publike affaires: but ever in time of warre one of these twelve was chosen to be King, and so to remaine so long onely as the warres lasted: and that being ended, his name and dignitie of King also ceased, becomming againe as before. And this custome continued among them, untill their wars with the Emperour Charles the Great: at which time Wittekind, one of the twelve aforesaid, a Nobleman of Angria in Westphalia, bore over the rest the name and authoritie of King; and he being afterward, by means of the said Emperour, converted to the faith of Christ, had by him his mutable Title of King turned into the enduring stile and honour of Duke: and the eleven others were in like manner by the said Emperour advanced to the honourable Titles of Earles and Lords, with establishment for the continuall remaining of these Titles and Dignities unto them and their heires. Of whose descents are since issued the greatest Princes at this present in Germanie. But though they observed this faild forme of governement elsewhere, yet heere in Britaine it was otherwise, as heereafter will appeare.

(11) And thus much out of my poore readings, I have observed of the originall beginnings, the names, maners, and customes, of our ancient Progenitors, the worthy Saxons, without either amplifying or impayring their glory: who being of all the Germans so much devoted to warre, as that their only fame therein was many times sufficient to daunt the Enemy, were thought upon by the downe-cast Britaines as the fittest to support their ruined Estate; of whose Entrance, Conquests, and Kingdomes, wee are now next addrested to speake.

THE SAXONS ARRIVALL INTO BRITAINE VNDER THE CONDVCT OF HENGIST AND HORSA.

CHAPTER. IV.

An. Dorn. 450.

VVHen the State of Britaine was miserably torne by the calamities of Civill Dissentions, Famine, Dearth, and Robberies, the Romans returned, their own Strength decayed, and their Afflictions daily augmented by their wonted enemies, the Scots and Picts, no hope was left to their despairing hearts, that of themselves they were able to defend themselves: and therefore (as we have shewed) they called to their aid the Saxons, a Nation fierce and valarous, who to the number of nine thousand, under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa, two brethren, entred Britaine at Ebsfleet in the Ile of Thanet, in the raigne of Theodosius the second, and of Valentinian the third, Emperors of the East and West, about the yeare of Grace 450. Received they were with great joy as Angels from Heaven, and saluted with songs after the accustomed manner of the Britaines, who appointed them the Iland Thanet for their habitation.

(2) These Saxons in short time made proofe of their Manhood. For overcomming the Enemie even in Scotland it selfe, seated themselves in some part thereof; so that their Conquest seemed absolute, and the Britaines freed from their former assaults. Peace thus setled, and the Inhabitants freed, a friendly Composition was made betwixt these Nations, wherein the Saxons undertooke to maintaine the field, and the Britains to sustaine the Charge. In which league they abode some certaine time, saith Witichindus, making use in a civill sort of the Brets friendlhip: but so soone as they perceived the Country large, the soile fertile, and the hands of the Inhabitants slow to practise feats of Armes: and further considering with themselves, that themselves and the greatest part of the Saxons had no certaine place of abood, they found faults with their pay and want of victuals, making that their quarrell, as both too meane, and too little for their high deserts; threatning withall, as unkind guests that shortly they would reckon without their Hosts: and thereupon sending over for more of their Nation, entred peace with the Scots and Picts, who altogether rose against the poore Brets.

(3) And Hengist, that by the gift of Vortigern had got the whole possession of Kent, sent for more supply of Saxons unto his ayde, pretending employments of their service in other parts, but indeed to make strong his owne designes: and these swarming daily over into Britaine, got the strength of munition and command of military affaires without impeach: For the King holding himself so now sure from all interceptions, gave his immoderate senses scope to nourish more freely their sensuall pleasures, and committed more audaciously those vices, unto which his owne corrupt nature was naturally addicted: This Hengist soone perceived, and to adde more matter fit for flame, fed still the humours of this vicious King, outwardly shewing his care and readinesse for the Lands defence, his counsell and love to the Nobles in estate, and his courteous carriage to the Commons in generall; but to the King an over-seeming diligence, and servile obedience: by all which, ere it was long, he gave fire to their traine, that blew up the foundations of the British policie.

(4) For feasting the King in the Castle of Tonnge, commanded his daughter, a Lady of passing beautie, to attend the banquet, whose excellent feature and seemely behaviour, blew the sparks of desire to right into Vortigerns wanton eye, that they presently kindled a flame in his lascivious heart: for in the midst of his Cups, Rowena (so was the Damosell called) with a low reverence and pleasing grace, sauted the King with a Cup of gold full of sweet wine, incharming it with these words in her language, Wæs heal hlaford Cyning, which is in English, Be of health Lord King: he demanding the meaning, would be taught to answer to her owne understanding, and said, Dpine heal, that is, Drink health; whereof when he had pledged her, (as we speake) this bowle infected his senses with no lesse sottishnesse, then that of Belus is said to doe Dido when Cupid plaid the childe Ascanius betwixt Aeneas and her; and brought more bale to the Land, then afterwards did that which was prefented to king John at Swinsted Abbey, by Simon the poisoning Monk: for notwithstanding that he had a Queen then living, (himselfe not young, having sonnes at mans estate, in profession a Christian, whose Religion alloweth neither polygamy nor adultery) did importunate Hengist that Rowena might be his wife: which at first with some shew of excuse and unworthinesse of person, was denied, but lastly consented unto, and the Nuptials performed. And now Fortune casting occasion daily into Hengists lap, he gave his aspiring thoughts no rest, till he had got the Crowne from Vortigerns head, and feized all under the Saxons power.

(7) This Hengist was doubtlesse a Prince of the chiefest bloud and Nobility of the Saxons, and by birth of Angria in Westphalia, wherein unto this day a place retaineth the name of Hengster-holt. Hee with his brother were the sons of one Wihtgisl, whose father was Witta, and his father Wecta the eldest sonne of Vodens, as Beda writes him, of whose issue many Kings of sundry Provinces (saith he) had their originall.

Hee growne now in high favour with the King, by the marriage of Rowena, and feared of the Nobility for his strength and policy, bare himselfe great among all, and his supplies daily arriving, pestred (if not plagued) most parts of this Iland. For saith Ninius and Beda; The riches of Britaine, and the fertilitie of the soile, were such motives to their covetous and aspiring mindes, that where they got footing, there they kept standing, and picked occasions where they were too strong. Among them that were sent for, by the advice of Hengist, two principall Captaines, Octa and Ebissa, were chiefest, who being embarked into forty Pinnaces, sailed about the Picts Coasts, wasting the Iles that were called the Orcades, and got many countries from them beyond the Frith, whereby a further terrour was stricken into the Britaines hearts.

(8) The Nobility perceiving what was in working, and the marke wherat Hengist set his eye to aime, complained to the King of their dangerous estate, shewed themselves agrieved to bee dispossessed of Offices and charge, (as Gnorong, the Earle or Lieutenant of Kent, by Hengist had been) the Land pestred with strangers, that fought their subversion, reproowing him much for his match with that Infidel Rowena, his own careleste government and adulterous life, and in such manner, that Vodine Archbishop of London, a man of great sanctitie, feared not to tell him that thereby he had endangered both his soule and Crowne: which words by Vortigern were so digested, that short ly it cost the good Archbishop his life. But he still continuing in his lascivious and careleste idlenesse, was lastly taught by wofull experience, what misery wilfull rashnesse and neglected government doe bring: for the Britaines his subjects no longer would be thus abused, to see themselves woven into greater danger by shew of defence, then they formerly had beene by the hostility of the enemy; but forthwith disclaimed their obedience to the King, when he had raigned the space of sixe yeares, and chose for their Governour his sonne, young Vortimer.

(9) His Sonne he was indeed by nature, but not his in conditions, who (besides the quarrell of his Queene mother for Rowenas sake, rejected) bare an inward love to his native Countrey, and an outward hate to the strangers that daily sought the subversion thereof, and presently encountred with them in a pitched Battell neere unto Ailsford in Kent, wherein Catigern and Horsa, brethren to Vortimer and Hengist, in single fight hand to hand slew each other.

The like Monument the Saxons built for Horsa, which time hath now defaced, and whereof Beda maketh mention, who saith, that a tombe bearing his name, was in his dayes to be seene in the East part of Kent. The credit whereof is continued to this day, where the Village Horsted is reported to have received that name from him, which standeth in the very same place where that Battle was fought, as the Inhabitants report.

(10) Three other Battles after this with variable successe were fought betwixt the Britaines and the Saxons, one at Crayford, another at Weppeds-fleet, and the third upon Colmore: in which last the Britaines bare themselves so valiantly, that the Saxons were driven into the Ile of Thanet (if not over the seas) so that small hope rested for them so long as this valiant Vortimer lived, who had dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in Thanet, as Fabian saith. After this Victory long hee lived not, but was made away by poison through the meanes of Rowena the mother of all this mischiefe, when he had sate King the space of foure yeares: and the father again e reestablished.

(11) Vortigern now was no sooner restored, but that Hengist had notice therof, who was then in building a Castle at Leiden in Holland, as their Annales witnesse, and Iohn Dousa in his verses specifie: where leaving all (as it were) at randome, returned to follow his fortunes further in Britaine, and with a mighty Army of his Saxons thought to land without impeachment: but the Britaines growne bold by their former victories, and their bloud not cooled since it was heat in fight, admonished their reestablished King who with them went to withstand his arrivage. When Hengist therefore perceived their courage, and knew their hatreds to him and his Saxons, hee sought by smooth words to gaine the shoare; and by some stratageme, his wished desire: therefore pretending only to visit his daughter, yea, and to rid the Land of her, if so he might have leave of the King and them; and therefore desired a conference in friendly manner: after which, his Saxons should depart the Land, and rest the like friends to the Britains as they were when first they came in.

(12) This motion seemed reasonable to the Nobility, and the place and time appointed, which was the first of May, and upon the Plaine of Ambri, now called Salisbury: whither upon equall tearmes (as was thought) each party repaired, and a while conferred with friendly semblances; but in the end the Saxons urging their wrongs, fell from words unto blowes, the watch-word first given by Hengist their leader. The Britaines meant simply, and wore no weapons, according to covenants, but the Saxons under their long Cassocks had short Skeines hid, with which, no sooner the words, Nemeowr Seaxes, were pronounced, but that each slew him with whom he conferd, by which treason the Britaines lost three hundred of their disarmed Nobility; onely Eldoll Duke of Glocester, as Randulph Higden declareth, with a Stake gotten from the hedge, slew seventeene Saxons. The king they tooke prisoner; for whose ransome, the Countries of Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Norfolk, were delivered unto these Infidels, who shortly desiled the beauty of Christianity with their Paganisme and Heathenish cruelties. Then (saith Beda) the fire of Gods vengeance was kindled by these wicked Conquerors, and raged first upon those Countries next adioyning, and afterwards from the East Sea unto the West, without resistance made to quench the same; publike and private houses were overthrowne and laide levell with the ground, Priests were slaine standing at the Altars, and Bishops with their flocks were murthered; neither was there any to bury the dead. And these are the times whereof wee spake, and wherein the miserable Britaines abandoned the Land, or hid themselves in caves, wherein they either perished for hunger, or redeemed their lives with perpetuall slavery.

(13) Neither were their calamities greater in outward afflictions then their soules, polluted with the heresie of the Pelagians, brought by Agricola, the son of Severianus a Pelagian Bishop, that did foulely corrupt the faith of the Britaines: to redresse which, Germanus Alisiodorensis; and Lupus Bishop of Trecassa in France, were by the Brethren desired, and sent unto their their thus troubled and declining estate. These pillars of Gods truth, after they had powred forth prairs, and convicted the Heretikes, led an Army of Britaines against the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victory; after which (like unto people that drew on Gods vengeance and their owne destructions) they fell to robberies and rapine, one citie banding against another, and all laid waste by the Saxons, and themselves. These miseries doth Gildas impute to have hapned to his Britaines, because they tooke no care to preach the Gospell of Christ unto those Infidels the English Saxons, that in their heathenish cruelties sought the Lands destruction.

The principall cause of the Britaines miseries.

(14) Vortigern thus dispossessed, for his further security betooke himselfe into Wales, where among those vast Mountaines he built a strong Castle; of whose foundation, Merlin the Welsh Wizard, with the future successe that should afterward follow the Britaines, hath by way of prophecie vainly spoken. This Castle most of our Writers have said to be in South-Wales, upon a rockie and solitary mountaine called Breigh, or after others Cloaric, in the West part of the Province, not farre from Radnor, and neere unto the River Gnava: but the Inhabitants of Northwales report (by the reports of their ancestors) that in old Bethkelert was that Castle, which Vortigern built, and is yet called Embris, from Merlin Embris, as they affirme. And surely (besides the craggy and solitarineste of the place, which seemed to me rather an entrance into the shaddow of death, then to be the palace or Court of a King) the River Llynterreny mooveth much; by which Faustus his sonne, begotten of his owne daughter Rowena, is faid to spend his life in continuall prayers.

(15) But whileſt Vortigern was busied in building this Castle; and the Saxons making spoiles wheresoever they came, the Britaines under the conduct of Aurelius Ambrosius, began to receive some breath of hopes, and to shew themselves out of their Caves. This Ambrosius (saith Beda) was a gentle natured man, which onely of all the bloud of the Romans remained then alive, his parents being slaine, which had borne the name of the king of the Country. He with his brother Vter, commonly called Pendragon, returning out of Britain Armorica, where they had remained from the Tyranny of Vortigerne, landed at Totnesse in the West of this Iland, unto whom resorted great Troopes of Britaines.

Howbeit Matthew of Westminster maketh him fight another battle upon the River Dun, in Anno 489. wherein, saith he, Hengist was taken. And Polydore saith, that in the same battle Hengist at the first onset was slain, with many of his Germans: the fame of whose victory (saith he) is had in memory with the Inhabitants of those parts even unto this day. Yet Gildas, Beda, and Ethelward, Writers of those ancient times, and two of them Saxons, mention not the death of Hengist, neither this great victory of the Britaines. And Marianus the Scottish Monke seemeth to affirme the contrary, where he saith, that Hengist raigned thirty foure yeares in great glory, and dyed peaceably, leaving his son Eske to succeed him in the Kingdome of Kent. With whom also Florianus the Monke of Worcester agreeth. How soever, sure it is, had not the divine power of God otherwise determined, the waining estate of Brit.

doubtlesse had recovered her former strength; both by the prayers of Bishop German, the prowesse of this last spoken of Ambrosius, the valourous attempts of Vter Pendragon, and the worthy industries of the Christian King Arthur. The famous resistances of this last mentioned Arthur, the Monke of Monmouth with such fables hath augmented, that his acts and Travels may be compared to those of Hercules, or with the Conquests of Cæsar himselfe; insomuch that he hath been accounted and ranged in the Catalogue of the worlds nine Worthies. And surely (by the testimony of Malmsbury) hee was a Prince of great worth, and did often adventure with his small power to meet the Saxons in the face and in the field.

But the Britaines strength daily increasing, and new supplies of these Saxons daily arriving, brought the one in despaire to enjoy their owne right, and the other to triumph in their intrusions of wrongs. For continually incroaching forward, and inlarging their limits where soever they came, drove the inhabitants before them from their wonted possessions, and seated themselves in the Southerne and best part of the Land, laying the stones (as it were) of those foundations, whereupon in short time they raised their most glorious buildings.

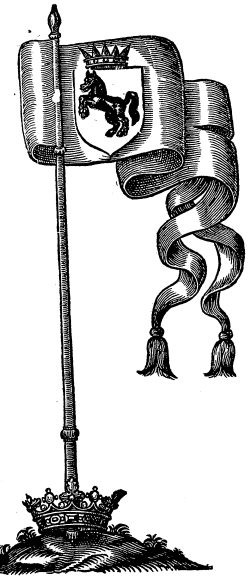
(17) For every severall Captaine or Commander accounting that part his owne, wherein he first entred or made conquest of, with full resolution determined to keepe what he had got, (as an absolute King) commanded his Province, whereby the Land became burdened with seven of them at the first: as Hengist of Kent; Ella, of those parts now called Sussex & Surrey, Cherdik of the West; Erchinwen of the East; Ida of the North, Crida of the Middle land, and Vffa of the parts now Middlesex and Essex: which kingdomes thus begun and erected, stood not long unshaken by civill distentions among themselves, each king envying his equals greatnesse, and seeking to enlarge his owne Dominions upon the next. In which cumbustions, few or none of them came to the grave in due time, but were either slaine in warres, or treacherously murdered in peace, or else inforced to sheare himselfe a Monke, and resigne his Crowne to another. To speake of all these together, I hold would bring too great a confusion to our History, and needlesse surcharge to the Readers memory: to avoid which, I will briefly set downe the Conquests, Circuits, Acts, and Descents, that in every severall Kingdome happened while they stood in their Heptarchie, before they were united to an absolute Monarchy, and then (according to my prefixed purpose) continue the succession of GREAT BRITAINS Monarchs.

The mightiest of the Saxon Kings alwaies King of the Englishmen.



(18) For albeit the land was divided into seven severall Kingdomes, and each of them carrying a soveraigne command within his own limits; yet one of them ever seemed to be supreame of the rest; and that Prince who had the greatest power or succesſe in his warres, was ever accounted and called, The King of the Englishmen, as Venerable Beda in the fifth Chapter of his second Booke, and History of England, ever termeth them.

Onely the East Saxons intituled not soe with their neighbours Dominions.

(19) Such therefore as held the rest under, either by armes or aliance, in amity or subjection, swayed the whole Monarchy, and were acknowledged as Supremes in power over the rest; which succeeded not ever in the same family, neither continued in one and the same Kingdome without reversement, but were carried upon the Floods and Ebbes of variable succesſe, or as destiny pleased to alter the chance: whereof each of them (saving the East-saxons onely) did attaine to the height of that government, as to the haven of their wished desires. See therefore (if you please) a generall view of the whole, and afterward the severall Histories of every Kingdome a part, before we enter into the Succession of the English Saxons Monarches.

THE GENEALOGIES ROYALL OF THE SAXONS

KINGS OF KENT, FROM HENGIST, THEIR FIRST: WITH THE SUCCESSIONS, RAIGNES, ISSUES, AND ACTS, of all their Kings, unto BALDRED the last: subdued by King EGBERT, the West Saxon MONARCH.

CHAPTER V.

ROm Hengist the first Conqueror, and Ethelbert the first Christian King, the Kingdome of Kent hath preheminence above the rest of that Heptarchie. For, Hengist for valour, policy, & strength, was the fore-leader of those that laid their Estates here in Great Britaines Iland, and with such happy successe, so planted the Tree, as from the same Stem, many faire Sciens daily yet spring. And good Ethelbert laid the foundation of Gods Church, so deep in this Realme as the gates of hell shall never prevaile against it, though his owne foundations laid of his first Church, hath felt the waight of a ruinating hand; when with Axes and Hammers (in the days of King Henry the eight) both that, and many such Sanctuaries, were broken & beaten down, with a more rash, then Godly zeale; and those Oratories for assemblies, made now the seats of prophane merchandizing; and altars of prayers, the Tables for Mammon and money changers; if not to more vile and base uses. But leaving to mention what may not be remedied; behold in this Tree, the boughes that branched from Hengist the Roote, wherein observe, their matches or marriages are made knowne by the sculpture of an hand in hand, and the coat-armes of the parties empaled; though therein we rather follow the allowance of the later, then urge them from antiquity it selfe. But from the best approved Authors we continue such Kings as ruled in Kent, in a continued succession; and that broken off, wee there breake the Bough, and thence name them for Kings, but of an uncertain succession, as by the three last in this stem is evidently seene.

THE KINGDOME OF KENT.

Chapter. V.

1. An. Dom. 554. Kent in the dayes of Julius Cæsar the seate of foure kings.

Kent, the first Dominion of the Saxons Heptarchie, was formerly in the dayes of Iulius Cæsar, the seate of foure severall petty Kings; yet never called a Kingdome before that Hengist the first Saxon Captaine, in favour of his daughter Rowena, got it by the gift of King Vortegern, about the yeare of Grace 454. and in the seventh yeare after his first arrivage heere, hee first laid the foundation of those fortunes which the Saxons his Nation in this land afterwards attained unto: for having possessed the same with Victory and Wealth, the space of thirty one yeares, some adde three more, hee left it in peace to his sonne Eske; and the rest of the Iland so weakened by his meanes, that others of his Nation were shortly planted in other parts thereof. It contained the Continent that lyeth betwixt our East-Ocean, and the River Thames, being bounded upon the West with Sussex and Surrey.

Of Hengist see more in the succession of the English Monarchy, cap. 12.

2. An. Dom. 488. Vortimers Affinius. Vide the second King of Kent. Vortimer taken prisoner in Yorke.

Eske, the second King of Kent, is reported to be the second sonne of King Hengist, who accompanying his father into this Iland, made proofe of his great valour in all his battels fought against the Britaines, and in one of them (as Ieffery of Monmouth reporteth) being taken prisoner, was for a time retained in Yorke, but thence escaping, he aided his father in the battell of Crekynford; and after his decease, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, from whom those inhabitants (saith Beda) were called Eskings, amongst whom he peaceably raigned about twenty yeares, and dyed in the yeare of our Lord, 512.

His raigne and death. Beda hist. eccles. Angl. lib. 2. c. 5.

3. An. Dom. 512. Octa his raigne

Octa the sonne of Eske, began his raigne over his fathers Dominions, the yeare of Christs Incarnation 512. and raigned twenty two yeares, without mention of any memorable Act.

4. An. Dom. 532. Hwerwit wrigan Imerik his children.

Imerik, the sonne of Eske, and the fourth King of Kent, raigned twenty five yeares, saith Stowe; twentie nine, saith Savil, in his Table collected from our English Writers. He had issue, Ethelbert the first Christian King of Kent, and a daughter named Ethelburg, married to Sledda, the second King of the East-Saxons, the mother of Sebert and Segebald.

5. An. Dom. 561. Ethelbert the sonne of Emerik.

Ethelbert, the sonne of Imerik, in the yeare of grace 561. succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, who by reason of his yong yeares, was sore molested by his neighbour Princes, that fought to enlarge their Provinces upon his: for now the Saxons having made full Conquest of the Britaines, fell at variance among themselves, taking all occasions to supplant each other, as Conquerors commonly can endure no equals, and prosperity ever is looked at with an envious eye, whereupon Ceulin king of the West-Saxons, proud of his victorious successes over the Britaines, began to disdaine all amity with his owne neighbour Saxons, invaded the Territories of this young Prince; and in a set battell slew Osluse and Cnebban, two of his Dukes, discomfited the King, and wonne the day. This field was fought at Wiphandun, in the yeare of our Redemption, 567. and is noted to be the first battle betwixt the Saxons themselves since their first entrance into Britaine.

Ceulin invadeth his Territories.

But young Ethelbert growne unto yeares, repaired his losses with the inlargement of his Kingdome to the bankes of Humber, and was the fift Monarch of the Englishmen, as after we shall heare. His first Wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperik, King of France, by whom he had Edbald, Ethelburg, and Edburg: a second Wife he had unworthy of name, for her incestuous and abominable act, in matching her selfe in marriage with her Husbands Sonne, A sinne (saith the Apostle) not to be named among the Gentiles. Of this King, as also of all the rest that attained unto the glorie, to be enstiled (per excellentiam) the Soveraigne Kings of the Englishmen, I purpose to bee sparing in their particular kingdomes, and to reserve the larger relation of their Acts, Matches, Issues, and continuance, to the times of their severall Monarchies, wherby a more historicall course may be carried, through the successions of the English-Saxons Monarches, and a needlesse repetition of the same things avoided, which otherwise of necessitie would follow. Hee raigned in great glory fiftie six yeares, and was the First Saxon King that received and established the Gospell. He died the foure and twentieth day of Februarie, the yeare of Christ 616. after he had raigned 56. yeares, and was buried at Canterbury, with this inscription upon his Tombe:

6. An. Dom. 617 Beda hist. eccl. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 5.

Edbald, the sonne of King Ethelbert, in the yeare of Christ 617. assumed the government of Kent who no sooner, saith Beda, had gotten from under the awe of his father, but hee refused to entertaine the Doctrine of Christ, and so polluted himself with the foule sinne of fornication, as that he married his Mother in Law, the late Wife to his owne Father: which which two hainous faults gave his subjects both occasion and impunity to returne to to their former idolatry, who under his father, for favour or for feare, had yeelded to the lawes of the Christian faith. But the scourge of God and vengeance from heaven wanted not to the punishment of this unfaithfull King: for he was plagued for a season with often phrensie of minde, and raging fury of an uncleane spirit; but by Laurence Archbishop of Canterbury, he was at length converted from his Idolatry and incestuous Matrimony, and being baptized, indevoured to maintaine the state of the Gospel. He married Emme, the daughter of Theobert, King of Austrasie, now Lorraine, by whom he had issue a daughter named Enswith, who died a Virgin at Fulkstone, a Religious house in Kent, of her fathers foundation; and two sonnes, whereof Ermenred the elder died before his father, and left issue Domptena, who was married to a Mercian Prince; Ermenberg that died a vailed virgin, Ermengith a mention; Ethelred and Ethelbert, both murthered by their Cosin-german, King Egbert. His younger sonne was Ercombert that succeeded him in the Kingdome. This Edbald built a Chappell within the Monastery of Saint Peter and Paul at Canterbury, in honour of Mary the blessed Mother of God, endowing that Church with sufficient maintenance; wherein, after the continuance of twenty foure yeares raigne, hee was buried neere to King Ethelbert his Father, Anno 640.

ERcombert, the son of Edbald by Emme his Wife, succeeded his father in the Kingdome of Kent, in the yeare of grace 641. He was a vertuous, religious, and Christian King, for the Temples of the Heathen Idols he suppressed, and commanded the fast of Lent to bee observed. His Wife was Sexberg, the daughter of Anna, King of the East-Angles, by whom he had issue Egbert and Lothair, both Kings of Kent after him; Erminhild, Wife to Wolfere King of Mercia, and Erkengode a professed Nun in the Monastery of Saint Brigets in France, where she died, and was interred in the Church of Saint Stephen. In his dayes the state of the Church growing to a well setled forme of government, the Province of Kent was divided into Parishes by Honorius the Archbishop, as testifie the Records of Christs-Church in Canterbury. This King having raigned twenty foure yeares and odde moneths, died in the yeare of our Lord 664.

EGbert, the elder sonne of King Ercombert, in the nonage of his yong Nephewes, Ethelred and Ethelbert, (the sons of his Uncle Ermenred) obtained the Rule of Kent, and had not their murther much blemished his peaceable Government, hee might well have held place with the worthiest of those Kings: but thirsting after an absolute soveraignty, and fearing left his owne power should diminish by their growths and rightfull successions, he set his minde on that bloudy, traiterous, and unnaturall attempt; and with the assistance of one Thurne, found fit place and opportunity to worke that divellish designe, casting their bodies into a River, that so their murthers might not be knowne. But God (saith Malmesbury) that searcheth the heart, reveiled the act by casting up their bodies on the shore, to the open view of the next Inhabitants, who with great reverence there buried them, and built a small Chappell over their Monument, whose bones afterwards were removed, and new interred in the Abbey of Ramsey in Hantshire. The Lady Domptena their Sister, and next Heire to the Crowne, that was married to Merwald, a Prince of West-Mercia, and borne him foure children, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent: Wherein, saith Stowe, she became the first Abbesse her selfe, and Mildrith her daughter succeeded her therein, saith Capgrave. This King in great quietnesse raigned nine yeares, and died in the yeare of grace 673. in the moneth of July: leaving issue Edrik and Wigtred, both Kings of Kent, succeeding after Lothaire.

LOthaire the brother of Egbert, by strong hand obtained the government of Kent. For notwithstanding Egbert left issue Edrik and Wigtred, (as is said) yet Lothaire taking the advantage of their minorities, and the example of his brothers intrusions, made himselfe King against his, as he had done against the sonnes of Ermenbert, but did not enjoy the same with the like peace as he had done. For not onely Ethelred the Mercian warred strongly against him, but also Edrik, by the assistance of the South-Saxons continually sought to recover his right, whereby the peace of the Kentish was much molested: and lastly, in a bloudy battel was Lothaire shot thorow with a dart, whereof he died under his Chirurgians hand, the sixth day of February, in the yeare of Christ, 685. after he had raigned eleven yeares and seven moneths. The punishment of the Murther committed by his brother Egbert, was on him repaid, saith Malmsbury, who derided and made jests at the laments for young Ethelred and Ethelbert, that were by the people held and accounted Martyrs. His body was buried with his Predecessors, Kings of Kent, in the Monastery of Saint Peter and Paul in Canterbury, Anno 685.

EDrik, the sonne of King Egbert, having slaine his Uncle Lothaire in battell, succeeded him in the kingdome of Kent, wherein he sate onely two yeares, and those in continuall warres with his subjects; in which civill broiles lastly hee was slaine, leaving the Kentish kingdome so torne with dissentions, that it became a prey to many Usurpers, and gave occasion to Ceadwalla the West-Saxon, to seeke the annexion thereof to his owne kingdome, who with his brother Mollo entred Kent, and with fire and sword made waste where they came. To meet these, the Kentish assembled, and getting the advantage, burned Mollo to death: in whose revenge Ceadwalla persisted, and wasted the most part of the Province before hee departed: so that after for six yeares continuance, no King raigned in Kent, but the Countrey lay exposed to the tyrannies of oppressors.

He entred his Kingdome the yeare of mans Redemption 693. the eleventh of November, and two hundred and five yeares, after the death of Hengist the first Saxon. With him raigned one Swebharde, as Beda declareth: but without mention from whom, or upon what occasion, He founded the Priory of S. Martin at Dover, and behaved himselfe worthily both in War and Peace: his raigne was thirty yeares; thirty three, saith Beda; and death in Anno 725. leaving issue Edbert, Ethelbert, and Alrik, all three succeeding successively in the kingdome.

EDbert, the first sonne of Withred, succeeded his Father in his kingdome, vertues, and valours, whereby a peaceable government is allotted him by all writers of these affaires, for the continuance of twenty three yeares, without relation of any notable accident peculiar to himselfe and kingdome: besides the appearances of two fearefull Comets, in Anno 729. and fourth of his raigne; the one arising immediately before the Sun in the morning, and the other shewing his fiery beames presently upon the Sunnes set, both of them striking their gleames into the North, and by West, foreshewing (it may be) the scourge and desolation that the Pagans intended, who were at that instant entred into France and Spaine.

14. Alrik the last of lineall succession.

ALrik, the third sonne of King Withred, by the death of his brother Ethelbert, obtained the kingdome of Kent, the yeare of Christs incarnation 760. no other glory attending his affaires (saith Malmesbury) besides his unfortunate fight at Otteford against Offa King of the Mercians, wherein it seemed some honour (though with his overthrow) to withstand so puissant and impugnable an enemie. He is the last king of Kent, that held the Scepter in a lineall succession: the rest that followed, both got and enjoyed it by tyranny and Usurpation. This King is said to raigne thirty foure yeares, and to die in the yeare of grace, seven hundred ninety three.

15. An. Dom. 794.

EThelbert, surnamed Pren, usurped the Title and Authority over the Kentish Dominions, when that Province was sore oppressed with the invasion of the Mercian Kenulfe, whose warres against Kent, by succession from Offa, were continued with such rigour and valour, that the Countrey lay desolate where hee had been, and the people distressed whither he came. This Pren, Kenulfe tooke prisoner, and led away with him into Mercia: but at the dedication of a Church that he had then founded at Winchcomb, in presence of ten Dukes and thirteen Bishops, he released him at the High Altar, without either intreatie or ransome of redemption. The King returning againe into Kent, could not there be received; his place either being supplied by another, or himselfe so disliked, as not worthy any longer to raigne: and having had experience of the worlds mutabilities, is left againe to his private fortunes, from whence he had stepped, having held his estate but for three yeares continuance.

His imprisonment.

His releasement

CVthred, saith Malmesbury, was made King of Kent by Kenulfe King of Mercia, when hee had overcome and captivated Ethelbert: notwithstanding hee is accounted for an Usurper, and bare the Title of King, the tearme of eight yeares, without any other act worthy of remembrance, inheriting his predecessors evill hap and calamity, through factions and civill discords.

An. Dom. 797.

BAldred, after the death of this Cuthred, tooke upon him the Princely dignity of Kent, about the yeare of Christs Nativity 805. But now the heavenly providence determining to bring againe together that which the Saxons had divided, raised from exile little Egbert, to make him the great Monarch of the English-men. His first wars were against Bernulfe King of Mercia, and his second against this Baldred, King of Kent, whom in battell he vanquished, and forced him out of his kingdome, after he had fate on that Princely Throne, the space of eighteene yeares. This Baldred is said to have fled over Thames, and to leave Kent to the will of his Conquerour, whither againe he never returned, neither yet was heard of after his overthrow. This Kingdome then that was erected by Hengist, the yeare of mans happinesse 455. continued her government 372. and ended her glory in the yeare 827. being made a Province unto the West-Saxons.

THE CIRCVIT AND CONTINVANCE, THEIR KINGS, SVCCESSIONS, ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

Chapter VI.

THis Kingdome of the South Saxons, though it began with the first, in the second yeere after the entrance of Hengist: and that Ella their first King, was the second Monarch that swayed the Scepter of the Saxons Monarchy in Great Britaine: yet after Ella his death, it was the most obscure of all the rest, had the fewest Kings, and the shortest time of their kingdomes continuance: Insomuch as William Monke of Malmsbury, hath not ranked their kings among the other Saxons, nor any other writer recorded above three kings, without further succession or other collaterals: and the two last that governed, are rather called Captaines then kings. As therefore wee find them recorded by Florentius Monke of Worcester, we have inserted their successions here as thou seest, & will relate their Acts from others in this following Discourse.

The Genealogies and Issues of the South-Saxons.

The limits of this Kingdome.

An. Dom. 488.

THe Kingdome of the South-Saxons, containing the countries of Sussex and Surrey, had on the East side Kent, on the South, the Sea and Ile of wight; upon the West Hant-shiere, and the North side inverged with the river Thames: This Kingdome was erected by Ella a Saxon Captaine, that in the second yeere of Hengists entrance, as some say, brought a supply of his Saxons into Britaine, with whom came his three sonnes, Kymen, Plenching, and Cissa: these landing at a place (which from Kymen was afterwards) called Kymenshore, discomfited the Inhabitants, that made resistance, and Ella himselfe King of those Southerne parts. But doubtlesse there are many opinions of this mans first entrance and new erected estate: for some (as Sir Henry Savile in his Table) set it in the second yeare of Hengists first arrivall, Anñ 452. Others in the second of Aurelius, and no lesse then thirty yeare after that, Anno 482. Harrison will have it forty three yeares after the Saxons first entrance, and fourth yeare after King Hengist his death, Anno 492. And M. Ferrers in his Succession of the English Monarchs, placeth it in the three and twentieth yeare of King Hengists Kingdome, and in the fifth after his owne arrivall, the yeare of our Redemption 488. Of such uncertainty is the beginning of this South-Saxons, Kingdome whose continuance and Successions are nothing clearer; insomuch that Malmesbury making severall chapters upon the other six, omitteth onely this of the South-Saxons: and therefore as we finde them, let us have leave to relate them, and for the present to leave Ella as he was King, till wee come to a fit place where more shall be spoken of him as he was Monarch; whose raigne is set by Stow to be 36 yeares; by Sir Henry Savile, 24. and by M. Henry Ferrers, 32. and to have died in the yeare 514.

Cissa the third and youngest sonne of King Ella, then onely living at his fathers death, succeeded him in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, (leaving the Monarchy to Cherdicke king of the West-Saxons, who had planted his kingdome between him and the Britaines, having taken the charge of warre against them; for maintainance whereof, Cissa yeelded him a yeerely contribution) and living himself in long rest and peace, founded Chichester and Chisbury, the one a City

Citie for resort of his people, the other a place of repose for himselfe; which last he fortified about with a strong Trench, for a further defence against all dangers. Of any other his actions, little is recorded by Writers: onely in this they concurre, that he was a man of great age and small acts; some affirming that he raigned the space of seventy six yeares.

Sigor. Ciffa's Reigne. 3 Anno Dom. 5. 5.

EDilwach (by some called Ethelwof and Athelwold) succeeded King Ciffa in the kingdome of the South Saxons, & was the first Christian of that Nation converted by Bishop Wilfride, as some conceive out of Beda: yet Beda saith expreslly, that the king was baptized before Wilfrids comming. And the History of S. Swithune saith, it was done by S. Berinus, Bishop of Dorchester, who usually preaching the Gospel in the Kingdome of the Mercians, in the Citie of Oxenford, and presence of Wulpherus King of Mercia, it hapened that King Athelwold, then a Pagan, was present, who by the endeavour of Wulpherus, and instruction of Berinus, received the laver of baptisme: whom also Wulpherus received at the Font for his God-son, and in a signe of that adoption gave unto him two Provinces to be annexed to his former kingdome, that is to say, the Ile of Wight, and the Province of Manures in the West of England: at which time also Berinus by King Athelwolds permission, baptized the chiefe Dukes, and Nobles of that province. His Queene Ebba was baptized in her own Ile, the Province of the Vicians, being the daughter of Eanfride, who was brother to Eanheres, and both of them Christians. But it is generally held, that King Edelwach gave unto Wilfride the Peninsula (as the Latines speake) of Seolesse, now Selsee in the West, with the demaines of eighty seven Tenements, wherein he built the Monasterie, that bare the same name, and was his owne Episcopall Sea. Against this Edelwach, Ceadwald a valiant young Prince, of the blood royall of the West-Saxons, being banished his Countrey, making head with the assistance of friends and followers, entred his Territories with an impetuous incursion, and slew the King as he made resistance, when he had raigned twenty five yeares: in whose raigne and country raged such an extreame famine, that both men and women in great flockes and companies cast themselves from the Rockes into the Sea.

(4) Berthun and Authun, two Dukes of the South-Saxons, maintained the Warres and defence of their Countrey against Ceadwald, & by manly vallour forced him to retire. These Captains betwixt them held the dominion of that Province, untill such time as Ceadwald had gotten the kingdome of the West-Saxons; who bearing in minde the remembrance of his former proceedings, and thinking to inlarge his owne kingdome with the subjection of the South-Saxons, entred against the Province, and in battell slew Duke Berthun, harrying the Countrey miserably before him, Which State, unable to withstand the West-Saxons puissance, was by Ine, the next king succeeding made a subject Province, their governement thence forward resting under his successors, after it had stood one hundred and thirteen yeares: and ended in the yeare of Christ 601. by ordinary computation. But whosoever shall compare the names of the foresaid Kings, Wulpherus and Athelwold together, will easily finde, that it is not easie to finde the certain concurrence of times, in affairs so clouded in obscurity, and so farre remote from our present times.

THE KINGDOME OF THE WEST-SAXONS, THE CIRCVIT THEREOF, AND SVCCESSION OF THEIR KINGS VNTO EGBERT, WITH THEIR ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

Chapter. VII.

THe West-Saxons kingdome, containing the West of the Iland, unto the Lizards point, and lands end in Cornwall, was first erected by Cherdik a valiant Captaine, that led his Saxons in the conquest of that Province: and ever bare as hard a hand over the over-borne Britaines, as did any of those intruders, that had seated themselves in other mens rights. Three of whose Kings so carryed themselves among the other Saxons, as they by amitie, or awe, love, or constraint, won, and wore the Emperiall Crowne of the whole; till by the death of the one brother, and youth of the other, Kent againe got it, and others from them, till Egbert the seventeenth King of this kingdome joyned all into one. The stem of the whole, from Cherdik to Egbert, is here branched, whose sap of growth from them in many of our English honorable families, hath fairely budded even unto this day: and I pray may so bud for ever; that the land may be blessed in our Kings the sonnes of these Nobles, and happy in our Princes, that eate for strength and not for appetite, Eccles. 10. 17. Many of these West-Saxons first converts, may be living examples to their following posterities, in shewing their faiths by their works, and in building of Oratories for Gods divine service, as King Ine did Glastenbury, King Kenwulfe Saint Andrewes in Welles, and King Eadwallo in an holy zeale laid by his robes, and tooke the habit of a Monke in Rome. The Queenes likewise of this kingdome, in the like devoted zeale sought to forward the state of Christianitie: for to that end did Queene Seburg build the Nunry of Sheppey, and vailed herselfe a Nun therein; Queene Etheldurg laid by her royall robes, and tooke the vaile and charge of Abbesse of Barking. And Queene Cuthburg too zealous that way, forsooke the bed of her King and husband, to live more chaste, as then was taught; but contrary to the command of the Apostle, who forbade to defraud the durie of marriage, 1 Cor. 7. 3. and commendeth that bed to be honourable and undefiled, Heb. 13. 4. The descent of the West Saxons vnto Egbert the sole Monarck

The West Saxons the first that brought the Heptarchy to a Monarchy.

THe Kingdome of the West-Saxons, though in time later then the two former; yet in circuit and fame surmounted them both; whose Monarch was the Maull that first brake the Scepter of the other fixe Kingdomes in sunder, and made one Crowne of these their severall Diademes, more glorious then they all, and that first worne upon Egbert the West-Saxons head, and the Scepter swayed in his Imperiall hand; untill whose time and person we will continue the succession of their Kings, beginning with Cherdike that first made it a Kingdome, and briefely shew their acts whilest it so stood in the Saxons Heptarchy.

Florent. Wigor.

1. An. Dom. 495. The time when Cherdike entred into Britaine.

THis Cherdike is faid to have brought a fecond fupply of Saxons forces into Britaine, in the yeere of our Lord 495. and fifth of King Ella, and feventh of the Monarchy of great Hengift, his landing being at a place on that occafion called Cherdike-fhore, who with his fonne Kenrike, was encountred by the Britaines, under the conduct of Natanleod a Britifh Prince, (whofe Countrey was then called, after his name) whom he flew in Battell, with five thoufand of his Britaines: the fortune of which field gave refolutions and hopes of better fucceffe: it was fought neere unto a Brooke upon that event called Cherdikes-ford, now by contraction Chard-ford. Hereupon eftablifhing his new erected Kingdome, (which contained Cornewall, Devonfhire, Dorfetfhire, Somerfetfhire, Wiltfhire, Hantfhire, and Barkfhire,) he inlarged the fame with the conqueft of the Ile of Wight, the government whereof was by him given to Stuffe and Withgar his Nephewes; which latter flew the Britaines there inhabiting, and named the place of his victory Withgarbirg, affuming the name of King, and was buried at his City Withgar, in the fame Ile. About feven yeeres after Cherdikes entrance, Porth a Saxon with his two Sonnes, Megla and Beda, landed in the Weft, at the place from him called Portfmouth, whofe ayde with Kent and Suffex, affifted Cherdike in his Conqueffs. His raigne is fet to be thirty three yeeres, and his death in the yeere of grace five hundred thirty five, having had two fonnes, Kenrike and Chelwolfe, the one of which dyed before his Father; and the other fucceeded him in his Kingdome. Chelwolfe had iffue Cuthgils, whofe fonne was Kenfridd, and his fonne Kenfye, the Father of King Kentwin, who was the Succeffor of King Kenwalke, and predeceffor of King Kentwin, in the Kingdome of the West-Saxons.

KEnrike, the eldeft Sonne of King Cherdike, having formerly made proofe of his prowefle in the affiftance of his Father, was after his death alfo very fortunate in obtaining two victories over the Britaines; the one at Searesberige, and the other at Beranbrig: whofe raigne beginning Anno 534. continued twenty fixe yeeres; ending in the yeere of our Redemption, five hundred fixty. He had iffue three Sonnes, of which Cheaulin the eldeft fucceeded him in his Kingdome; Cuthwolfe the fecond affifted his Brother in his Warres, and was partaker with him of his victories, who dyed Anno 672. leaving iffue one onely Sonne, named Chell, or Cearlike, who prooved nothing fo vertuous and dutifull a fubject as his father had beene: for hee rofe in rebellion againft his Vncle, and by ftrong hand expelled him his Kingdome. The third Sonne of King Kenrike was Cuth, famous in his iffue, though mentionleffe for action in himfelfe: for he had three fonnes, of which Chelwolfe the eldeft, was King of the West-Saxons, (as fhall be declared) Chell the fecond, was father to Kingils the fixt (and firft Chriftian King of the West-Saxons, and Grandfather to Kenwall and Kenwin,) the feventh and ninth Kings of that Kingdome, and Ched the youngeft, was father of Kenbert, Grandfather to Chedwall the moft renowned King of the West-Saxons, of whom we are prefently to fpeake, and of them all in the fucceffion of the Engliffh Saxons Monarchs: and now to returne againe to the iffue of King Kenrike.

Other Victories he obtained over the Britaines, both at Bedford, Durham, Glocefter, Cirencefter, and Bathanceffer. But the fortunes of warres being alwayes variable, at length his fucceffe altered, and at Wannes ditch in Wiltfhire hee was overthrowne, and difpoffeffed of his Kingdome by Cealrik his brother Cuthwolfes fonne, when hee had raigned thirty three yeeres. He had iffue, Cuth and Cuthwin: the former ferved valiantly in the Warres under his Father at Wimbledon in Surrey, where King Ethelbert of Kent was chafed, and his Souldiers flaine: and with the like valour and victory hee fought at Fethanleygh againft the Britaines, notwithftanding that therein hee loft his life, the yeere of our Lord 585. and the five and twentieth of his fathers raigne. Cuthwin his younger brother furvived his father, but fucceeded not in his Kingdome, being then (by reafon of his young yeeres) unable to recover his right. He had two fons, Kenbald and Cuth; the latter of which was father to Chelmald, whofe fonne Kenred had iffue, Ine the eleventh King of the West-Saxons, and Ingils his brother, whofe fonne was Eoppa the father of Eafa, whofe fon was Alkemmud, the father of Egbert the eighteenth King of the West-Saxons, who reduced the Saxons divided Heptarchy into an abfolute Monarchy.

But hee wading thorow thefe troubles, harried the Province of the South-Saxons with invafions and calamities, in the Profecution whereof he dyed, leaving the purfuit of his warres and poffeffions of his Kingdome to Kingils his Nephew, that immediately fucceeded him, after he had raigned the fpace of fourteene yeeres.

John Stowe. Annal.

7 An. Dom. 643. Beda hist. Angl. lib.3. cap.7. Kenwald reflecteth the Christian faith.

KEnwald, whom Beda calleth Senwalch, succeeded his Father Kingils in the Kingdome of the West-Saxons. His beginnings by Matthew Westminster are compared to be with the worst, and his endings with the best of those Kings. At his first entrance he fought with victory against the Britaines at Penmum, whereof he became most insolent, and refused not onely to receive the Christian Faith, but also put from him his lawfull wife Sexburg, the sister of Penda King of Mercia, whereby hee became hatefull to his owne Subjects, and sore assaulted by the Mercian King, who followed the revenge so farre, that he forced Kenwald out of his Kingdome, who being driven to extremity sought succour at the mercy of Anna the Christian King of the East Angles, where he was both curteously entertained, and at last (wonne to the Christian Faith) was baptized by Bishop Felix, whereupon he did recall his wife, according to prescript of Christianity, and recovered againe his former Majesty, which he much advanced by his pious workes. He founded the Cathedrall of Winchester, and the Abby of Malmesbury, and when he had raigned thirty one yeeres, gave place unto nature in the yeere 673. leaving no issue of his body to succeed him: whereupon Segburg his wife tooke upon her the government of the West-Saxons, the same yeere that Lothair was made King of Kent, thee being a woman of great spirit and understanding, & sufficiently worthy to have managed the Kingdome, had she not beene prevented by death or rather (as some write) by a religious devotion, that the affaires of this present life might not hinder her zealous meditations of the future: in desire whereof she abandoned her Regency, and built a house of devotion in the Ile of Shepey, wherein herselfe became a Vowesse, and afterward was elected the Abbesse of Elie.

He dyed without issue.

ESkwin after the departure of Queene Segburg, succeeded in the Kingdome of the West-Saxons. He was the sonne of Kenfy, the son of Kenfrid, the son of Cuthgils, the sonne of Chelwolfe, the sonne of Cherdike, the first King of that Province: his raigne lasted but two yeeres, in which time he fought a great Battle with Wulfere King of the Mercians, at the place then called Bidanheasford, and wherein many of the Saxons on both sides perished, leaving neither issue to succeed him, nor other matters to be spoken of him, though (as it seemeth) hee had dispossessed Kenwin, who had more right to the Crowne then himselfe; or (as Beda and Malmesbury averre) hee raigned with him the space of two yeeres, and Kenwin alone for seven yeeres more.

9 An. Dom. 677. Kenwin when he began to raigne. A great scourge to the over-borne Britains.

KEnwin the brother of Kenwald, and sonne to King Kingils, in the yeere 677. became the ninth King of the West-Saxons, and raigned the space of nine yeeres. He was a great scourge unto the weake and over-borne Britaines, making Conquests of their possessions, and forcing them even to the Sea-shoare, being a people allotted unto misery, and by these strangers pursued so vehemently, that lastly they were driven into the Welsh-Angle of this Iland, and their lives defended and maintained among those waste Mountaines and hard Rockes, which therein were more propitious and gentle then the stony hearts of their Oppressors.

10 An. Dom. 686. Beda hist. Eccle. Angl. l.4. c.15.

CEadwalla a valiant young man, and of the blood-Royall of the Geniffes, faith Beda, being banished from his Country through the envy of others, who maligned him onely for his vertues and worthinesse, succeeded Kenwin his kinsman in the kingdome of the West-Saxons, and with greater glory raigned then any other in that Province before him had done. Hee was the sonne of Kenbert, whose father was Ched, the second Sonne of Cuth; and Cuth was the third Sonne of Kenrike, who was the eldest Son of Cherdike, that laid the first stone of this Kingdomes foundation. His first brunt of fury was against Edilwach, King of the South-Saxons, whom in field he slew: and in another battell Berthun, that had made himselfe King of that State. The Ile of Wight also he almost quite wasted: and though hee were unbaptized, yet did hee bind himselfe by vow to give the fourth part of the spoile unto Gods use, and performed it accordingly unto Bishop Wilfrid, who with Bernewine and Hildila converted the people from their Idolatrous superstition, unto the true service of Christ, it being the last part of the Saxons possessions that was turned from their Pagan manners. Of which his specious devotion, Malmesbury giveth this censure: Although we praise his affection, (saith he) yet allow we not the example; for it his written, that who so offereth unto God the goods of the poore, doth as it were sacrifice the sonne in the sight of the Father. Kent also with grievous warres he twice afflicted, and therein spilt so much Christian blood, that nature her selfe was therein offended, and he at last as much lamented: in repentance whereof, after hee had raigned in great flourneste the space of two yeeres, in a zealous devotion went to Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized upon Easter Even (saith Beda, the yeere of our Redemption 689.) by the name of Peter, and wearing as yet the white Robes of innocency, put (as the rite then was) upon him at his laver of Baptisme, fell sicke, and the twentieth day of April following dyed, having had neither wife nor child that we reade of. He was buried in Saint Peters Church in Rome, under a faire Monument, with this inscription thereon ingraven: Heere Ceadwall, otherwise named Peter, King of the West-Saxons, is buried, who dyed the twentieth of April, in the second Indiction, and lived thirty yeeres or thereabouts, when that noble and mighty Prince Iustinian was Emperour of Rome, and had raigned foure yeeres in the Empire; and Sergius a true patterne of the Apostles, had sate two yeeres in Peters Seat. What hath beene written of this Ceadwall, King of the West-Saxons, by Beda the Saxon and his followers hath beene attributed to Cadwalader King of the Britaines, by Geffrey of Monmouth the Britaine, John Castor and More, affirming him to be the same man, and that upon the admonition of an Angel hee went to Rome, tooke pennance of Pope Sergius, there dyed in the twelfe Kalends of May, and was there buried with the same Epitaph, and after the same manner. But the Writer of the History of Cambria, of Cadwaladers going to Rome, and the other appendances, seemeth to be doubtfull, and faith that it differed from the assertion of Bernardus Guidonius, the neerenesse of the names being the very cause of the like relations, and confidently affirmeth that it was Edwall the sonne of Cadwalader, who in such devotion went to Rome, and there made such a religious end, about the yeere of our Lord 720.

his owne raigne (as Mathew of Westminster hath observed) he fought with the Britaines under their Captaine Gerent, whom he victoriously subdued: and in his twentie sixth yere, against Cheolred King of Mercia, with doubtfull victory, at the place then called Wodensbury: and in his thirtie sixth, invaded the South Saxons with such successe, that he reduced the same Kingdome into a Province, and annexed it in subjection to the West-Saxons: and manifesting his good desires both to the administration of Iustice, and the advancement of Divine Piety, he ordained many good lawes for the amendment of manners in his people, which are yet extant written in the Saxon Tongue, and translated into Latine by the learned M. Williams Lambert.

He built at Wels a Colledge dedicated unto God, and bearing the name of S. Andrewes: which afterwards Kenulph, King of the West-Saxons made an Episcopall Sea. The renowned Abbey of Glastenbury most stately he built to the honour of Christ, Peter, and Paul, (whereof Malmesbury maketh mention in his booke of Glastenbury Antiquities) in a fenny place sequestred from the road way, where formerly had stood the old Cell of Ioseph of Arimathea, and that being decayed Dene Bishop of S. Davids had thereon erected a new; which time also having ruinated, twelve men well affected in the North parts of Britaine had repaired, but now by this Ina, was quite pulled downe, and after a most sumptuous manner new built; the Chapell whereof he garnished with gold and silver, and gave rich ornaments thereto; as Altar, Chalice, Censer, Candlesticks, Basons and Holy Water, Bucket, Images, and Pale for the Altar, of an incredible value: for the gold thereupon bestowed, amounted to three hundred thirtie three pound waight, and the silver to two thousand eight hundred thirtie five pound, beside precious Gemmes, embroched in the Celebrating Vestures. He instituted also a certaine yeerely payment to the See of Rome, enjoyning every one of his subjects that possessed in his house of one kinde of goods to the value of twentie pence, that he should pay a penny to the Pope yeerely upon Lammas Day: which at first was contributed under the name of The Kings Almes, but afterwards was called and challenged by the name of Peter-pence. At length, by the instigation and earnest perswasion of Ethelburga his Queene, hee renounced the glistering glory of his present and princely estate, wherein he had in great prosperitie raigned thirtie seven yeeres and odde moneths; and professing a voluntary poverty, (so great was the zeale, and so little the knowledge of that age) went to Rome, where in the habit of a Religious Man he ended his life in poore estate; and Ethelburga his wife became a vailed Nunne, and was made Abbesse of Barking neere London, wherein she ended her life. The brethren of this Ina, were Kenten, whose sonne was Aldelme Abbot of Malmesbury and Bishop of Sherborne, and Ingils that was the progenitor of Egbert the first Saxon Monarch of the whole Iland: and his sisters were S. Quenburg and Cuthburga, married into Northumberland, sued a divorce against Ofrich her King and husband, and in the habit of a Nunne ended her daies at Winburne in the Countie of Dorset.

Ethelard the kinsman of king Ina (whom he ordained his successour at his departure to Rome) was the sonne of Oswald, and he of Ethelhald the sonne of Kenhald, the brother of Cuth, and both of them the sonnes of Cuthwin, the sonne of Cheulin, the sonne of Kings Kenrik, the sonne of Cherdik, the first West-Saxon King. He began his raigne the same yeere that King Edbert did his over the Kingdome of Kent, and with him was terrified by the dreadfull appearance of two Blazing Starres: of whose Acts, no other mention is recorded, saving that at his entrance into regall estate, Oswald a Norman of the West-Saxons blood, emulated his glory, and troubled the quiet peace of his prosperous beginning: but not able to winne fortune to favour his proceedings, he quite abandoned his native Countrey, and so left Ethelard to rule the Kingdome in peace, who therin quietly raigned the space of fourteene yeeres, without any mention of wife or issue.

CVthred, brother to king Ethelard, succeeded him in his Dominions, and was much disquieted by Edilbald King of Mercia, both by open war and privy practises: but these two Kings comming to a conclusion of peace, joyned both their Powers against the over-borne Britains, and in a bloody battell gave them a great overthrow. In this time, saith Beda, the bodies of the dead were permitted to be buried within the walles of their Cities, which thing before was not lawfull, but their corps were interred without in the Fields; many of whose Tombes as yet are witnesses to us, that daily find them in digging of the grounds adjoining, & reserve thē for fight, or other necessary use.

The peace of this King was molested by his owne subject, an Earle named Adelme, who boldly encountred his Soveraigne in Battell, and fought it out even to the point of victory; but failing thereof, and forced to flie, his life was pardoned. And he made Generall against the Mercian Edilbald, Cuthreds ancient foe; wherein by his valiant prowesse, with the flight and discomfiture of the Enemy, hee made a worthy amends for guerdon of his life, and was ever after held in great favour and honour. This King raigned in great fame and victories the space of fourteene yeers, and died in the yeere of our Lords Passion 753. Hee had issue one onely son, whose name was Kenrik, a valiant young Prince, who in the ninth yeere of his Fathers raigne was feditiously slaine in his Army, for bearing himselfe (as it may seeme) over-rigorous towards the Souldiers.

SIgebert obtaining the Principalitie of the West-Saxons, raigned therein no long time, and that without all honour or fame. His parentage is obscure and unknowne, but his vices are made apparant and manifest; for he wallowing in all sensuall pleasures, added exactions and cruelties upon his subjects, setting aside all lawes and rules of true pietie: of which vicious life, when he was lovingly admonished by his most faithfull Counsellor a worthy Earle called Cumbra, so farre was his minde from abandoning his impious courses, as that he caused this Noble Personage to be cruelly slaine; whereupon the rest of the Peeres seeing their State and Lives were every day in danger, and the common subjects, whose Lawes were thus violated, being incensed into fury, they rebellionsly rose up in Armes against him, and would acknowledge him no longer their Soveraigne. Sigebert, by nature as fearefull, as he was audacious unto vice, fled into the woods as his only safeguard, where like a forlorne person he wandred in the day, and in caves and dens lodged in the night, till lastly he was met with by a Swine-herd that was servant to Cumbra, and of him knowne to be Sigebert, was presently slaine in revenge of his masters death, in the wood that was then called Andreads Wald, when he had raigned not fully two yeeres.

KEnwulfe, sprung from the blood-Royall of the West-Saxons, after the death of wicked Sigebert was made King of that Province; and appeasing some tumults that were stirred for Sigebert, obtained many victories against the over-mastred Britaines: but had not the like successe against offa King of the Mercians, who at Benfington gave him a great overthrow. He founded the Cathedrall Church of S. Andrewes at Wels, which afterwards was an Episcopall See, and in great honor raigned for the space of twentie foure yeeres; but then Fortune turning her face away from him, the rest of his raigne did not sure to that which was spent: for he giving himselfe to pleasure and security, banished Kineard, the brother of his Predecessor Sigebert; who dissembling his wrong, gave place unto time, and occasion being offered, made his use thereof. For Kenwulfe comming to Merton, to visit his Paramore, was there set upon and slaine; and his body conveied Brithric, lineally deſcended from Cherdik the firſt King of the Weſt-Saxons, a man of a ſoft and quiet diſpoſition, ſucceeded Kenwulfe in that Principalitie; in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation 784. He married Ethelburga, the daughter of great Offa the Mercian King, by whoſe power he expelled Egbert that ruled a Lordſhip in his Province under him, whoſe fame increaſing through his feates of wars, drave many jealouſies into King Brithrikes head, and the more by the inſtigation of Ethelburga his Queene, who bearing her ſelfe great, becauſe of her parentage, practiſed the downfall and deſtruction of them whom ſhe hated, and by her ſuggeſtions this Egbert was baniſhed on ſuſpition of conſpiracie. It afterward chanced, that ſhee preparing poiſon to make an end of one of the Kings Minions, wrought thereby (though unwittingly) the Kings death: for he by taſting the confection ended his life, after he had raigned the ſpace of ſixteene yeeres. Wherein, ſhe fearing the juſt revenge of his ſubjects, fled into France, and by Charles then King was ſo courteouſly entertained, as that for her great beautie there was offered her the choice of him or his ſonne. But ſhe in her youthfull and luſtfull humour, chooſing the ſonne, was debarred from both, and thruſt into a Monaſtery, in the habit (not the affection) of a Nunne: where not long after ſhee abuſed her body by committing of adultery, and was ſhortly expelled, and in beggerly miſery ended her life, as by many that ſo ſaw her, we have heard it reputed, ſaith Aſſerius mine Author. For this her moſt hainous crime, whereby was wrought the death of her Husband, the Weſt-Saxons ordained a Law, to the great prejudice of all their Queenes ſucceeding; That none of them ſhould have either title, majeſty or place of roialtie; which was ſeverely executed for many yeeres after.

In the daies of this Brithrike, many prodigies appeared, and more perhaps then will be beleeved. For it is reported, that in his third yeere a ſhowre of blood rained from heaven, and bloody croſſes fell upon mens garments as they walked abroad. And in his tenth yeere were ſeene fiery Dragons flying in the ayre. Which wonders, ſome tooke to be preſages of the miſeries following, both by the Invaſions of the Pagan Danes, that in theſe times were firſt ſeene to arrive in this Iland, and the extreme Famine that afterwards happened: howſoever, ſure it is that the Heptarchy now began to ſet, and the riſing Monarchy to appeare in the Weſt, by King Egbert, whoſe acts and iſſue ſhall be further rehearſed, when we ſhall come to the time of his ſucceſſion among the Engliſh Monarches.

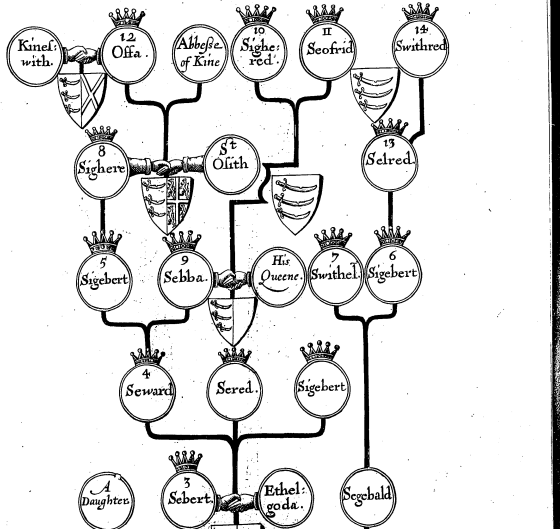
THE EAST-SAXONS KINGDOME,



THE CIRCUIT, SUCCESSIONS OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSUES, AND KINGDOMES CONTINUANCE.

Chapter VIII.

HIS kingdome of the East-Saxons, though one of the leaſt in circuit & power, yet in converſion from paganiſme, and imbracing Chriſtian Religion, were with the firſt: and out-went many others in their religious zeale. For Sebert King of this kingdome, aſſiſted by his uncle Ethelbert King of Kent (the firſt Chriſtian King of all the Saxons) for the honour and ſervice of God, built a Monaſtery in London, dedicating it unto his Apoſtle Saint Paul: And another at Weſtminſter, unto his other Apoſtle Saint Peter, both which had been the Idolatrous temples of the heathen Idoles, Diana and Appollo. And in the like pious zeale, many of his ſucceſſors laid the foundations of many Oratories unto Gods uſe, and became themſelves votaries therein. Such were King Sebba, who abandoning the vaine pleaſures of this life made himſelfe a Monke in the foreſaid Monaſtery. And King Sigherd his ſucceſſor, following him in the like devotion, took the rules of holy religion, and in the ſame Monaſtery likewiſe, in holy contemplations ſpent the reſt of his life. In the like devoted zeale Offa King of this Province, laid downe the Scepter of his kingdome, and as a Pilgrime travelled to Rome, where in ſteed of the Crown he put on the Cowle and entred a Monaſticall life, wherein he ſpent his time in holy meditations to the day of his death. Neither were theſe kings ſo zealous alone, but that their Queenes likewiſe abandoning the glory of this world, tooke upon them the mantles and veiles of holy votaries and were great inſtigators of others unto the like. For ſo did the Queene and wife of King Sebba (whoſe name I finde not recorded by any:) Oſith, the Queene and wife of King Seighere, even in the life-time of her husband, became Abbeſſe of Barking neere London, for which, (though contrary to the precept of the Apoſtle) ſhee obtained the name of a Saint. And Kineſwith the wife of King Offa, made her ſelfe a Nun in the Abbey of Kineſburgh, whereof her husbands ſiſter was Abbeſſe. The time of whoſe ignorances howſoever theſe brighter dayes doe condemne, yet by them we may learne to adde deeds unto knowledge, leſt knowing, and not doing, we be beaten with many ſtripes.

The site of this Kingdome.

THe site of the East-Saxons Kingdome, was the Countrey of Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hartfordshire, and the Circuit so farre as the Diocesse of London tow extendeth: It was bounded on the East with the Ocean; on the South with the Thames; on the West with the Colne; and on the North with the river Stowre. The kings thereof claime their descent from Prince Woden, not as all the rest of the Saxon kings, but onely by a collateral line; and Erchenwine became the first king, which nevertheless he held as Feodarie to the kings of Kent. For which cause, it seemeth that Malmsbury mentioneth him not in the Catalogue of those kings, but maketh his sonne Sledda the first, and tenth in descent from Woden.

2 Anno. Dn. 587. Sledda the second King. His mariage.

SLedda the sonne of Erchenwine, succeding in the East-Saxons kingdome, raigned peaceably without mention of any warres, for having married Ricula the daughter of Imerick king of Kent, was thereby the more favoured of them, and feared of others; and nothing left (besides his quiet raigne) to be recorded to posterities; neither are many yeeres of succession numbred, but as they are gathered from the Computations of other Princes, with whom they either lived, or were linked in action. This Sledda dyed about the yeare of our Redemption 596. and left issue by his wife Queene Ricula, Segebert, who succeeded him in the kingdome, and Segebald his brother, whose sonnes afterward were Kings of that Province.

Sebert converted to Christianity by Ethelbert.

SEbert the sonne of Sledda and of Queene Ricula, began his Raigne in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 596. and in the thirty sixth yeere of the raigne of King Ethelbert of Kent, his mothers brother, at that time Monarch of the English-men, who in Seberts chiefe City London, a Princely Mart Towne, (saith Beda) of many people arriving thither both by sea and land; new built a Church, making it the Cathedrall of Bishop Miletus, and so wrought with King Sebert, that hee converted him to Christianity; and assisted him in that Foundation, where formerly (say some) had stood the Temple of Diana. This Church these new Converts and Saxon Kings, either new reared or inlarged for the honour and service of God, and dedicated under the name of Saint Paul: which worke Ethelbert further confirmed with sufficient maintainance, as by this his Charter is seene, containing these words: Ethelbert Rex, Deo inspirante, pro anime sue remedio, dedit Episcopo Mileto terram que appellatur Tillingham, ad Monasterium sive Solatium sedentes S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Ethelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi Presuli Mileto potestatem ejus habendi & possidendi, ut in perpetuum in Monasterij utilitate permaneat, &c. And that this was the Temple of Diana, some have further confirmed unto us by the incredible number of Oxe-heads there digged up in the dayes of King Edward the First, when the East-end of that Church was enlarged; which were supposed to be of those Beasts that were there sacrificed to this Goddes Diana. These Kings likewise founded the Church of Saint Peter in the West of London, at a place called Thornye, where sometimes stood the Temple of Apollo, as Sulcardus affirmeth; which being overthrowne by an Earthquake, King Lucius new built for the celebration of Gods service; and that againe being decayed, those Kings restored it unto a greater beauty, where Sebert, after thirteene yeeres raigne; (as some write) with Æthelgoda his Queene were buried: whose bodies in the dayes of Richard the Second (saith Walsingham) were translated from the old Church to the new, and there interred. He had issue by the said Queene, Sered, Seward, and Sigebert, whose lives and deaths were as followeth, SEred, Seward, and Sigebert, the sons of King Sebert, raigned as it seemeth, together in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons; all three wicked irreligious men, and deadly enemies to the Christian Profession. These contumeliously presuming to the Lords Table, and holy Sacrament of his Body and Bloud, were prohibited by Bishop Miletus, because they were Idolaters and unbaptized: which repulse they tooke so offensively, that they expulsed Miletus, who thereupon fled into France. But their impiety was not long unrewarded; for fighting against Kingils, and Quincelinus his sonne, (Kings of the West-Saxons) were by them overcome: and in battle slaine about the yeere of Grace 623. as by the learned Sir Henry Savile is calculated, whose account for these times I altogether follow.

This Sigibert reduced against his Province unto the embracing of the Christian Faith, (being daily instigated thereunto by Oswye King of Northumberland, and received Baptisme himselfe at the hands of Bishop Finnan, at the place called The Wall) procured vertuous Cedda to be his assister for the plantation of the Gospell in his Kingdome. Hee was murdered by two of his Kinsmen, who, as Beda saith, were Brethren, no other cause mooving them, but his overmuch lenity and clemency. He raigned by the foresaid account, sixteene yeeres, leaving issue a young sonne named Selred, that succeeded Seofrid in that Kingdome.

SEbba, the Brother of Segebert the Little, and Sonne of Seward, (as we have said) succeeded as sole King in the Province of the East-Saxons, and with much equity and administration of Iustice raigned therein thirty yeeres: towards the end whereof, the better to prepare his mind for contemplation, he relinquished his Princely Robes, and put on the Habit of Religious Profession in the Monastery of Saint Pauls in London; as Radulphus de Diceto, with others affirme. Wherein this penitent King living a while in fasting and prayers, dyed the yeere of Christ 693. whose body was intombed in a Coffin of Gray Marble, the cover copped, and as yet standing in the North Wall of the Chancell of the same Church.

A miracle thereof Beda reporteth, needlesse either then to be wrought, or now of us repeated, were it not to point at the blindnesse wherein even good men were then led; and thus it is: They having prepared a Tombe-stone, to lay his body in, found it too short by the quantity of an hands bredth, and hewing it longer, yet would not serve; therefore they minding to bow up the knees, laid the body therein, and suddenly it lengthned of it selfe with more then was sufficient. But surely how soever this tombe was then set on this Monkish tenter, it is now since shrunke againe in the standing, and exceeds not in measure five foot in length. His wife (but unnamed) he likewise instigated to leave the momentany pleasures of princely State, for that which is permanent: which thing with much adoe hee lastly obtained, leaving her to follow him in his vertuous devotions, and his two sonnes to succeed him in his kingdome.

OFfa the Sonne of Sighere, and of Queene Oswith his Wife, a man noted for his comely feature and sweet countenance, succeeded King Seofrid in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of Grace 701. He both enlarged with buildings, and inriched with lands the goodly and beautifull Church of Westminster; but after hee had ruled eight yeeres, being mooved with a supposed religious devotion, he abandoned Kinswith his wife (the daughter of Penda the Mercian King) his lands, Kinne, and Countrey, and with Kenred King of Mercia, and Edwine Bishop of Worcester, went to Rome, where he was shorne a Monke, and in that habit dyed, leaving his Cosen Selred to succeed in his Kingdome. His wife Kinswith after his departure, (with the like penance) vowed her selfe availed Nunne in the Abbey of Kineburg, whereof his sister was Abbesse.

SElred, the sonne of Sigebert tho good, who was murthered for his overmuch clemency, attained to the Kingdome of the East-Saxons in the yeere of Grace 709. His raigne was long, though his acts are little spoken of, either that other worthier affaires filled the Pennes of those Story-writers, or that his time was so peaceable and unactively spent, that it ministered not matter whereof to indite. Hee raigned thirty eight yeeres, and dyed Anno seven hundred forty and sixe: without relation either of Wife or Childred.

Sebred, after the death of Selred, was made King of the East-Saxons, which title he retained, untill that Egbert King of the West-Saxons, taking Armes against him, expulsed him out of that Kingdome; as also the same yeere hee did Baldred, King of Kent, which was in the yeere of Christs Incarnation eight hundred twenty and seven, and made it a Province annexed unto the West-Saxons, after it had stood in state of a Kingdome, two hundred eighty and one yeeres.

Chapter IX.

THe ancient inhabitants (as Xiphilinus out of Dio reporteth) inhabiting on each side of the Wale, neere the Meate, who in their revolt against the Romans, called to their ayde the Caledonians; which forced Severus the Emperour himselfe unto Britaine. By Ptolomy they are called Ottadini, which Cambden thinketh might well be from Attatini, and that derived from the British word Vchtine, which signifieth above Tine, or on the other side of Tine, according to the site of the Country. And in the change of the name by the Saxons, the site of that Country was the cause, for it lying upon the North of the river Humber, they named Nortan-humber-londe, rightly contracted into North-humber-lande, and of three, one word is now made. What government they had, before the Romans obtained it, or what Governour under them, but such as all other parts of the Iland (besides their Prefects or Lieutenants) is uncertaine, yet certain it is, when the Saxons had got it, the Country was divided into two Provinces, and those called Deira, and Bernicia; which Ella and Ida two famous Captaines among them first possest, and changed the title thereof from a Dukedome unto a Kingdome, inlarging their coasts upon the South of Humber, and and their successors upon their fellow Kings; whose stem-like draught annexed, both in the marriages, issues, and collaterals, are therein branched as farre as any warrantable records affordeth. And as plenteous of Saints (if Nuns be Saints, and those sanctified that through blind zeale, leave their duties undischarged, to live idle without all imployments) as any other of those Kings that put off their Crownes, to weare a Monks Cowle. For so did two Kings of this Kingdome; foure Queenes, and five of their children, besides others that vowed their pilgrimages to Rome. And King Oswald so zealous, that himselfe was the interpreter of Bishop Aidans Sermons unto his people; and the people so desirous of Christianitie, as that above ten thousand men, besides women and children, were in one day baptized in the river Swale, by Paulinus the first Arch-Bishop of Yorke.

THis Kingdome of Northumberland consisted at first of two distinct Provinces: whereof the one was called Deira, and the other Bernicia; and were governed sometimes by their Kings severally, and sometimes under one, as successe of warre, or other casualties incident did afford. The royall descents of whose Kings are brought by Florentius both from the fourth and fifth sonnes of Prince Woden, after this manner. Ella, under whom the Kingdome of Deira began, was the sonne of Iffi, who was the sonne of Wuskfrea, the sonne of Wilgils, the sonne of Westurwalchna, the sonne of Seomel, the sonne of Swarta, the sonne of Sapugell, the sonne of Seabald, the sonne of Siggeat, the sonne of Swebdeg, the sonne of Siggar, the sonne of Weadeg, the fourth sonne of Woden. And the descent of Ida, the raiser of the Bernicians kingdome, is brought from Bealdeag the fifth sonne of Woden; for Bealdeag was father to Brand, whose sonnes were Beorn and Freodegar, the latter of which twaine was the progenitour of Cherdik the first West-Saxon King: and his brother Beorn begate another Beorn also, and hee Weghrand the father of Ingebrand, whose sonne was Aluſa, the father of Angengeal, and this mans sonne Ingengat, the father of Aethelbright, whose son Oeſa begate Eoppa the father of this Ida, the first King of Bernicia.

These Saxon Captaines Ella and Ida, about sixtie yeeres after the death of King Hengiſt, changed the title of this Province from a Dukedome to a Kingdome. For Hengiſt having given the possession of those North parts unto Octha his brother, and to Ebuſain his sonne, their Successors held it, with many hostile irruptions the space of 99. yeeres. But now the Britaines subjected, and no resistance made, those Captaines divide the Province into two parts, intituling either by the name of a Kingdome; the first Deira, was possessed by Ella, which stretched from Tyne, to the river Humber; and the second Bernicia, enjoyed by Ida, whose Continent lay betwixt the Tyne and the Frith of Edenborough. These together contained the Counties of Westmerland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Yorkeshire, Lancaster, and Durham: and was bounded on the West with the Irish Seas, on the North with the Wall of Severus, on the East with the German Ocean, and on the South with the rivers Mersey and Humber. Ida, saith Malmesbury, raigned fourteene yeeres: and Ella by Matthew of Westminſter, is said to succeed him for thirty yeeres. The issue of Ida legitimate, as Huntington recordeth, were Adda, Bealric, Thedrik, Ethelrik, Osmer, and Thedred; illegitimate, Oga, Ecca, Oſwald, Ailrik, Sogoe, and Sogother. These (saith Matthew of Weſtminſter) arrived at Flemiſburke with 40. Ships, and assisted their Father in many of his enterprises. The issue of Ella, by Florentius his record, were Acca, Wife of Ethelfrid, King of Bernicia, and mother to the most Christian Oſwald, Monarch of the Engliſhmen, and Edwine the Monarch and first Christian King of Northumberland. Ida is said to begin his raigne Anno 547. And Ella in the yeere 559. No other particulars ascribed unto either, besides the building of Bamburge Castle.

With Ella raigned the two sonnes of Ida, namely, Adda and Thedrik, with three others, Elappea, Theodwald, and Frethulfe, sprung from Eoppa the father of Ida, all five his substitutes over the Bernicians: but because there is no other mention of them besides their names and raignes, I will leave them as I finde them, and proceed to the more worthy of recitall.

daily molested, that he was forced to save his life by avoiding the Country, and tossed in exile from place to place, was lastly received and succoured by Redwald, King of the East-Angles, who in his quarrell forthwith assembled his forces, and meeting Ethelfrid in the field, slew him neere the River Idle, after he had raigned twenty three yeeres, in the yeere of Christ his incarnation 617. He had issue by his Wife Acca (the daughter of Ella) Eanfrith king of Bernicia, Oslafe, and Oswald King of Northumberland, Oslake, and Offa, with two daughters canonized for Saints, Oswith and Ebba the Nun; as also by his Concubine, Osfwy the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

Edwine thus raised by the helpe of King Redwald, returned to his Countrey, and was of the Inhabitants made King of Northumberland, and afterward Monarch of the Englishmen, as in their succession shall be declared. Beda (somewhat too much addicted to fabulous miracles) of him reporteth this story: That whilest hee lay banished in King Redwalds Court, Ethelfrid instigated his receiver, by promises to take away his life: or if he refused, threatned him warres: for feare whereof, Redwald, partly inclining to his wicked purpose, revealed the same to the Queene his wife; which a friend of Edwine hearing, told him of his danger, and wished him to flie. Edwine thus perplexed with troubled thoughts in the dead of the night, sate solitary under a tree in dumps, musing what was best to be done; to suspect and flie from Redwald, that had honoured him so much, he held it a wrong, and to thinke himselfe safe in other Provinces against so powerfull pursuers, he thought it was vaine. Thus distracted in casting what way might be safest, suddenly approached a man unto him, utterly unknowne, who after salutation, demanded the cause why hee sate at so unseasonable a time, in so uncouth a place, and pensive manner? Edwine thinking him to be his deaths-man, resolutely answered; it nothing concerned him at all, either to aske, or to know his estate. Oh Edwine (said he) thinke not but that I know thy sorrow, and the cause of thy sitting thus upon that stone; thy death is pretended, and even at hand: but what wouldest thou give to rid thee of that danger and to make King Redwald thy assured preserver? Any thing, quoth Edwine, which is in my power. But what shall be his reward (said the other) that shall see thee upon the throne of thy kingdome, and that with such glory, as none of thy Progenitors ever attained unto? I would bee thankfull to that man, said Edwine, in all things, and at all times, as reason required, and of right I ought. But tell me Edwine, said he, what if the same man shew thee a more safe way to preserve the life of thy soule, then either thou at this present knowest, or any of thy Parents ever heard of, will thou consent and imbrace his counsell? Yea, said Edwine, God forbid that I should not be ruled by him, that thus should free me from this present danger, set me upon the throne of a kingdome, and after these great favours, should also teach me the way to an eternall life. Upon this answer, laying his right hand on Edwines head, he said unto him; When these things shall in order come to passe, then call to minde this time, and what thou hast promised, and so vanished from his presence. The young Prince thus left betwixt hope and despaire, his friend that had forewarned him of his death: came hastily to him with a more cheerefull countenance, Come in Edwine (quoth he) and surcease thy cares, for the Queene hath not onely changed Redwalds mind to save thy life, but he also hath granted to maintaine thy right against Ethelfrid thine enemy. Which shortly he did, and slew him as we have said.

Edwine thus placed upon the Princely Throne, his first Wife Quenburg being dead in his exile, received in marriage Ethelburga, surnamed Tace, (a fit name for a woman) the daughter of King Ethelbert and sister to Eadbald King of Kent, a most chaste and vertuous Christian Lady, whose teacher was Paulinus, and both of them Gods instruments for the Conversion of the Northumbrians to the inbracement of Christian Religion. But because we shall have occasion to speake of this Edwine, as he was monarch of the Englishmen, we will reserve his Acts, Issues, and Raigne, to be further related in the course of his Succession. He was slaine in battell against Cadwall king of the Britaines and Penda king of the Mercians, when he had prosperously raigned seventeene yeares, the twelfth of October; Anno 633. and was buried in Saint Peters Church in Streanshall, after called whitby. the Faith, and was slaine of King Cedwall) raigned in Deira. This Osfwine was slaine of King Osfwye: after whose death, seizing all Northumberland, hee spread his terrour further into other parts, and was the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen, as in his succession we will further speake. His wife was Eanfled, daughter to Edwine King of Northumberland, by whom he had many Children. His raigne was 28. yeeres, and died the fifteenth day of February, in the yeere of grace 670. and of his age 58.

Egfrid, the eldest sonne of King Osfwy by Queene Eanfled, had beene Hostage in the kingdome of Mercia, and after his father was made King of Northumberland, in the yeere of Christ 671. He warred, but with great losse, against Ethelred King of Mercia, neere unto the River of Trent, wherein his younger brother Elfwyne was unfortunately slaine, to the great griefe of both the Kings, the one being his owne brother, and the other his brother in law by marriage: whereupon a peace and reconciliation was made. But Egfred being by nature of a disquiet disposition, invaded the Irish, and destroyed those harmelesse and silly people, which (as Beda saith) had beene great friends to the English. Their resistance consisted chiefly in curses and imprecations for revenge, which though they could not open heaven, yet (saith he) it is to be believed, that for their cause he was cut off the next yeere ensuing by the Picts or Red-shanks, against whom he prepared, contrary to the advice of his Councell, and by them was slaine among the strait and waste mountaines, 20. Maij, the yeere of mans felicity 685. and of his age fortie, after hee had raigned fifteene yeeres. His wife was Etheldred the daughter of Anna King of the East Angles: shee was both Widow and Virgin; first married to Tonbert a Noble man that ruled the Girvij, a people inhabiting the fenny Countries of Norfolke, Lincolne, Huntington, and Cambridge-shires; and after him also in virginitie continued twelve yeeres with her husband King Egfrid, contrary to his mind, and the Apostles precept, that forbiddeth such defrauding either in man or woman, except it be with consent for a time, and to the preparation of prayer; affirming else-where, that Marriage is honourable, and the bed thereof undefiled, wherein the woman doth redeeme her transgression, through faith, love, holinesse, and modesty, by bearing of children. This notwithstanding, she obtained licence to depart his Court, and got her to Coldingham Abbey, where shee was professed a Nunne under Ebba the daughter of King Ethelfrid. Then went shee to Ely, and new built a Monastery, whereof shee was made Abbesse, and wherein with great reverence shee was intombed: whose vertues and remembrance remained to posterities by the name of S. Audrie, she being canonized among the Catalogue of English Saints.

Numes, and other religious holy women: wherein when he had spent eleven yeeres more to his age, his kinsmen Kenred and Osrike conspired against him, and in battell by his slaughter made an end of his impious life. His wife was Cuthburga, the sister of Ines King of the West-Saxons, as by the time may be gathered, from the computation of Marianus, and the Annales of the English-Saxons, who upon a loathing wearinesse of wedlocke, sued out a divorce from her husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburne in Dorset-shire, where in a religious habit shee ended her life; and he by Kenrid and Osrike, leaving his Kingdome to them that wrought his death.

Kenred, the sonne of Cuthwyne, whose father was Ceolwald the sonne of Ingwald, and his mother Adelm the sonne of Oga, the naturall sonne of Ida, the first King of Deira, after the death of Osred raigned two yeeres; no other remembrance left of him, besides the murder of his Soveraigne Lord and King.

Osrick, after the death of Kenred, obtained the kingdome of Northumberland, and raigned therein the space of eleven yeeres, leaving to the world his name stained with blood in the murder of young Osred, no other mention of parentage, wife or issue of him remaining; for want whereof, he adopted Ceolnulph, brother to his predecessor Kenred, and died unlamented the yeere of Grace seven hundred twentie nine.

Ceolnulph, the brother of Kenred, after the death of King Osrik, was made king of the Northumbrians, which Province he governed with great peace and victory the space of eight yeeres: but then forsaking the Royall Estate and Robes of Majesty, put on the habit of a Monke in the Ile of Lindesferne or Holy Iland. These were these daies (saith Beda) wherein the acceptable time of peace and quietnesse was embraced among the Northumbrians, who now laid their armour aside, and applied themselves to the reading of holy Scriptures, more desirous to be professed in religious houses, then to exercise feates of warre, or of armes. For not onely Priests & Lay men vowed, and performed Pilgrimages to Rome, but Kings, Queenes, and Bishops also did the like: so great (so blind I might say) a devotion was in their hearts, and so holy a reverence held they of the place. Vnto this King Ceolnulph, the said Venerable Beda (a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul at Werimouth neere unto Durham) a great Clerke, and Writer of the English Hiftory, dedicated the same his Worke, which he continued till the yeere of Christ 731. and from the first entrance of the Saxons, containing 285. yeers, according to his owne account.

Egbert, the sonne of Eata, who was brother to King Kenred, succeeded his uncle Ceolnulph in the kingdome of Northumberland, and ruled the same with the like peace and piety, the time of twentie yeeres; and then following his example, also forsooke the world, and shore himselfe a Monke, as divers other Kings in those daies had done, whereof Simon Dunelmensis writeth, and noteth the number to be eight: as Inae King of the West Saxons, Ethelred and Kenred Kings of Mercia, Sigebert King of the East-Angles, Sebbi and Offa Kings of the East-Saxons, and Ceolnulph and this Egbert Kings of the Northumbrians. These forsaking the world (as they tooke it) left the Charge that God upon them had imposed, whose authoritie in earth they swayed, and wherein they might much more have advanced Gods glory and Christs Gospell, then for a more easie private & safe life, not warranted by his word, but rather disliked, and perhaps foreshewed by those heavenly creatures the Sunne and Moone, which in those daies were fearefully darkned, and for a time seemed to have loft their light: for Anno 733. 18. Calend. Septemb. the Sunne suffered so great an Eclipse, that the earth seemed to be over-shadowed as with sack-cloth. And Anno 756. 8. Calend. Decemb. the the Moone being in her full, appeared both darke and bloody, for a Starre (though there be none lower then the Moone) seemed to follow her, and to deprive her of light: but passing before her, shee againe recovered her former brightnesse. This King Egbert had a brother that bore the same name, and was installed Archbishop of Yorke, where he erected a beautifull Library (a worke well befitting a noble Prelate) and plentifully stored it with an infinite number of learned bookes. His sonne was Oswulph, that succeeded in the Kingdome.

Oswulph, when his father Egbert had put off the Robes of Majesty, and clad himselfe with a Monks Cowle, ascended the Throne of Northumberland, and sate therein only one yeere: for before hee had made attempt of any memorable act, he was traiterously murdered by his owne servants at Mikilwaigton, the ninth Kalends of August, leaving the Crowne undisposed of, untill the Nones of the same moneth in the next yeere.

Edilwald or Mollo was then made King of Northumberland, and with great valiance defended his Subjects. Some say, that at the end of fixe yeeres he resigned his government; yet others affirme his raigne to be eleven yeeres, and lastly that hee was slaine by Alured his Successour.

20. An. Dom. 765. Alured. Simeon Dunelm.

Alured, the murderer of his Lord and master, began his raigne over the kingdome of Northumberland, the yeere of Christs Incarnation seven hundred sixty five, and continued the same with such dislikes, that he lastly was expelled out of the Province by his owne subjects, and enforced to abandon the same. He was the sonne of Tanwin, the sonne of Bienhorn, the sonne of Basa, the sonne of Aibricke, the naturall sonne of Ida the first King of Bernicia: And the sonnes of this Alured were Osred, afterwards King of Northumberland, and Alhmud, slaine by the Danes, and canonized a Saint.

Ethelred, the sonne of Mollo, was advanced to the Regiment of Northumberland, and in the fifth yeere of his raigne, was driven out of the same by Edelbald and Herebert, two Dukes that warred against him; who having discomfited and slaine his Generall and souldiers in a fierce battell, so weakned the hopes of King Ethelred, that he fled his Countrey, and left the kingdome in a miserable estate, through the dissensions of those ambitious Princes.

22. An. Dom. 778. Alfwald.

Elfwald the brother of the foresaid King Alured aspiring to the Soveraignty of the Northumbrians, ruled the same in great Justice, to his worthy commendations: notwithstanding the wickednesse of his people was such, that without all guilt he was traiterously murthered by the conspiracy of Siga, 23. Septemb. the yeere of Christs incarnation, seven hundred eighty eight, after he had raigned eleven yeeres, and his body buried at Hexham. Ethelred the sonne of Mollo, revoked from exile wherein he had lived the space of twelve yeeres, was againe restored to the Crowne; but he minding the iniuries that his Lords had formerly done him, fought the revenge by their deaths, as also to establish his throne the surer, slew Alfus and Alfwin, the sons of Alfwald, as we have said, the right heires to the Crowne, and inticing Osred the former deposed King into his danger, commanded him to be put to death at Cunburge, the foureteenth of September, and yeere of Christ seven hundred ninety two. And to strengthen himselfe the more against all his opposites, the same yeere he married Lady Elfled, the second daughter to great Offa King of Mercia, forsaking his former Wife without any just cause given on her part.

Chapter X.

THe Mercian Kingdome contained more Countries, and circuit of ground, then any other of the Saxons Heptarchy. For it spred it selfe through the heart of the Iland, even from Humber in the North, neere unto the river Thamesis in the South: having no lesse then seventeen shires (as now they are devided) and six severall Estates, as Ptolomy hath seated them, under their command. The first Saxon King of this Kingdome was Crida, the eleventh in descent from Prince Oden: and the last in a lineall succession from him, was Ceol-wulfe, the fifteenth king of that Kingdome, besides five other collaterals, that by intrusion put on the Crown. Their issues were many, as in the stem annexed is to be seene, and therein their matches or marriages, their Armes or Atchievements, as the ancient have delivered, and the modern have received, are according insculped from the authority of both. Those Mercians as they were many, so were they strong, and by strong hand eight of their kings in a continued succession, got and kept the Empériall Crowne of the Heptarchy. For though those Kings raigned as Kings in their owne Territories; yet among them ever one was the supreme head of the rest, and was called King of Engleland, till Egbert the West-Saxon laid all into one. Neither were their kings more strong then they were pious, after they had been wet in the laver of Baptisme, themselves and children shewing their faiths by their works, in building of Churches, Monasteries and Hospitals; and some of them were so zealous in the doctrine then taught, as they laid away their robes, and tooke the tonsure or habite of Monkes. For so did two of their Kings, Ethelred and Kenred; the one cowled in Bradney, and the other in Rome: where likewise great Offa through the like zeale, made his kingdome tributary to the yearely paiment of Peter-pence unto the Pope. Two of their Queens, Ermenhold, and Ethelswith, vailed themselves Nunnes, the one in Ely, and the other in Padnah: and of their Princely issues, three were crowned with martyrdome, and nine more Canonized for Saints. But to detaine thee no longer, see if thou please, these Mercian Kings branched from first unto last.

Mercia.

The limits of it.

THis Kingdome of Mercia contained more Counties, & the skirts of that royall Tent were spread with a wider compasse then any of the rest in the Saxons Heptarchy: for in the middeft of the Iland this Kingdome was seated, and from the verge of Northumberland, touched some part of Middlesex, which was the possession of the East-Saxons: The North thereof was bounded with Humber and Mersey; the East was inclosed with the Germaa Ocean; the West extended to Severne and Dee; and the South part nerely touched the River of Thames; containing the Counties now known by these names, of Chesshire, Darby-shire, Nottingham, Stafford, and Shrop-shire, Northampton, Leicester, Lincolne, Huntington, and Rutland-shires; Warwicke, Worcester, Oxford, and Glocester-land-shires; Buckingham, Bedford and part of Hertford-shire. Ibires; Buckingham, Bedford and part of Hertford-shire.

This man, without more fame of his further acts, is said to have raigned the space of ten yeeres, and to have died Anno 594. His issue was Wibba that succeeded him in his Kingdome, and a daughter named Quenburg, matched in mariage with Edwin afterwards King of Northumberland, with whom she lived in the Court of King Redwald in the time of his troubles, and died before him in that his banishment. She bore him two sonnes, Osfrid and Edfride, as in succession of Edwins Monarchy shall bee shewed: notwithstanding Beda reporteth this Quenburge to be daughter of Ceorl, the third King of Mercia, and grand-childe to this first Crida.

4. An. Dom. 626. Penda. His raigne.

PEnda, the sonne of Wibba, beganne his raigne over the Mercians the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred twenty six, and continued the same the space of thirty yeeres. He was a man violent in action, and merciless in condition, cruell and unstatiate of bloud: he shooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the Saxon-Kings more then any other in that Heptarchy before him had done. Against Kingils and Quinchelme, Kings together of the West-Saxons, he joyned battell neere vnto the City Cirencheffer, where both the parties fought it out to the utmost, with the effusion of much Saxons bloud: but those comming to concord, he with Cadwallo King of the Britaines, slew in battell Edwine and Oswald, Kings of Northumberland; Sigebert, Egfrid, and Anna, Kings of the East-Angles; and forced Kenwald King of the West-Saxons, out of his Country, in quarell of his Sister. Of these his prosperities he became so proud, that he thought nothing impossible for his atchievement; and therefore threatning the destruction of the Northumbers, prepared his Army for that expedition. Oswy then raigning King of that Country, proffered great summes of mony, and most precious Iewels to purchase his peace: which being refused, and the battell joyned, more by the hand of God, then power of man, this Tyrant was slaine, and his whole Army discomfited. His Wife was Kinswith, and issue by her Peada, who after him was King: Vlfere and Ethelred, both Monarchs of the English, Merkithel, a man famous for his great holinesse; and Merwald that governed some part of Mercia, whose Wife was Edburga, the foundresse of Minster in Tanet, and daughter to Egbert King of Kent, by whom he had issue Mereffa, a man of noted devotion; Milburg, and Mildgith, both holy Virgins, and Mildrith also Abbesse of Tanet, all foure canonized for Saints. The daughters of King Penda were Kineburg, the Wife of Alkfrid, King of Northumberland, afterward a Votaresse in Kinesburg Abbey; and Kinswith, who married Offa King of the East-Angles, and became also a Nunne with her sister Kineburgh.

PEada, the sonne of King Penda, in the dayes of his father, and with his permission, had governed the middle part of Mercia, and after his death, by the gift of Oswy of Northumberland, all the South of that kingdome from the River Trent, upon composition to marry his daughter, and to imbrace Christianity; which thing this Peada performed, and was the first Christian King of the Mercians. His Baptisme received, to witnesse the first fruits of his profession, hee laid the foundation of a faire Church at Medeshamsted, now called Peterborow, but lived not to finish the same, for that he was slaine by the treason of Alkfled his wife in the celebration of Easter, (as Beda saith) having had no issue by her. But Robert de Swapham (an Author of good antiquity, who saw the stones of that foundation to be so huge, as that eight yoke of Oxen could hardly draw one of them) saith, that Peada was brought to his end by the practise of his Mother, and not of his wife, as in these his words is manifest: Peada (saith he) laid the foundation of a Monastery at Medeshamsted, in the Girvians or Fen-Country, which he could not finish, for that by the wicked practise of his Mother, hee was made away. Whereby this blot is taken from this Christian Lady, and brands the face of her that most deserveth it. This King raigning as substiture to king Oswy of Northumberland aforesaid, by some is not accounted for a Mercian king, his regiment resting under the command of another.

His peace was disquieted by Ina and his West-Saxons, who for seven yeeres continuance invaded his kingdome. His Wife was Werburge, saith Marianus, and Florentius the Monke, who ascribe to her a long life, and to die without Children. EThelbald, after the death of Chelred, was made king of the Mercians, and Monarch of the English, the yeare of Christs Incarnation seven hundred sixteene. He was a Prince given to peace, but withall a most lascivious Adulterer: insomuch that Boniface Archbishop of Mentz wrote his Epistle unto him in reprehension of the same; which tooke such effect, that in repentance of his foule facts, he founded the Monastery of Crowland, driving in mighty Piles of Oake into that moorish ground, whereon hee laid a great and goodly building of stone. He was the son of Alwy, the elder sonne of Eoppa, the second sonne of King Wibba, the brother of King Penda: and raigned forty two yeares, in the end whereof he was slaine in a battel fought against Cuthred King of the West-Saxons, by the treason of Bernred his Captaine, at Secondone, three miles from Tamworth, the yeere of Christ seven hundred fifty five, and was buried at Repton in Darby-shire, having had neither Wife nor Children.

Hee inlarged his dominion upon the Britaines, overcame the Kentish in battell, put to flight the Northumbrians, and vanquished the West-Saxons: the East-Angles also he seised upon, after he had murthered Ethelbert their King. He reigned 39 yeares, and died at Ofley, the 29 day of July, the yeare of our Lord seven hundred ninety foure, and was buried without the Towne of Bedford; in a Chappell now swallowed up by the River Ouse. He was the sonne of Thingfryd, the son of Eamulfe, whose father Osmund was the son of Eoppa, the brother of King Penda, and son of King Wibba, whose father was Crida, the first King of the Mercians. His wife was Quendred, and children many; of whom, and of them we will further speake when we come to the time of his Monarchy.

12. An. Dom. 796. Egfryde. Florent. Adam Mar.

EGfryde, the son of Great Offa, was by him made King at his returne from Rome, being the only joy of his parents, and heire apparent to the Saxons Monarchy; upon which he entred the day after his fathers death, and lived himselfe but an hundred and fourty dayes after, deceasing the seventeenth of December, in the yeere of our Lord God seven hundred ninety six, having had neither wife nor issue that wee reade of: and his body honourably interred in the Church of the Monastery of Saint Albanes, founded by Offa.

KEmwolfe, the cosen (afarre off) to King Egfrid deceased, and both of them remooved in bloud no lesse then six descents from Wibba the second Mercian King, was the sonne of Cuthbert, (as the Monke of Worcester derives him) the sonne of Bassa, the son of Kenrowe, the sonne of Kenwin, the sonne of Kenwalk, the son of Wibba aforesaid, and succeeded King Egfryd in his dominions. But of this Mercian Monarch more shall be written in the successions and time of that his government. Hee raigned two and twentie yeares, and deceased the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and nineteene, and his body interred in the Monastery of Winchcombe, in the County of Glocester, being of his owne foundation. His wife was Queene Elfryde, the daughter (as some suppose) of Offa, who had been betrothed to Ethelbert king of the East-Angles, slaine by her father; by whom he had issue, Kenelm, Quendred, and Burgemhild, of whom more followeth.

13. An. Dom. 796. Kemwolfe. His raigne. His wife. His issue.

KEnelm, the sonne of King Kemwolfe, a childe of seven yeres old, succeeded in the Kingdome of Mercia, but not in the Monarchy, as his fathers had done, Egbert the West-Saxon at that time being grown great in his fortunes. This young King Kenelm raigned only five moneths, and then by the ambitious desire of Quendrid his sister, who seeking the government by the shedding of his guiltlesse bloud, instigated one Ashbert his Instructer, by promises of great preferments and rich rewards, to make him away, who only stood (as she thought) in her way to the Crown. This wicked practise was forthwith as impiously performed: for having him forth under pretence of hunting, he slew the innocent King, whose vertuous inclination promised great hopes, and whose harmlesse yeeres had not attained to any worldly guile. His bodie hee secretly buried under a bush, and (if we will beleeve the Golden Legend; where his life is described) was thus found out: A white Dove (which belike had seene the deed done) and had got it ingrossed in a scrole of parchment, posted therewith to S. Peter in Rome, and upon the High Altar laid it to bee read, where in the Saxon characters thus it was found: In Clenc kon bað Kenelme Kinbapne liɛð unðep þhopne, qeaueð beneaueð cnar is, At Clenc in a Cow pasture Kenelme the Kings Childe lieth beheaded under a thorne. But most true it is, that an obscure sepulcher the body had at the first, and howsoever found out, was afterwards with great honour and ceremony translated to the Monastery of Winchcombe; which his father had founded. The murderesse Quendrid, for griefe and shame of so wicked an act, ended her life, without the attaining of her ambitious desire, and hath left her name indelebly stained with his innocent bloud.

LVdecan then was chosen King of the Mercians, whose bloud was not downe since their last losse, neither revenge forgotten against the East-Angles; and therefore the yeare following made strength (sufficient to their seeming) to meet these their enemies. But the State of Heptarchy now drawne to the period, and the Supporters thereof weakened by their owne divisions, the Iland declined to a present alteration, and gave place to a more absolute kinde of Monarchy, that in Egbert the West-Saxon was now begun; who aiding the East-Angles against the Mercians, Ludecan their King fought with no better successe then Bernulfe before him had done, whose raigne lasted not fully two yeares; nor his memoriall revived either in wife or issue.

18. An. Dom. 826. Withlafe. His raigne. Roger Higd. His issue. Johan. Brom.

VVithlafe, the son of Oswald, the sonne of Osher, of the Mercian blood-royall, intruding himselfe (as it seemeth) into the government of Mercia, was unexpectedly vanquished by Egbert the Monarch that had assumed from Bernulfe that Kingdome before: him hee made his Substitute and Tabutarie, who so continued to Egbert and his sonne the time of thirteene yeares, leaving no other relation of his acts. His issue was Wigmund, the husband of Lady Elfled, the daughter of Ceolwulfe King of Mercia, the Parents of Wyslaa the Martyr, and the Lady Edburg, maried to one Etheland, an Earle in the Province of Lincolne.

19. An. Dom. 839. Berthulfe.

BErthulfe upon the like composition of Tribute, and in the like rearmes of subjection to the West-Saxons soveraignty, held the kingdome of Mercia as a Substitute, and without any notable report of his Acts, so raigned the space of thirteene yeares. At this time the Sea-rovers out of Denmarke, that had often infested this Iland with their many Invasions, got the head so strong, and wing so farre, even to the middle part thereof, (as this of Mercia was) that they filled with terror the hearts of the Inhabitants, and stained the soile with the bloud of their sides, which in a most barbarous cruelty daily they shed: whose rage was so great, and mindes so unstainable, that Berthulfe was inforced to forsake the Country, and in a more private estate to secure his owne life. He had a sonne named Berefred, who was the causer of Saint Wistans martyrdome.

Wish Matthew Brompton the causer of Saint Wistans martyrdome.

20. An. Dom. 852. Burdred. His raigne. Matth. Weſt. The Danes depart the Province. They returne with Kings. Rowlo. Burdred and his wife flie the land. He was buried at Rome. His wife at Padua. The Kingdome of Mercia brought in subjection to the West-Saxons.

BVrdred the last Mercian King, was thereunto deputed by Ethelwolfe the West-Saxon Monarch, as a shield of defence against the raging Danes, that made desolations where they came. In continuall imploiments against them he spent his time; and that with such noble resolutions and manhood, that Ethelwolfe held him worthy of his allyance; and made him his sonne in Law, by giving him Lady Ethelswith his daughter to Wife, the marriage being solemnized at Chipsham in Wiltshire, with great estate. This Burdred with Ethelwolfe, warred against the Britaines with victory, and he with Alured compelled the Danes under the conduct of Hungar and Vbba, to dislodge from Nottingham, and depart the Province. Yet lastly, after twenty two yeares raigne, he was so overlaid with their daily supplies, that three of their Kings (as our Writers terme them) whose names were Godrun, Eftketell, and Ammond, wintred at Repindon, and sore wasted his Kingdome

King Burdred at that time distressed, and himselfe not able to withstand their rage, with his wife Queen Ethelswith fled the Realme, and the same yeare in Rome ended his life, and was buried in the Church of our Lady belonging to the English Colledge there erected. His Queene in the habit of a Nunne, fifteene yeares after his death, died at Padua in Italy, and was there honourably buried, the yeare of our Lord eight hundred eighty nine. And now the fatall circle of this Mercian kingdome drawne to the full compasse, stayed the hand of all glorious motion from proceeding any further, and with the lot of the rest, fell under the government of the West-Saxons, after one yeares usurpation of the Danes, when it had stood in feare of a kingdome, the space of two hundred and two yeares, and ended in title and regall authority, the yeare of Christs Incarnation eight hundred sixty six.

Chapter XI.

THe East-Angles Kingdome (conteining Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridgeshire, and the Ile of Ely) was railed to the height of a Kingdome, by Vffa a Saxon Captaine, and the people thereof from him were called Vffines along time after. But his greater by farre was Redwald, the third King of his Province, who got and wore, the Imperiall Crowne of the Monarchy. Sixteene Kings of this Kingdome succesſively raigned from Vffa to Edmund, whoſe matches, iſſues, and other collaterals, are in the draught annexed, preſented to thy ſight, with the Armes or Atchievements, that the ancient have given them, and the moderne admitted: which I for my part had rather ſubſcribe unto, then to ranſcate the rubbiſh of times ruines, and get onely labour for my paines. The firſt King of the East-Angles that profeſſed Chriſtianity, was Erpenwald, but with ſuch diſlikes to his people, as they entred into conſpiracie, and traiteouſly murthered him. But his ſonne in Law Sigebert, with a further fore-ſight, laid the foundation deeper, then the ſtep-father had done. For hee built a Schoole, for the education of children, that the veſſell might be ſeaſoned to receive that heavenly liquour, unto which ciſterne, through the Conduits of Felix and others, thoſe waters of life, ſo plenteouſly ranne, that King Sigebert himſelfe deſcended his throne, and in Cumbreburg Abbey ſpent the reſt of his life in holy meditations. And Anna King of this Province, was ſo happy in his children, that moſt of them are commended unto poſterities by the names of Saints. For ſo was Lady Ethelrid, who being twice married, and more then twelve yeares in that eſtate, living in perfect virginity, and againſt the conſents of both her husbands, tooke the vaile of a Nunne at Coldingham, and afterwards became Abbeſſe of Ely. Her ſiſter Sexburg Queene of Kent, and a mother of foure children, after her husbands deceaſe, became a Nunne likewiſe, ſucceeding Queen Sexburg, Abbeſſe of the ſame Monaſtery, wherein Lady Nithgith their younger ſiſter with them was a Menchion. Ethilburg the third daughter of King Anna, was made Abbeſſe of Berking, a foundation of her brother Erkenwalds, Biſhop of London. And Lady Withburg a naturall daughter of the ſaid King, with Sedrida the daughter of his wife, went into France, and in Saint Brigges Monaſtery, ſucceeded each others the Abbeſſes; ſo full of devotions, and ſo fruitleſſe of bodies, were all theſe Princes, excepting Queene Sexburg. But had not their guides been blinded, and altogether ignorant in the Scriptures; they might have knowne, that God in that ſexe required procreation. For, to encreaſe and multiply was the woman created, & by faith & childbearing is to be ſaved, 1 Tim. 2. 15.

The circuit of this Province.

THe Counties (as we now call them) that were subiect to this East-Angles kingdome, were Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge-shire, and the Ile of Ely. The bounds whereof were limited in this manner: the East and North sides were confined by the Ocean; the West, with Saint Edmunds Ditch; and the South altogether with Essex, and some part of Hertfordshire.

1. An. Dom. 575 The first King of the East-Angles. Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 15. East-Angles called Vffingi. Vffa his generologie.

The first raiser of the title and state of this Kingdome, was a Saxon Captain named Vffa, about the year of Christs Incarnation, five hundred seventy five; whose renowne was such, that he gave name not onely to that his aspired dominion, but also from him, the Subiects were a long time after called Vffins: though lastly, it was reduced into the name and kingdome of the East-Angles. This Vffa (as Florentius the Monke of Worcester hath laid downe) was the sonne of Wilhelin, and he the sonne of Hippus, the sonne of Rothmund, the sonne of Trigils, the sonne of Titmon, the sonne of Casar, the second sonne of Prince Woden. His raigne is accounted onely seven years without any mention of further matter, worthy the recording, and his death to have hapned in the year five hundred eighty one.

Titulus, the second king of the East-Angles, and only sonne of Vffa, that is read of, began his raigne the year of Christs Incarnation, five hundred eighty three, and continued the same for the space of twenty years. And although the Writers of these times have made no further mention of his acts, yet may we well suppose that his daies were not altogether so quietly spent, both in the infancy of that newly erected kingdome, and when such wars were commenced for the obtaining the whole Iland. His issue was Redwald, that immediatly succeeded him, and from whom other kings of that kingdome were lineally descended.

R Edwald, the greatest of all the East-Angles kings succeeded his father Titulus in the dominion of the East-Angles, and Ethebert of Kent in the Monarchie of the Saxons. He received and succoured in his Court Edwine and his wife in their Exiles, and assisted him against Ethelfrid king of Northumberland, that fought his life, as before we have shewed, and hereafter in the succession of his Monarchy wee shall have further occasion to shew. He raigned Monarch eight years, and the king of the East-Angles 31. (by the account and computation of the Table annexed to Malmesbury, and others our English Writers) and died the year of our salvation sixe hundred twentie three.

E Rpenwald, the younger sonne of King Redwald, (Reinbere his elder brother being slain in battle by Ethelfred in the quarrell of distressed Edwine) succeeded his father in the kingdome of the East-Angles the year of our Lord God six hundred twenty foure. He was the first king of that Province, that publickly professed the Christian faith, which he received at the friendly motion and zealous exhortation of king Edwine of Northumberland; but so much to the discontentment and grudge of the people, as thereupon they presently entred into conspiracy to practise his death; which a Pagan Ruffian named Richebert, not long after most traiterously executed. His raigne is placed in the foresaid Table of our writers, (as it is compared with the other kings of those times) to extend twelve years; after whose death, those people returned to their wonted idolatry, and for three yeres continuance embraced their former Gentility, from which they were reclaimed by Sigebert his brother in law, who succeeded him in his Throne he having no issue, to whom it might be left.

S Igebert, the sonne of the second wife to Redwald, and by her born to a former husband, whose name as unknowne, was greatly mistrusted by his father in law, King Redwald, that he went about to aspire to his Crowne, the motives of which suspition, notwithstanding all the endevours of innocent Sigebert, were still followed with an envious eye, and his subiective semblances, as notes of popularity, were ever conceived to aime at the supreame authority: which blot of jealousie, when it could no otherwise be wiped out, he abandoned the Court of the King, and country of his birth; and in France as an exile, al the time of Redwald the Father, and likewise in the raigne of Erpenwald the sonne, spent his time in study of good literature, and contemplative exercises, where learning the truth of Christs Doctrine, & having received the laver of Baptisme, after the death of this said Erpenwald his allied brother, returned, and was made King of the East-Angles.

Sigebert suspected of treason against Redwald.

Beda hist. *Angl. lib.*3.*cap.*18. Sigebert with the assistance of a Bishop doth promote religion and learning.

This man (saieth Beda) following the examples of France, brought the light of the Gospel into his Dominions, and by the assistance of Felix Bishop of Dumich, for a more firm plantation thereof, built a Schoole for the education of children, appointing them Schoole-masters and Teachers after the maner of the Kentish-men, who are supposed to have had at that time, the Liberall Sciences professed among them, in their Metropolitane Citie Canterbury which was the paterne (saieth that Countries Perambulator) that this Sigebert followed in the erection of his: but whether at Cambridge or elsewhere, hee leaveth for D. Caius of Cambridge, and M. Key of Oxford, to be disputed of. And indeed Beda affigneth not the place for this foundation, nor once nameth Cambridge, unlesse you will say, that out of the ruines of Grantcester, an ancient City decayed in his dayes, the fame arose, and whereof he maketh mention in his fourth booke, upon this occasion as followeth.

Queene Ethelred (saieth he) that had been a Virgin, wife to Egfrid King of Northumberland, the tearme of twelve years, and Abbesse of Ely for seven more, for her reputed holinesse after her death and burial, was thought worthy by Queene Sexburge her sister (who had been wife to Ercombert King of Kent, and succeeded her Abbesse in the same Monastery) to be removed out of her wooden tombe and mean place of buriall, into the Church, and into a richer Monument but for want of stone, which was scarce in those parts, certaine brethren were sent to finde out some for that use, who comming to Grantcester, a litle Citie left desolate and uninhabited, found by the wals a Tomb of white marble very faire, and covered with a like stone. This they thought to be found, not without miracle, and therefore most fit to entomb her corps, which accordingly they did. But that this had been the place of Sigeberts Schoole, he mētioneth not. But whether by him or no, we know it now the other Vniversity of England, a seed-plot of all divine & humā Literature; & one of those springs whēce issue the wholsome waters that doe bedew both the Church and common-wealth, both famous for the Arts, for Buildings and Revenewes, as their like is not to bee found in Europe (saieth Peter Martyr) and that most truely. But to returne: Sigebert being wearied with the waighty affaeirs of this world, laied the burden therof upon Egricke his kinsman, and shore himselfe a Monke in the Abbey of Cumbreburg, which himself had built: and wherein he lived, untill that wicked Penda, the Mercian King, with his heathenish cruelty, molested the peace of the East-Angles, who after long resistance, finding themselves too weak, besought Sigebert for the better encouragement of their soulditers, to shew himself in field; which when he refused, by constraint (saieth Beda) they drew him forth, where in the midst of them he was slain in battle, using no other weapon for defence, saving only a white wand, when he had onely raigned three years, and left no issue to survive him, that is any where recorded.

A Lduls, the eldest sonne of Ethelherd and Queene Herfswith, after the death of his uncle King Edelmald, obtained the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and therein raigned without any honour or honourable action by him performed: Onely his name and time of his raigne, which was nineteene yeers, is left of him by Writers: and affordeth no further relation of us here to be inserted, besides his Coine here set.

E Lfwolf the son of King Ethelherd, and brother to this last mentioned Aldulfe, began his raigne over the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of Christ his Incarnation, sixe hundred eighty three, and continued in the same, the time of seven yeeres, without record of any memorable Act, Wife, or Issue, to revive his name.

B Eorne, the yongest sonne of king Ethelherd, succeeded his brother King Elfwolfe in the Kingdome of the East-Angles; no further mention being made of him, his wife, nor issue, which are all together perished, and laid long since in their graves of oblivion.

E Thelred, after the death of his cosen Beorne, succeeded him in the kingdome of the East-Angles, issuing (as is supposed) from king Edelwald the brother of Ethelherd, and of Anna, both of them Kings in that Province. His raigne by Writers is said to be fiftie two yeeres, which notwithstanding was passed over without any memorable note: for albeit that his government was long, and the declining Heptarchy nor unlikely to have minished matters of remembrance to posterities, yet is the same passed over by the silence of our Writers, and no further mention made of him, besides the education of his younger sonne Ethelbert, who proved a most worthy King. His wife, and the mother of this vertuous sonne, was Leofrun, saith the Writer of his life, without further mention of her parentage, or other issue. This King deceased the yeere after Christs nativitie, seven hundred fortie eight, the same yeere that Ethelbert entred his Kingdome of Kent.

E Thelbert, the sonne of King Ethelred, after his Fathers death was ordained King of the East-Angles, whose dayes of youth were spent in learning and deeds of charitie, and the whole time of his government in continuall tranquillity; for he is recorded to be a Prince religious and charitable, sober, profound, and wise in counsell. This King being incited by Offa the Mercian (that still thirsted after greatnesse) to marry Elfrid his Daughter, a Lady of great beautie, came upon that purpose to Offa his Court, then seated at Sutton Wallis in the County of Hereford, and was by him there cruelly murthered at the instigation of Quendrid his unkind (intended) mother in Law; no other occasion ministred, but the greatnesse of his Port, that much in her eyes over-heighred her husbands. His Bride-bed (the grave) was first at Marden, North from Sutton upon the River Lug. But afterwards upon repentance, Offa removed it unto Hereford; over whom, Milfrid an under King of the Mercians, built a most faire Church in memorial of him, which yet beares his name, and is the Cathedrall of that See. His Bride, Lady Elfrid, much lamenting his contrived murther, with-drew her selfe to Crowland in the Fennes, and there vowed chastity all the dayes of Abbesse of Streansh ale, and great grand-child to Edwine King of Northumberland, who bare unto him Aldulfe Elfwolfe, and Beorne, all three succeeding Edilwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles.

E Delwald the brother of Ethelherd entred his government of the East-Angles the yeere of our Lord 656. and continued the same the space of nine yeeres, without either mention of any other memorable act: from whom (as is supposed) issued Ethelred that succeeding King after Beorne.

He raigned 45. yeeres.

of her life; notwithstanding some affirme that shee was wife to King Kenwolfe, the successor of her brother Egfrid. This King raigned the space of forty five yeeres, as is set in the Table of our English Writers, and died the yeere of Christs incarnation seven hundred ninety three, the eighteenth day of May; and his Kingdome intruded upon by the Mercians, having had neither wife nor children, that Historians make mention of: after whose death the Kingdome of the East-Angles was brought to decay, both by the Mercians, West-Saxons, and them of Kent; so that by means of their violence, that Province was destitute of her owne Governours, the space of seventy seven yeeres, until lastly the assaults of the Danes (a new-come Guest and most dangerous Enemy) caused the other Kings to stand upon their Guards, and rather to defend what they already had gotten, then to seeke inlargement, to the hazard of all: at which time, it is said one Offa, to whom the right of that Crowne belonged, upon a religious devotion, tooke his pilgrimage to the Sepulcher of Christ, and visiting in his way a kinsman of his, whose name was Alkmund, at the Citie Northenberge in Saxonie, there made his will, wherein he adopted young Edmund his Heire, the sonne of Alkmond: and accomplishing his voyage, in his return died at the Port Saint George, from whence he sent young Edmund his Ring, and therewith ordained him King of the East-Angles. Alkmund a Prince of great power in those parts, maintained his sonnes rightfull election, and with a sufficient power sent him to claime the Kingdome. These landing in the East of England, at a place called Maydenbowre, built a royall Tower, which hee named, and to this day is called, Hunstantone, situated upon the North-west point of Norfolke, that beareth likewise his owne name.

Offa heire to the Crowne, adopteth Edmund the son of Alkmond.

15. An. Dom. 870. Edmund the fifteenth King. The Danes invasion. Polydor. Virg.

EDmund thus arrived, was as willingly received, & by the East-Angles made their King; in whose time Hunger and Hubba, two Danish Captaines, with an innumerable multitude of Heathen Danes, entred the Land at the mouth of Humber, and from thence invaded Nottingham, Yorke, and Northumberland, where (without respect of age or sex) they laid all waste, and left the Land whence they departed like to a desolate Wildernesse. From thence they came with the like fury into Edmunds Territories, and sacked Thetford a frequent City in those dayes: but he not able to withstand their violence, fled into his Castle at Framingham, wherein he was of them besieged; and lastly, taken (saith Abba Floriacensis) in a village then called Heglisdune, of a wood bearing the same name; or rather yeelded himselfe to their torments, to save more Christian blood: for it is recorded, that because of his most constant Faith and Profession, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then scourged him with whips, he still calling upon the name of Jesus; for rage whereof, they bound him to a stake, and with their arrowes shot him to death; and cutting off his head, contemptuously threw it into a bush, after he had raigned over the East-Angles the space of sixteene yeeres, having had neither wife nor issue that is read of. His body and head (after the Danes were departed) were buried at the same royall Town, as Abba termes it, where Sigebert the East-Angleau King, and one of his predecessors, at his establishing of Christianity, built a Church, and where afterwards (in honour of him) was built another most spacious, of a wonderfull frame of Timber, and the name of the Towne, upon the occasion of his buriall, called unto this day, Saint Edmondsbury. This Church and place, Suenus the Pagan Danish King in impiety and fury burned to ashes. But when his sonne Canute had made conquest of this Land, and gotten possession of the English Crowne, terrified and affrighted (as saith the Legend) with a vision of the seeming Saint Edmund, in a religious devotion to expiate his Fathers sacriledge, built it anew most sumptuously, enriched this place with Charters and Gifts, and offered his owne Crowne upon the Martyrs Tombe. After the death of this Edmund, the East-Angles Country was possessed by the Danes, and so continued about some fifty yeeres, untill that Edward surnamed the Elder, expulsed these Danes, and joyned that Kingdome a Province to the West-Saxons, after it had stood three hundred fiftie three yeeres.

CHAPTER. XII.

Hitherto the Saxons Heptarchy.

NOW as we have spoken of every severall Saxon King, that attained unto, and held possession of any part in the East and South of this Iland, untill such time as their Crownes were worne by their Conquerours, and the sevenfold divided Heptarchy, united into an absolute Monarchy: so by order of History it is required, that their opposers (the Britaines) so long as they kept their ground, and stood in defence of their owne right full inheritance, should be shewed: who with a great disdaine, and valorous resistance, under-went the yoake of the Saxons subjections, as their ancient Ancestors had endeavoured to cleere themselves from the chaines of the Romanes captivitie. And untill God and destiny withdrew from them the hand of defence, they mated the Saxons in all their designes. For albeit that the Romans had robbed the land of her strength, and the aspired Vortigern, called in these Strangers for his defence: yet their purposes being wisely perceived, the prevention thereof was presently practised, and eagerly pursued, whilest the pillars (that supported the frame of their government) stood upon their owne Bases. But the ground-worke failing, and those props not many, the waight of all fell upon some few, whose acts and manly resistance (Christ assisting) shall further be related, as time shall bring them to the yeeres of their adventures, and carry our History thorow the affaires of their times. Meane while, as we have recorded the names of their Ancestors, and worthy fore-runners, the resisters of the Romanes: so now if you please, behold the Catalogue of their Kings, from the foresaid Vortigern (the first subdued by these Saxons) unto Cadwallader the last of those British Princes; who left to them his Land, and went himself to Rome: whose times and stories, according to those Guids that lead us, we will declare, referring the credit thereof to our British Historians; against whom howsoever some exceptions are, and may be justly taken; yet are they not altogether to be cast off, in the affaires of these ensuing Princes, especially Gyldas and Ninius, who lived in, and presently after the times of those resisters. Neither is it to be doubted, but that many others there were of that Nation, no lesse carefull for transferring the remembrance of their ancestors actions to posterity, (no Nation living, being more zealously devoted in that kinde,) though their writings have in Times ruines beene buried, and their remembrances preserved onely by perpetuity of traditions. And although we have shewed the ancient Coines of the Britaines, and observed a series thorow the Romanes succession: yet be not offended, that I leave onely Blancks for these latter Princes; as also the first Saxons, wanting the Monies of their owne severall Mintes.

Vortigern the first and Cadwallader the last resister of the Saxons.

A successive Series of Great Britaines Coynes.

Such therefore as I have found of any Kings stamp, raigning whilest the land was divided and enjoyed among them, I have in the margent of their remembrances affixed, with the Armes attributed to every severall kingdome: and hence will observe the same order, without any invention or fained inscription: which howsoever wee want to furnish their successions, yet this I am sure of, no Nation in Europe can shew the like, or can come to so true a series of their Soveraignes Coines, as England is able at this day to doe.

Resisters of the Scots.

VORTIGERN. I.

VOrtigern among the many molestations of the Scots and Picts, was ordained supreme Governor of these affaires; and to that end, with the Britains full consent was elected their King. For as touching that

Monkish

Monkish Constantine, the sonne of Constantius, who is supposed to be the brother of Aldroenus, King of Little Britaine in France, sent for and made King by these Britaines, whose simplicity this Vortigern is said to abuse, and lastly to cause his murther and death; I rather thinke the story to be the same that happened above forty yeeres before, in the daies of Honorius the Emperour, when Constantine among the other conspirators was raised upon a hopefull expectation conceived of his name.

This Constantius indeed had a sonne that bare his name, a man of a soft spirit, and no deepe reach, and therefore in his youth was made a Monke. But his father risen to his aspiring honour, created him first his Cæsar, and next Augustus, till Fortune turned those smiles into frownes, and stained their purple robes in both their owne bloods. For not only the same names induceth this doubt, but the place, which was Winchester; and the Abbey Amphibilus, where this Imperiall Monke was shorne, doth not a little confirme the same: the remaines of which Colledge, by that strong and thicke wall standing to this day at the West gate of that Cathedrall Church, doth not a little confirme. But wanting better directions to our proceedings, we must follow for these times men of later yeeres, and not without some suspect of uncertaintie. The rather, for that the Saxons as then the chiefe Actors in this Land, have purposely concealed all Victors and Victories against themselves, neither but sparingly have recorded their owne.

Saxons have concealed all victories against themselves.

This Vortigern, howsoever attaining the Crowne, was over-awed (saith Ninius) by the Picts and Scots, stood in feare of the Romane forces, dreading much the returne of Aurelius Ambrosius, with his brother Vter, surnamed Pendragon: and therefore wanting strength of his owne to maintaine his standing, sent for the Saxons, as we have said. He (saith the British Story) was Earle of Cornwall, of an honourable Family and noble descent, his Lady every way answerable to both; by whom he had three sonnes, Vortimer, Catigern, and Pascentius. His second Wife, or rather Concubine, (having cast off this first) was Rowena, the daughter of Hengist, which Pagan marriage prooved not only the bane of the Land, but so ruinated the Church of Christianity, that a Provincial Councell of the Britaines was assembled in Ann. 470. to repaire those things that this marriage had decaied.

The cause of Vortigerns feare, and his sending for the Saxons.

Beda lib. 1. cap. 14.

By this Heathen Damosell he had a daughter, who (against the law of God and Nature) was his third wife, that kings (as he pretended, to excuse his incest) might be descended from the right issue of Kings; upon whom he begot his sad lamenting sonne Faustus, a vertuous Impe of those inapious parents, that spent his life in a solitary place neere to the River Llynterewny, as we have said; who abandoning the company of men, among those mountaines served God in continuall teares and prayers, for remission of the fault committed in his incestuous generation, for the recalling of his parents to a better life, and for the restitution of his Countrey to her former liberty.

Vortigern raigned first sixteene yeeres, and then deposed for his favours to the Saxons, was retained in durance all the raigne of Vortimer his sonne, after whose death he was restablished: but oppressed by his Saxons, & pursued by Aurelius, withdrew himselfe into Wales, & among those vast mountains built a Castle by Merlins direction, wherof we have spoken, and more we would speake, were those fantasticke fictions, underset with any props of likelihood or truth, which Rand. of Chester in his daies utterly rejected.

In this Castle, Vortigern with his incestuous wife, after he had fecondly raigned the space of fixe yeeres was consumed to ashes, by the just revenging hand of God, by fire from heaven, as some have written; or else kindled by Aurelius and Vter, as heavens Ministers to execute wrath.

12. An. Dom. 452. Vortimer the second restiter of the Saxons.

Vortimer how long he maintained warre against the Saxons.

Foure chiefe battles, and the successe of the first.

Vortimer the first restiter of the Saxons, was the abuse of his fathers government, for which he was deposed by his owne subjects, was erected King of the Britaines the yeere from Christs birth 454. a man of great valour, which altogether he imploied for the redresse of his Country, according to the testimony of William Malmesbury. Vortimer (saith hee) thinking it not good to dissemble the matter, for that hee saw himselfe and Countrey daily surprised by the craft of the English, set his full purpose to drive them out, and from the seventh yeere after their first entrance, for twenty yeeres continuance fought many Battels with them, and foure of them with great puissance in open field; in the first whereof, they departed with likefortune, and losse of the Generals brethren, Horsa and Catigern: in the other three, the Britaines went away with victory, and so long untill Vortimer was taken away by fatall death.

Huntington, Monmouth, Randulphus, and Fabian, name both the places and succesſe of those Battels: The first was in Kent, and upon the Plaine neere unto Ailsford, where the memoriall of Catigern to this day remaineth; & Horsted doth as yet relish of Horsa there interred. The second Battell was fought likewise in Kent at Crocanford (now Crasford) where many perished as well Britaines as Saxons. The third was at Wepeds Fleet, with great losse to the Britaines: and the fourth upon Calmore, where many of the Saxons, after long and sore fight were slaine, and more drowned in flight, and lastly driven into the Ile of Thanet, their first first assigned habitation (if not over the Seas) so that small hope rested for them so long as this valiant Vortimer lived, who had now dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in the Ile of Thannet likewise, as Fabian confidently affirmeth.

But destiny going forward for the downefall of Britaine, removed these rubs out of her way: for Rowena, the mother of the Britaines mischiefe, and the maintainer of the Saxons residence, found the meanes to make this worthy Vortimer away, and by poyson caused the end of his life, after he had valiantly raigned the space of foure yeeres: all which time, by the testimony of an old Chronicle that Fabian had seene, Vortigerne the father remained in durance, and under assigned Keepers in the City Caerlegeon, now Chester, and so demeaned himselfe towards his sonne (then his Soveraigne) in dutifull obedience and faithfull counsell, that hee wonne againe the hearts of the Britaines, and was againe re-established their King.

It is recorded by Ninius, that Vortimer after his last victory over the Saxons, caused his Monument to be erected at the entrance into Tanet, even in the same place of that great overthrow, which by the said Author is called Lapis Tituli, of us the Stoner, where for certaine it seemes hath beene an haven. In this Monument he commanded his body to be buried, to the further terrour of the Saxons, that in beholding this his Trophey, their spirits might bee daunted at the remembrance of their great overthrow. As Scipio Africanus conceited the like, who commanded his Sepulcher to be so set, that it might overlooke Africa, supposing that his very Tombe would bee a terrour to the Carthagimians. But how that desire of Vortimer was performed, I find not, but rather the contrary: for an old Manuscript I have, that confidently affirmeth him to be buried in London: yet others from Ninius the disciple of Elnodugue, hold the place to be Lincolne. But howsoever his grave is forgotten, yet let this bee remembred, that Sigebertus hath written of him, that After he had vanquished the Saxons (saith hee) whose drift was not onely to over-runne the Land with violence, but also to erect their owne Lawes without clemency, he restored the Christian Religion then sorely decayed, and now built the Churches that those enemies had destroyed.

AVRELIVS AMBROSIVS. III.

3. An. Dom. 466. The third restorer of the Saxons.

Aurelius Ambrosius, verily descended of that Constantine who in the fourth Consulship of Theodosius the younger, was elected here in Britaine, onely in hope of his lucky name, succeeded Vortigern the Father in the Government of Britaine, and Vortimer the sonne, in affection and defence of his Countrey. Hee with Vter (saith Geffrey Monmouth) when their brother Constantine was murthered by Vortigerne, fled into France, where they remained the yeeres of his first raigne; whose returne (as wee have heard from Ninius) he greatly feared, and whose force at the last he felt to his smart. For having againe resumed his Crowne, he lived in his old sinnes, and suffered the Saxons to be Lords of his Land; to prevent which (saith Beda from Gildas) the Britaines by little and little began to take strength, and with some courage to come forth of their Caves, who with one uniforme consent, called to God for his heavenly helpe. They had (saith he) for their Captaine a Roman called Ambrosius Aurelianus, a gentle naturèd man, which onely of all the blond of the Romans remained then alive, his parents being slaine, which bore the name of King of the Country. This man being their Leader, provoked the Victors to the fight, and thorow Gods assistance atchieved the victory. From that day forward now the Britaines, now the Saxons did prevaile, untill the yeere that Bathe was besieged, which was forty foure yeeres after their first comming into the Iland.

Galfrid. Mon.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 16.

His first expedition (as our British Historians report) was against Vortigern, and his Castle in Wales, wherein that incestuous King was consumed to ashes by lightning from heaven, as we have said: and then following the Saxons, made toward Torke, and at Maesbel beyond Humber, encountring Hengist, became his Victor: unto whose mercy (say they) his sonne Occa yeelded himselfe, and obtained in free gift the Country Galloway in Scotland for him and his Saxons. But these his affaires thus prospering against the common Enemy, was envyed at by Pascentius, the youngest son of King Vortigern, who not able either to mate the Saxons, or after his Brethrens deaths to recover the Kingdome to himselfe, ambitiously sought to prefer his base humor before the recovery of his Countries liberty, which then lay gored in her owne bloud. For having gotten the ayde of Gillamare King of Ireland, whither hee had fled upon the death of his Father, and now returned into the West of Wales, first indamaged the City of S. Davids, and thence proceeded with fire and sword. Aurelius then sicke in the City of Winchester, sent his brother Vter to withstand his force, who slew both Pascentius and the Irish King his partaker, in a fetand fore battell fought betwixt them. But before this battell, Pascentius had sent a Saxon, whose name was Eopa, in shew a Britaine, and in habit a Physition, to minister poyson in stead of Physicke, which accordingly was effected with Ambrosius his death.

Vnto this Aurelius Ambrosius is ascribed the erection of that rare and admirable Monument, now called Stonhenge, in the same place where the Britaines had beene treacherously slaughtered and interred, whose manner manner and forme in our draught of Wiltshire wee have inserted. The matter being Stones of a great and huge bignesse, so that some of them containe twelve tun in waight, and twenty eight foote or more in length, their breadth seven, and compasse sixteene. These are set in the ground of a good depth; and stand in a round circle by two and two, having a third stone somewhat of lesse quantity laid gate-wise overwhart on their toppes, fastned with tenons and mortaises, the one into the other; which to some seeme so dangerous, as they may not safely be passed under, the rather for that many of them are falne downe, and the rest suspected of no sure foundation: notwithstanding, at my being there, I neither saw cause of such feare, nor uncertainety in accounting of their numbers; as is said to be. The stones are gray, but not marbled, wherein great holes are beaten even by force of weather, that serve for Ravens and other birds to build in, and bring forth their young. The ground-plot containeth about three hundred foote in compasse, in forme almost round, or rather like unto compasse, with an entrance in upon the East-side. A horse-shooe, with an entrance in upon the East-side. Three rowes of stones seeme formerly to have beene pitched, the largest outwards, and the least inwards, many whereof are now falne downe: but those that stand, shew so faire an aspect, and that so farre off, that they seeme to the beholders to bee some Forresse or strong Castle. A Trench also is about them, which hath beene much deeper: and upon the plaines adjoyning, may round copped hils without any such Trench, (as it were cast up out of the earth) stand like great Hay-cockes in a plaine Meadow. In these, and thereabouts, by digging have beene found peeces of ancient fashioned armour, with the bones of men, whose bodies were thus covered with earth that was brought thither by their welwillers and friends, even in their head-peeces; a token of love that then was used, as some imagine.

This Trophey, Aurelius Ambrosius (in memoriall of the Britaines massacre) erected, and is worthily accounted for one of the wonders of this Iland, and are in the verses of Alex. under Necham called The Giants Daunce; wherein this Ambrosius was interred after he had raigned thirty two yeeres, and whereof the towne Ambresbury beares the name. Others report, that the Britaines erected this most stately Sepulcher over the body of Ambrosius there slaine by the sword of his enemies; that his Countries love, in such a costly peece of worke, might remaine unto posterities in this the Altar of his vertue and manhood: for Paulus Diaconus saith, that this man, in succouring his decayed Country, tooke upon him the Imperiall Robe, and against the violent rage of those German enemies, oft times overthrew their puissant armies, but was lastly slaine by them upon the plaines of Salesbury. I cannot with silence let passe the ridiculous reports of the bringing of the Stones out of Africke into Ireland, and from thence, under the conduct of Vter the brother of Ambrosius, unto this Plaine, by the industrious meanes of Merlin, surnamed Ambrose, borne in the ancient City Merdhyn, and as Humfrey Lhuyd saith, of a noble virgin, whose father, for his skill in the Mathematickes, and wonderfull knowledge in all other kind of learning, was by the rude common people reputed to be the sonne of an Incubus, or a male-Divell, which in the similitude and likenesse of men doe use carnally to company with women. But how this may agree with his divine mouth, who tels us that Spirits have neither flesh nor bones; and the whole Scriptures, that man is carnally begotten, conceived and borne, I leave for others further to dispute. Onely I know, that such begettings as Merlines is reported to bee, without father, and Simon Magus also, that before him would needs be the sonne of a Virgin, doe not a little contradict our Christian Profession, who acknowledge onely the conception of Christ, to be conceived without the seed of man, or of sinne. But to our purpose: Ambrosius Aurelius (by Panvinius accounted the last Emperour of the British bloud) is said to raigne in Britaine thirty two yeeres, and to dye in that of Christs Incarnation foure hundred ninety seven.

VTER PENDRAGON. IIII.

An. Dom. 498. Matth. Westm.

Vter, surnamed Pendragon, the brother of Ambrosius, succeeded him both in valour, and in the Government of Britaine. His entrance was with troubles against the Saxons, who under the leading of Eske and Octa, the sonnes of King Hengist, had passed with spoile to the Citie Yorke, whither this new-made Generall presently repaired; and giving them battell, with the discomfiture of their whole Army, tooke both the brethren prisoners, and committed them to safe custody.

Hect. Boetius.

But the Britaines (saith Boetius) becomming disloyall to their Prince, seldome assisted him with preventing counsell: and the Prince enamored upon the Duke of Cornwalls Wife, consulted more with Merline to transforme himselfe from himselfe, then to give direction against the common enemy. For comming to Tindagell Castle in Cornwall, possessed by Gorlois, Duke of that Province, beheld (in his eye) the paragon of Nature, which was lady Igren, his Dutches and wife. Vter, whose thoughts till then had bin free, and from his child-hood had ever followed Mars in his Shield and Armes were both neglected and unworne, and all his thoughts set on worke to purchase his most wished desire; which lastly, by Merline and Magick was effected, and that after this manner (if we will will beleeve him of Monmouth, who is the reporter.) His suits and hopes failing (saith he) to win her unto dishonor, Merline altogether new-moulded the shape of King Vter, and printed in his face the feature of Gorlois her owne Lord, by which meanes, and without suspect the King dishonourably violated this Ladyes chastity, in which Bed of deceit, the famous Arthur was begot. The captive Captaines Eske and Octa in these loose times of his love, gat loose from their Keepers, and with their ratling armour roused Vter from this wanton Lullaby: who with troopes of strength, and trumpers of defiance, met these Saxons face to face in the field, where berwixt them was fought a most bloudly battell, and that even almost to the last stroke; and wherein, if fatall destiny had withdrawne her hand, the Iland had beene rid of these Intruders for ever. For therein (say our Authors) the Saxons perished by the Britaines swords; upon whose points also Eske and Octa paid their escapes with the losse of their lives. This field was at Verolam, whither Vter sicke, and in his Horse-litter, was borne among his Army, and after long and sore siege, wonne from them that City. Finally, when this King had raigned the space of eighteene yeeres, he dyed by poyson put into a well, whereof usually hee dranke, and was buried at Stonheuge with his brother Ambrosius.

Of his surname Pendragon, these suppofals are made. At his nativity (say some) appeared a fiery Comet, in some part resembling a Dragons Head: whereupon that great reputed Prophet Merline, attributed this heavenly Meteor unto this princely newborne Babe, and gave him the name of Vter-pendragon. Others for his serpentine Wisedome, derive the surname of this Serpents Head, who like unto that of Dan, bit the horse heeles, so that the riders fell backward. Gen. 49. 17.

For in all his warres against the Saxons, he was most fortunate and victorious, with their great overthrowes. But others will have him so named from his Royall Banner, borne ever before him, wherein was portrayed a Dragon with a Golden Head; of which Standard since, neighbour Nations have had good experience, and in far Countryes it hath been displayed in the cause of Christianity, to the terror of the Pagans, as in Syria by that invincible English King, Richard the surnamed Ceur-de-lion; in Scotland and Wales by that conquering Prince Edward the first, and the same as yet is in field borne for an Imperiall Standard in our English Campes.

KING ARTHVR. V.

5. An. Dom. 516. Matth. Westm.

Arthur the sonne of Vter, begotten as is said of Lady Igren Dutchesse of Cornwall, was crowned King at fifteene yeeres of age; about the yeere of Christ five hundred and sixteene; or as Matthew of Westminster hath it, five hundred and eighteene. His prosperous entrance was envyed at by Lotho King of the Picts, and by Gowan King of the Scots, who had married his owne Aunts, Anna and Alda, the two sisters of Ambrose and Vter, each of them expecting the Crowne before him, through the opinion and repute of his bastardy; especially Lotho, who had issue by Anna, Mordrad, and Gawan: the latter of which spent his life in the cause of that quarrell. His first proceedings were against the common enemy the Saxons, whose Captaine Colgerne, he chased from Northumberland into Yorke, which City likewise hee girt with a strait siege, notwithstanding Colgerne thence escaped into Germany, and of King Cherdike got succour for his Saxons, who with seven hundred saile arrived in Scotland. Arthur advertised of his great power, raised his siege, and drew towards London, and thence sent for ayde to his Nephew Howell, King of Little Britaine in France, who came himselfe in person to joyne with his Uncle.

Roule Guran.

These from South-hampton marched to Lincolne, which City Cherdike had strongly besieged, but was thence forced by Arthurs conquering sword. Twelve battles he fought against these Saxons (as Ninius recordeth) with great manhood and victory. The first was at the mouth of the River Gleyne: the second, third, fourth, and fifth, upon the Bankes of Dowglasse, in the County of Lincoln: the sixth upon the River Bassus; the seventh in the wood Calidon; the eighth neere to the Castle Guynion, the ninth in Wales, at the Towne Cairlion: the tenth at Trachenrich, or Rithowode upon the Sea side: the eleventh upon a hill named Agned Cathergonien; and the twelfe at Bathe, or Bathen-hill, where the Britaines (as Beda saith) gave the Saxons a very great overthrow; which (by Gildas report) happened forty foure yeeres after the Saxons first arrivage into Britaine, the yeere wherein himselfe was borne. Beda. hist. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 16.

Of Arthurs successe both at home and abroad, his great magnificence in Court and Country, his Banners, and foure Golden Swords borne before him, his Round Tables, and challenges of Martiall Honour, let Monmouth the Writer, Newbery the Register, and Leiland the Maintainer, bee heard for me. But certaine it is (by the report of Malmesbury) that Arthur was a Prince of more worthy to be advanced by the truth of record in warrantable credit, then by fables scandalized with poeticall fictions and hyperbolicall fallhoods. Whose Banner was so often spread for the cause of Christianity, and defence of his Country, being the onely proppe that upheld the same. And lamentable it is, that the fame of this puissant Prince had not beene founded by a more certaine Trumpet: for to say the truth of his Writer even in a word, he was well skilled in Antiquities of tradition, but but as it seemeth, not any of ancient credit, so many toyes and tales he every where interlaceth out of his owne braine, wherewith he was charged while himselfe lived, insomuch as he is now ranged among those writers whom the Roman Church hath censured to be forbidden.

This hurt therefore those our zealous Monkes have done to the Subject whereof they wrote, that thorow an over-much conceited opinion, with the vertue and fame of the person, they have mingled such matters as may justly bee rejected, whereby their worths are not only deprived of their truly-deserved honours, but which more is, even their persons suspected to be nought else but fictions, as Hercules in Ovid, or Hector in Homer. And so hath Geffrey done by this most worthy Prince Arthur, whose warres against the Saxons for defence of this Iland, hee hath enlarged with the Conquests of other Kingdomes and Countries, wherein he never came: which hath made not onely his Acts to be doubted of, but even his person to be called in question, whether any such Arthur ever ruled in Britaine. Yet with better regard to the Recorders of his spreading fame, wee grant both the man, and many honourably parts in him, though not in the like manner as they have laid them downe: neither are we strayed so far from the steps of credulity, that we can beleeve no more then we see; or that seeing, be fore-stalled with a prejudicate opinion: for though we consent not to the fables of Homer, neither to the inventions that Euripides and Sophocles made upon the Battles of Troy, yet wee deny not but that there were Warres and Battles at Troy, wherein many martiall acts undoubtedly were performed: neither doubt we of his person, as Seneca seemeth to doe of Iupiters, but acknowledge it with reverence for truth, yet with this reservation, that all is not Gospel which is written in Greeke. And had there not been a truth of things whereupon Poets made their fables, there had beene at this day no fables of Poets in the world. And as Geffrey wondreth, that neither Gildas nor Beda doe mention Arthur nor his great deeds, so, saith Randulphus, may we at Geffrey, that hath augmented them above the pitch of credulity. But for the truth of this Prince, besides a Charter exemplified under the seale of King Edward the third, wherein mention is made of King Arthur, to have beene a great Benefactor to the Abbey of Glastenbury, who as Iohn Rouse reporteth, hath given Bren-March and other Demaines, to the value of five hundred Markes yerely, to the said Monastery. His Armes (being an Escocheon, whereon a crosse with the Virgin Mary bearing Christ in her armes) cut in stone, and standing over the first gate of entrance as yet, is said to be the Armes of that Abbey. And Iosephs, the judicious Monke of Excester, who followed King Richard the first in his warre for the Conquest of the Holy Land, in his poeticall verses extolleth Arthur with Alexander, Cæsar, and Hercules; yea and Ninius, farre his ancient, calleth Arthur an Iron Mall, that both bruised and brake the Lions jawes asunder.

Therefore of his person we make no doubt, though his acts have beene written with too lavish a pen: neither consent we with those Historians that naturalize him for a Britaine, seeing that Ninius, Beda, Malmesbury, and himselfe seeme to speake the contrary: for Ambrosius being the brother of Vter Pendragon, as we already from Beda have shewed, was a Captaine descended from the bloud of the Romans, whose parents saith Ninius, had worne the Purple Robe, and both of them the sonnes of Constantine, whose father in Britaine against Honorius the Emperour had put on the said Robe. And by his naturall descent from the Romans, Arthur not onely denyed them Tribute, but also threatned to have a Tribute from Rome: for in his Letters to that end sent unto the Senate, thus in an old Manuscript we find it indited: Vnderstand among you of Rome, that I am King Arthur of Britaine, and freely it hold and shall hold; and at Rome hastily will I be, not to give you truage, but to have truage of you: for Constantine that was Helens sonne, and other of mine Ancestors, conquered Rome, and thereof were Emperours, and that they had and held I shall have yourz Goddis grace. Whereby is manifest his bloud was from the Romans. Let not therefore any of our Britaines take exceptions against me for this; neither that I enlarge not his fame, by the enlargement of his Empire in Russia, Lapland and in making Norway his Chamber of Britaine, as if that Kingdome and Title should bee given him by the Pope, that indeed curs large thongs out of other mens Leather: his Conquests of thirty Kingdomes, and killing of Denobus the huge Spanish Giant, and his combat with Frolo Governor of France, and with Lucius Iberus the Roman Legate, whose slaine body hee sent to the Senate for the tribute of Britaine by them demanded: seeing that others before me, farre more ripe Historians, have made both doubts and objections against them. And therefore I conclude with this Arthur, as Saint Augustine with the Athenians, Whose men (saith he) were ever greater in fame then in deeds. And with Ninius will end with his saying: Arthurus pugnabat contra illos in diebus illis, & licet multi ipso nobiliores essent, ipse tamen duodecies Dux belli fuit, Victorque bellorum: Arthur made warre against them in those dayes, and though many were more noble then he, yet was hee twelve times Generall in the Field, and returned Conquerour. But more constant is the memory of his death, and place of his buriall, both which are reported upon warrantable credite: for Mordred the sonne of Lotho, whereof wee have spoken, affecting the Crowne, upon a pretence of right from King Vter, and supposed bastardize of Arthur, gave many attempts, through the ayde of his Picts, and assistance of the Saxons, to dispossesse him of that wherein he was seated: and lastly at * Kambulan or Cambula in Cornwall (saith Leiland) this British Hector encountring Mordred, slew him out-right, and received of him his owne deaths wounds. The witnesse of this Field as yet are those peeces of Armour, horse-harnesse, and other habiliments of Warre, which are daily digged up in tillage of the ground; unlesse those reliques of battle be the seales of that fight which Marianus writeth to have beene in this place betwixt the Britaines and Saxons, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and twenty.

Marianus Scotus.

If then it be true that Arthur heere dyed, this place we may say seemeth to be consecrated unto Mars: for Tindagell Castle, standing hard by, first brought into the world this glorious Prince, for one of her nine Worthies, and Cambula againe received his last bloud. But from this place hee was carried unto Glastenbury in Somersetshire, where he dyed the one and twentieth of May, in the yeere of our Salvation five hundred forty and two, after he had most victoriously raigned twenty sixe yeeres. His body was there buried, and six hundred yeeres after was taken up, and found upon this occasion: When Henry the second, and first Plantagenet, had swayed the English Scepter to the last of his raigne, it chanced him at Penbrooke to heare sung to the Harpe certaine Ditties of the worthy exploits and acts of this Arthur, (by a Welsh Bard, as they were termed, whose custome was to record and sing at their Feasts the noble deeds of their Ancestors) wherein mention was made of his death, and place of buriall, designing it to be in the Church-yard of Glastenbury, and that betwixt two Pyramides therein standing: whereupon King Henry caused the ground to bee digged, and at seven foote depth was found a huge broad stone, wherein a leaden Crosse was fastned, and in that side that lay downeward, in rude and barbarous letters (as rudely set and contrived) this inscription written upon that side of the Lead that was towards the stone:

Vid. Cantuar. de reg. Glastonbur. Arthur the continuance of his raigne.

HIC IACET SEPVLTVS REX ARTVRIVS IN INSVLA AVALONIA.

Heere lyeth King Arthur buried in the Ile of Avalonia.

And digging nine foot deeper, his body was found in the trunke of a Tree, the bones of great bignesse, and in his scull perceived ten wounds, the last very great, and plainely seene. His Queene Guenever, that had beene neere Kinswoman to Cador Duke of Cornwall, a Lady

The like treasse of haire my self saw in a coffin digged up in an old house neere Paules in London, very beautifull to view, but being touched, was nothing but dust.

Lady of passing beauty, lay likewise by him, whose tresses of haire finely platted, and in colour like the gold, seemed perfect and whole untill it was touched, but then (bewraying what all beauties are) shewed it selfe to be dust. Giraldus Cam. rensis, a worthy Author and an eye-witnesse, is the reporter of this finding of Arthurs bones. And the Crosse of Lead, with the Inscription, as it was found and taken off the stone, was kept in the Treasury or Revester of Glastenbury Church, saith Stow, till the suppression thereof in the raigne of King Henry the eight, whose forme and rude letters we have here expressed to thy sight.

The bones of King Arthur, and of Queene Guenever his wife, by the direction of Henry de Bloys, Nephew to King Henry the second, and Abbat of Glastenbury, at that present, were translated into the great new Church, and there in a faire Tombe of Marble, his body was laid, and his Queenes at his feete; which noble Monument among the farall overthrowes of infinite more, was altogether raced at the dispose of some then in commission; whose too forward zeale, and over-hasty actions in these behalfes, hath left unto us a want of many truths, and cause to wish that some of their imployments had been better spent.

CONSTANTINE. 6.

An. Dom. 542.

Constantine the sonne of Cador Duke of Cornewall, and cosin to King Arthur, by his alliance in marriage, at his death was appointed by him to succeed in his Dominions, and most joyfully received of the Commons, as the man, in the opinion of this worthy elector and themselves, accounted most fit to defend the Land from the many oppressions of the Saxons, who now began to spread the wing as farre as to Tyne in the North, and to set downe the limits of their severall Kingdomes; which notwithstanding, these strangers daily enlarged upon the home-bred Inhabitants, the civill warres of the Britaines giving way to the same; and that not onely among themselves, but by the Picts also, in the behalfe of the two sonnes of Mordred, that sought to dispossesse him of his Crowne. In which quarrell many battles were fought, but with such successe to the attemptors, that these two Competitors were forced for refuge into London and Winchester chester, where taking Sanctuary in those Churches, neere unto the Altar Constantine slew them: for which deed the Priest Gyldas, that flourished in those dayes, in his Invective reprehensions, thus writeth: Britaine hath Kings, but they are Tyrants: Iudges it hath, but they are wicked, pilling and harming the innocent people; revenging and defending, but whom? Such as be guilty and robbers. They have many wives, yet break they wedlocke; many times sweering, yet perjure themselves, vowing, but for the most part with dissembling lies; warring, but still maintaining unjust and civill brayles; abroad pursuing theeues, and yet at home cherish them, even at their owne Tables, and sometimes also reward them. They give large almes indeed, yet heape they up sinnes high as the Mountaine. They sit in the Seat of sentence, yet seldome seeke the rule of right judgement, despising the humble and innocent person, and extolling up to Heaven proud and bloudy Murtherers, Theeues, and Adulterers, yea, and if he would permit them, the very enemies of God. Many they keepe in prison, and load them with irons, more to serve their owne purposes, then for any guilt in the person, taking solemne Oathes before and upon the Altars, and yet despise they the Altars, as altogether vile, and but filthy stones.

In his Booke De excidio Britan. Hum. Lloyd. Brit. Brit.

Of this heinous and wicked offence, Constantine the tyrannicall whelpe of the Lyoneſſe of Devon-shire is not ignorant, who this yeere, after the receiving of his dreadfull Oath, whereby he bound himselfe, that in no wise he should hurt his Subjects, (God first, and then his Oath, with the company of Saints, and his owne mother being present) did notwithstanding in the reverend laps of both his Mothers, the Church, and her by nature, and that under the vesture of an holy Abbat, devoure with sword and speare, in stead of teeth, the tender sides and the entrailes of two children of noble and Kingly race, and likewise of their two Governours, yea, and that (as I said) before the sacred Altars; the Armes of which persons so slaine, not stretched forth to defend themselves with weapons (which few in those dayes handled more valiantly then they) but stretched forth to God, and to his Altar, in the day of Iudgement shall set up the reverend ensignes of their patience and faith at the Gates of the City of Christ, which so have covered the seate of the Celestiall Sacrifice, as it were with the red Mantle of their cluttered bloud.

These things he did not after any good deedes done by him deserving praise: for many yeeres before overcome with the often and changeable filthi's of adultery, and forsaking his lawfull wife (contrary to the Law of God) being not loosed from the snares of his former sinnes, he increaseth the new with the old. Thus farre Gyldas, for this time, and for the raigne of Constantine; whose life being no better, was cut off in battell by Aurelius Conanus, when he had raigned fully three yeeres, and without issue was buried at Stonhenge,

AVRELIVS CONANVS. 7.

7. An. Dom. 545. Mon. westminster.

Aurelius Conanus, the Nephew of King Authur, after he had slaine his Cosen Constantine in battell, was made King over the Britaines, in the yeere after Christs Nativity five hundred forty five. He was of disposition free and liberal, but therewithall of a light credit, and very suspicious, cherishing them that accused others, without respect of right or wrong, putting some to death, and retaining others in perpetuall prison, among whom his own uncle was one, whose two sons he caused to be slain, no causes objected, but that these three were in truth betwixt him & the Crown: for which, and other the like impious parts, the said Gyldas continueth the tenor of his vehement reprehension in this manner. And thou Lyons whelpe (as speakes the Prophet) Aurelius Conanus, what dost thou? art thou not swallowed up in the filthy mire of murthering thy Kinsmen, of committing fornications and adulteries, like to the others before mentioned, if not more deadly, as it were with the waves and surges of the drenching Sea, overwhelming thee with her unmercifull rage? Dost thou not in fasting the peace of thy Country, as a deadly Serpent, and thirsting after civill warres and spoiles (often times unjustly gotten) shut up against thy soule the Gates of celestiall peace? Thou being left alone, as a withering tree in the middle of a field, call to remembrance (I pray thee) the vaine youthfull fantasie, and over timely deaths of thy Fathers and thy Brethren: shalt thou being set apart, and chosen forth of all thy lineage for thy godly deserts, be reserved to live an hundred yeeres, or remaine on earth till thou be as olde as Methuselah? Nothing lesse. And thus with exhortations for his amendment, turneth his speech to his Successor.

Gyldas.

The raigne of this King, among the uncertainties of other proceedings, is ranged by our owne Historians, as uncertainly. For some hold him to rule onely two yeeres, and no more, being then cut off by the just revenging hand of God for his sinnes: others allow three yeeres for his raigne, wherein, as they say, most viciously hee lived: and yet Matthew of Westminster will have him continue in government no lesse then thirty yeeres; and John Stow addeth three more: such extremes are wee driven unto, that have our relations onely from them.

VOR-

VORTIPORVS. VIII.

8. An. Dom. 578.

Vortiporus after the death of Aurelius, succeeded him in the Kingdome of the Britaines, which then was much scantled by the intrusions of the Saxons, whom in many battels (as say the British Historians) he vanquished, and valiantly defended his Land and Subjects, from the danger of them and of their Allies: notwithstanding these reported actions thus honorably atchieved, yea and his parentage with succession of government, may be both suspected and justly called in question, as by the words of Gyldas is manifest; who suffered not this King also to passe untouched in his Invective and lamentable passions. And thou (saith he) Vortiporus the Tyrant of South-wales, like to the Panther in manners and wickednesse, diversly spotted, as it were with divers colours, with thy hoary head in the Throne full of deceits, crafts, & wiles, and defiled even from the lowest part of thy body to the crowne of thy head, with divers and sundry murthers committed on thine own kin, and filthy adulteries, thou proving the unworthy son of a good King, as Manasses was to Ezekias; how chanceth it that the violent streames of sinnes, which thou swallowest up like pleasant wine, or rather art swallowed up by them, (the end of thy life by little and little now drawing neere) cannot yet satisfie thee? What meanest thou, that with fornication, of all evils as it were the full heape, thine owne wife being put away, with her death, which thou wroughtest, dost oppresse thy soule with a certaine burthen that cannot be avoyded?

2 King. 20. 21.

Gyldas

By this testimony of Gyldas, this Vortiporus could not be the sonne of bad Conan, as Geffrey Monmouth and Matthew of Westminster affirme him: his Father being compared to godly Ezechias King of Iudah, and himselfe continuing his government, as is said the space of foure yeares, ended his life without issue to succeed him.

MALGO CANONVS IX.

9. An. Dom. 581. Mon. westminst.

Malgo Canonus, the Nephew of Aurelius Conanus, as some write, succeeded Vortiporus in the Kingdome of Britaine, a man of most seemely presence, but withall, charged with many unbeseeming and foule sinnes, by ancient Gyldas, the onely recorder of the Actions in these times, who calleth him the Dragon of the Iles, greater in power then many, but exceeding all in mischiefe and malice; a large giver, but more lavish and prodigall in all sinnes and licentiousnesse: in Armes and dominions more strong, & greater than any other British Potentate; but stronger in the destruction of his owne soule, in committing the grand abhorred sinne of Sodomie. In his youthfull daies, with sword and fire he brought to destruction his Uncle by the Mothers side (being then King) together with many others, and after upon a shew-seeming remorse of Conscience, vowed the profession and life of a Monke; but returned shortly after to his own vomit, and became worse then he was before: for despising his first marriage, he became ensnared upon the wife of his brothers sonne, whiles he was living, and after that he had kept her a certaine time, murthered them both. In these sinnes hee continued the terme of five yeares, and dying without issue left his Crowne to another.

Malgo Canonus the continuance of his raigne.

By these reprehensions of Gyldas it should rather seeme seeme that these Princes lived altogether at one and the same time, unto whom he spake personally, and mouth to mouth, which could not be, if such successions and such yeares had beene expired, as here is laid downe. And therefore not without cause some have affirmed, that these Captaines usurped authority together in divers parts of this Iland, and not successively one after another; neither indeed as Kings, but rather Tyrants, polluted with these grievous sinnes, as you have heard, and are so termed by their own Historian, that bringeth *one more to tyrannize, whom neither Monmouth, nor he of Westminster hath spoken of, which is Cuneglasus, whom hee calleth a *Beare, a Contemner of Religion, an Lion, tawny Butcher, a Beare, a Contemner of Religion, an Lion, tawny Butcher, a Beare, a Contemner of Religion, an Lion, tawny Butcher, a assumed to himselfe the name of the great Prophet of God, and began to be famously published for the doctrine which he taught: the which was none other but a confused Chaos of all the heresies that had beene before him: for with the Sabellians he denied the Trinity; with the Maniches, he affirmed but two persons to be in the Deity; with Eunomius, he denied the equality of the Father and the Sonne; and with Macedone, taught that the Holy Ghost was a creature, He borrowed of the Iewes Circumcision, of the Nicholaitans, pluralitie of Wives; and of the Gentiles, much Superstition; and more to cloake his divelish invented fatasies, somewhat he tooke from the verity of the Gospel. Of these compounded, he devised a law, and wrote this his religion in the booke called his Alcaron; and those his Professors he named Saracens, from Sara the wife of Abraham.

He died of the falling sickneſſe, which long time hee had dissembled, saying forsooth after his trances, that the Angel Gabriel had conference with him, the brightnesse of whose glory he could not behold.

An. Dom. 625.

CADWALLADER. XIII.

13. An. Dom. 685. Geffry Monm.

Cadwallader, the sonne of Cadwallo, and last King of the Britaines, after the death of his Father, succeeded him in his dominions, and with great valour fought against the Saxons, as hee of Monmouth affirmeth, of whom heare him speake in his owne words. Cadwallader (saith he) raigning victoriously the time of twelue yeeres, fell lastly into a dangerous sickneſſe, with despaire of recovery and unable to governe. Much debate and strife arose among his great Lords, & others of high estate, insomuch that they warred each against others to the no small annoiance and detriment of the Whole Country. At which very time likewise, so great a dearth of corne and victuall raigned, that herbes and roots were the Commons chiefest sustenance: whose third calamity was mortality and pestilence, raigning so sore, and so suddenly, that in their eating, drinking, walking, and speaking, they were surprised with death, and in such number, that the living were scarce able to bury the dead; which miseries lasted no lesse then eleven yeres continuance, whereby the Land became desolate, and brought forth no fruit at all, insomuch that the king and many of his Nobles were driven to forsake their native Country, and to seeke releese in forraine parts. Cadwallader repaired to the Court of Alan his cosen, the King of Little Britaine in France, where he was honourably received and maintained.

But now the Angell of God sheathing his sword from slaughter, and the earth answering man again with her former abundance, those Saxons that were escaped, sent for more of their Nation to their further supply; who replenished the Cities, and manured the Country, at this day called Lhyoyger, containing all the Land that lay on the East of Severne and Dee, dispossessing the poore Britaines of their rightfull inheritance, and devieding their Lands unto their owne use. Cadwallader hearing of their daily arrivage, and their unjust intrusion upon his home-bred subjects, minded their redresse by his present returne, and to that end had wrought King Alan, for his succour & assistance. But see how it chanced: He being now ready to imbarke his Host, and to hoise up his sailes for Britaine, the silent night being much spent in praier & supplication, that God would prosper with good successe these his great affairs, behold an Angell appeared to him, or at least wise to his seeming he heard a voice, that forbad him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will that hee should undergoe that Voiage, or that the Britaines should rule their Land any longer; but contrariwise bade hie him to Rome, and of Pope Sergius receive the habit of Religion, wherein he should die, and rest in peace.

Wm. Newbrig. lib. 1. cap. 1.

This dreame (for I hold it no other) being told unto Alan, search was made into the Bookes of both the Merlines, as also into the speech of the Eagle at Shaftesbury, pronounced eight hundred and eighty yeeres before the birth of our Saviour Christ (if we doe beleeve these to be true) wherein it was prophecied forsooth, that the Britaines should lose their kingdome, and that the same should be possessed of others, untill the time that the bones of Cadwallader should be brought from Rome. By such toies and illusions in those dayes of darknesse, the ever-erring minde of men were content to be led; far not onely Cadwallader, a quiet and meeke-spirited man, was possessed with this conceit, that it came unto him by a divine providence, but also King Alan perswaded him to obey his Oracle; and thereupon preparing for his Pilgrimage, gave over his expedition for Britaine, and left his distressed Subjects to bee over-runne by strangers, and the Land to he enjoyed by a forraine Nation: and receiving the habit of seeming religion at the hands of Pope Sergius, died soone after in the yeere of our Lord six hundred eighty nine, and there was buried in S. Peters Church, being the last king of the Britaines bloud, that had held possession there-of the space of one thousand one hundred thirty and seven yeeres before the Nativity of Christ, and six hundred eighty eight yeres after his Birth, as the Chronicler of Wales, with other Britaine writers, have calculated, though (as is said) after the largest size: but howsoever, this sudden alteration was wrought in Cadwallader, yet whiles he continued a king in health: he raigned (saith Geffrey) in great magnanimitie, the terme terme of three yeares, and fought many battels against the Saxons, whose sword was ever sheathed with victory; for Lothaire King of Kent he slew in the field, and Edelwach also King of the South-Saxons, with the ruine of his Countrey, as the British Historians report, and would have it.

Beda hist. lib. 4. cap. 26.

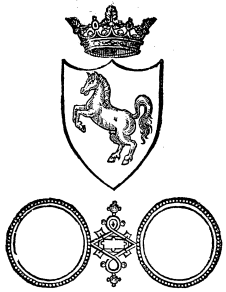
But Beda, unto whom more credit is heerein to bee given, tels us, that Lothaire was slaine by Edrik, his Nephew and Successour, declaring the manner and day of his death; and that Ceadwall, a young man of the West-Saxons blood royall, being banished from among them, fell upon the South-Saxons, harrying the Countrey, and killing their king. But afterwards lamenting the blood he had spilt, whereat even Nature her selfe seemed to be offended, in great repentance abandoned his kingdome, and pilgrim-like went unto Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized upon Easter-Even, the yeare from Christs Nativity six hundred eighty nine. The times thus agreeing their names so neere, their devotions alike, Sergius, the same ghostly father to both, their sepulchres in one and the same Church, do strongly confirme that they both were the same and one only man, as we formerly have said. But with this man Cadwallader, wheresoever he died, lay buried the last blood of their kings, their government, and immediately the very name of Britaine, for many hundred yeares ensuing, as in the sequell of this History (Christ assisting) shall bee shewed.



And now at last, according to my first intendment, I am come to speake of the succession of Great Britaines Monarkes, from which (upon the foreshewed occasions of the Ilands division, the Saxons possessions, and these Britaine Resisters) I have beene overlong staied, and am forced to returne againe to King Hengist, the first of the Saxons, that I may shew their succeeding succession in this English Monarchy, wherein of necessitie I must desire the patience of my Reader, if some things be againe touched that formerly have been taken, the matter of History so much requiring, and the Method that to my proceeding I have proposed, enforcing it.

THE SAXONS SVCCESSIONS IN THE MONARCHY OF GREAT BRITAINE,

WHEREOF HENGIST THE FIRST KING OF KENT BECAME THE FIRST

Monarch of the Englishmen.

CHAPTER. XIII.

An. Dom. 450. Beda. Chronicle.

Engist, a Prince of the English Saxons, having the Command over certaine forces planted in the Low-Countries of Germany, in the yeare of Christs Incarnation foure hundred and fifty, transported them into Britaine where the fift yeare after his arrivall, he began his kingdome of Kent; and having surprised his son in law king Vortigern, slain his Britains, and seized into his possession the best of the Iland, he laid the foundation of a Monarchy, and deserveth to be reputed the first Monarch of the English Nation.

Florent. Wigorn.

(2) He (as all the Saxon Kings besides) doth claime his originall from Prince Woden, and his wife Frea, by Wechta the eldest of their seven sonnes, being the fifth in issue from them; as thus: Himselfe was the son of Withgils, who was the sonne of Witha, and he the son of Wechta, the eldest sonne of the Deified Woden.

Hengist, how long he raigned. Mary Scot. Petr. Iohan.

This Prince held the supreme Scepter of this Iland for thirty foure yeares continuance, and therein died honourably, saith Marianus Scotus. But Peter de Iohan, Polydore, and others say, that he was slaine in battell, or else taken by Edol, Earle of Glocester, and beheaded at Conesborow.

His Issue.

Geffrey Mon. Polydor. Virgil.

He left issue behind him two sons and one daughter, whose names were Hatwaker, Eske, and Romena.

(3) Hatwaker his eldest sonne, is reported by Petrus Albinus of Wittenberg, a great Genealogist and Petrus Albinus.

Historio-

Historiographer also) to be Duke of the Saxons in Germanie, and there left to governe the people at his Fathers departure for Britaine. And if Albinus authority be sufficient, he was the Father of Duke Hatwegat, and Grandfather of Hilderik King of the Saxons, ancestor to the valiant Witikindus, the principall progenitor of the most noble Family of the Dukes of Saxony.

(4) Eske, the second sonne of King Hengist, came over with his Father into Britaine, and was his assistant in all his warres, wherein he gave worthy testimony of his valour: whose Kingdome of Kent after his death he enjoyed, and gave name to that Countries Inhabitants, who were from him called Eskings, over whow he raigned peaceably twenty yeares.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 5. Eske, how long he raigned.

(5) Rowena, the daughter of King Hengist, was borne in Germany before her Fathers departure, and afterwards sent for by him into Britaine, to further his designes. At whose surpassing beauty and feature Vortigern so viciously gazed, that he put from him his lawfull and loving wife, to enjoy the pleasures of her Paganish bed, and to the great decay of Christianity and griefe of the Nobility, he became the Kings second wife; and the principall cause of the Lands destruction. By her he had a daughter, who contrary to all lawes either of God or man, was likewise his third wife; by whom he had issue Faustus, that as vertuously spent the dayes of his life, as he was incestuously begot in that wicked bed.

Vltarpius.

This Rowena, whom some call Ronixa, by Vltarpius, is accounted the Neece, and not the daughter of Hengist. But seeing his opinion is grounded upon the youth of Hengist, as not sufficient in yeares to have a daughter so mariageable, I rather thinke and hold his bare testimony unable to turne the great streame of other Writers out of their usuall course and received channell.

ELLA THE FIRST KING OF THE SOVTH-SAXONS, AND SECOND MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Ella Monarch.

Chapter. XIV.

An. Dom. 581.

ELla a noble Saxon, being sent for by King Hengist, about the three and twentieth yeare of his raigne, brought a fresh supply of those Germans to the reliefe of his Countrymen, who with his forces landed at the Haven now called Shoreham in Sussex, where putting backe the inhabitants in many skirmishes, lastly chased them into a great wood then called Andredsfege; whence often being assailed by the sudden assaults of the Britaines, (wherein, as may be thought, he lost the lives of his two elder sonnes) was so hardly beset, that he sent for more aid of his Saxons, who came to his supply.

Mat. Westminst.

(2) His strength thus augmented, and ambition still increased, he fought three cruell and bloody battels, but the last of them most fatall against the Britaines, in the place then called Macrodesburne, and besieging the ancient and famous Citie Andred Chester (situated in the said great forrest, and chief defensible fortresse in all those Southerne parts) intercepted the Britaines that came to their reliefe, and entring the same by an assault, put to the sword all that were found within it. After which great losse, the Britaines fought rather to provide for their own safety by flying into desert places, then by making open resistance to procure their owne too apparant destruction.

Henry Huntingt.

An. Dom. 488.

(3) Ella in this state continued the time of five yeares before he assumed the name of King, or the limits of that Province assigned under his government: but then without any shew of resistance laid the foundation of this kingdom, which was the second of the Saxons; and as Hengist held Kent, so he had Sussex and Surrey for his possession, wherein for sixe yeares space with Hengist, hee lived, with such approbation of valour, as that, after his death, hee became the second Saxon Monarch of the Englishmen, in the yeere of grace 488.

Ella, how long he raigned.

(4) He is said to be the elder son of Osa, and Osa his genealogy Florentius of Worcester thus deriveth: Osa (saith he) was the sonne of Etherbert, and he the son of Ingengeat, who was the sonne of Angengiat, whose father was Alusa, the sonne of Ingebrand, the sonne of Florent. Wigor.

of Wegbrand, the son of Beorn, the son of Beornus, the eldest sonne of Brand, the sonne of Bealdeag, the sixth sonne of Prince Woden and of Lady Fria his Wife.

Wil. Malmesb.

His Issue.

(5) His issue were Kymen, Plenching, and Cissa, three valiant sonnes, that came over with him, and assisted him in his enterprises for Britaine. From Kymen, the port wherein they arrived, was called Kymenishore; by the Britaines, Cuneneshore, which time and Seas hath both shortened, and altered: and now it is called Shoreham, a well knowne haven in Sussex. This Prince came to his grave before his Father, either by the stroke of warres, or by the course of nature, without further mention of his acts, and his succession, cut off by his death.

Florent. Wig.

(6) Plenching his second sonne, was borne unto him in the Low-Countries of Germany, and with his brethren assisted his Father to the attaining of the South-Saxons Crowne; but being cut off by untimely death, whether by the hand of the enemy, or by natures appointment, it is uncertaine.

(7) The youngest sonne of King Ella, was Cissa, whom death spared to live a long life; but fame as sparing to adorne it with memory of his acts: for nothing of him is left memorable, besides the building of Chichester. Fortune indeed set his Fathers Crowne on his head, but kept the Imperiall Diademe in her owne hand, to adorne the head of a Worthier bearer, which was Cherdik the West-Saxon, unto whom Cissa gave yeerely contribution, to secure him from the Britaines, as before and after hath beene, and shall be shewed.

(8) This Ella his entrance and erection of his Kingdome, for time is uncertaine; but his raigne therein, as also in his Monarchy, is more certainly knowne: for hee was King of the South-Saxons the space of thirtie two yeeres, and Monarch of the English-men sixe and twenty, dying in the yeere of Christs Incarnation five hundred and foureteene, which was the thirty sixth after his first arrivall into Britaine.

CHERDIK THE FIRST, KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Cherdik.

Chapter XV.

1. An. Dom. 495.

THE Saxons Sunne, thus risen and high ascended upon the South of Britaine, began now to spread his beames towards the West; for Kent beeing quietly possessed by King Eske, and South-Saxia, with all the subdued, at the dispose of great Ella; Cherdik a valiant Captaine of the Low-Countrey Germans, thought himselfe as sufficient in warres, and as able for reach, to weare, and to weild a Crowne of Estate, as either of them that had so done before him: And seeing that Britaine was now the seed-plot for Diademes, set his affection and preparation that way.

Matth. Westm.

(2) He with his forces entred in the West of that Iland, where he in his first battell so danted the Inhabitants, that apparant signes of approching glory, were added to his aspiring hopes: for therein hee slew Natanleod, otherwise called Nazaleod, a mighty King of the Britaines, whereby an easie entrance was laid open to his desired Empire, and a more easie warre left to his posteritie. This battell chanced about the yeere of Christ Iesus five hundred and eight, and was fought in the region of Natanleod, (which Countrey bare the name of the King) and neere unto a brooke of water in the West of Hampshire, which from Cherdik began to be called Cherdiks ford, where now a Towne of the same name standeth, but by contraction and shornesse of speech, is called Chardford.

Henr. Hunt.

(3) Florentius of Worcester, the Saxons Genealogist, (as I may well terme him) bringeth this Cherdik (as he doth the rest of the Saxon Kings) from the ancient Prince Woden, and that in this manner: Cherdik (saith he) was the sonne of Elisius, and he the sonne of Esla, the sonne of Gerisius, the sonne of Wigga, the sonne of Friaivin, the sonne of Freodegar, the sonne of Beorn, the progenitor of Ida the first King of Bernicia, and both both of them the sonnes of Brand, the sonne of Bealdeag, the fift sonne of the foresaid Woden.

(4) In the seventh yeere of Ella his Monarchie, was his arrivage, and sixe yeeres after he began his Kingdome of the West-Saxons; seating himselfe and the foundation thereof betwixt the Britaines and the South-Saxons; for whose further securitie Ceffa King of that Province, gave him an yeerely contribution towards the maintenance of his charge in warre; wherin he got such reputation, that after the death of Ella, and the thirteenth of his owne raigne, he assumed the Monarchy unto himselfe, and was both the first King of the West-Saxons, and the third Monarch of the Englishmen, wherein he continued the space of twentie one yeeres, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord five hundred thirtie five, being the three and thirtieth of his Kingdome, and the fortieth after his first arrivall.

See Chap. 1.

His Issue.

(5) His Issue were two sonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolfe: the one immediately, and the issue of the other collaterally attained to the same possession and title that Cherdike here first laid.

(6) Chelwolfe his second sonne (for of Kenrik the eldest we are hereafter to speake) hath little mention made of among our Writers: more then that he was the Ancestour of Eskwin, the eight King of the West-Saxons, that is to say, the father to Kenfrid the father of Kenfy; which Kenfy had issue the said Eskwin, who was the successor of King Kenwalk, and predecessour of King Kentwin in the Kingdome of the West-Saxons.

KENRIK THE SECOND KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Kenrik.

Chapter. XVI.

2. An. Dom. 534. Matth. West.

Kenrik, the eldest sonne of King Cherdick (as is said) being borne in Germanie, and following his Father into Britaine, valiantly served under him, as well in the Battell fought against King Natanleod, the first day of his arrivage, as in other Battels against the Britaines in other places; namely, at Cherdikesford, Cherdiffley, and in the Conquest of the Ile of wight. Immediately upon the death of his Father, hee succeeded in his whole dominions, and was ordained the second King of the West-Saxons, and the fourth Monarch of the Englishmen, beginning his raigne over both at one and the same time, the yeere of Christ his Nativitie five hundred thirtie foure.

(2) And enlarging his confines upon the Territories of the Britaines, gave them two great overthrowes; the one at Searesbury in Wilt-shire, and the other at Banbury in Oxford-shire, which was fought the two and twentieth of his raigne, whereby his fame grew more renowned, and his Kingdome in more quiet after. Hee raigned the space of twentie sixe yeeres, and left this life in the yeere of our Lord God five hundred sixtie.

An. Dom. 556. Kenrik, how long he raigned.

His Issue.

(3) He had issue three sonnes, Chelwin, Cuthwolfe, and Cuth. Chelwin the first, succeeded his Father in the Monarchie, and West-Saxons Kingdome.

(4) Cuthwolfe, the second, assisted his brother in many Victories, as presently in his raigne shall follow. And Cuth, the third brother, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe, whereof more largely hath been spoken in the raigne of Kenrik, as hee was King onely of the West-Saxons.

CHEV-

Cheuline.

CHEVLINE THE THIRD KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND FIFTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Chapter. XVII.

An. Dom. 561. Matth. West.

Cheuline, the eldest sonne of King Kenricke, served with great commendations vnder his father, in all his warres against the Britaines, and is specially mentioned at the Battle of Banbury in Oxfordshire; and after his fathers death became the third King of the West-Saxons, and the fift Monarch of the Englishmen. He much enlarged the bounds of his Kingdome, and increased the power and glory of the West-Saxons.

Matth. Westm. Gyldas.

(2) For continuing the warres where his Father left, did not onely subdue the Britaines in many Battles, but also set himselfe against his owne Nation the Saxons, and sought to impose the scope of his power vpon the South of the Riuer Thames: for entring Kent (whose King was then a childe, by name Ethelbert, the sonne of Imerick) at Wiphandon or Wilbandon in Surrey*, in a set and sore Battle, defeated all his forces; whence the yong King was chased, and two of his greatest Captaines, bearing the names of Dukes, were slaine, as we haue said.

Henry Hunting. *Winbledon.

(3) Not long after this victory, he set his minde to inlarge his West-Saxons Dominions vpon the possession of the declining Britaines, and to that end furnished forth a great Band of his Souldiers, whereof he made his brother Cuthwin chiefe Generall. These marching to Bedford, gaue Battle to the Britaines, where they slew them downe right; and surprized foure of their chiefest Townes, at that time called Liganburdge, Eglesbourgh*, Benfington, and Euesham; which they fortified, to their owne strength, and the Britaines great losse.

* Aldbury.

(4) And following the Tract of his fore-going fortunes, about sixe yeeres after sent forth againe his Saxons, under the conduct of the foresaid Cuthwin, who encountred the Britaines at Diorth or Deorham, with such valour and successe, that besides great slaughter of the British Souldiers, three of their Kings, whose names were, Coinmagill, Candidan, and Farinnagill, fell in the field, with the surprizal of these three Cities, Gloceſter, Bathe, and Cirenceſter. Then (saith Gyldas) euidently appeared the Lands destruction, the sins of the Britaines being the onely cause, when neither Prince nor people, priest nor Leuite, regarded the Law of the Lord but disobediently wandred in their owne waies.

Matth. Westm.

(5) But no greater were the sinnes of the Britaines then the unsatiable desires of the Saxons were to conquer: for Cheuline about the last of Malgoe his government, met the Britaines at Fetanleah, in the face of a Field, which was fought out, to the great slaughters of them both, and with the death of Prince Cuth, King Cheulins son: notwithstanding the victory fell on his side with great spoiles obtained, & possessions of many Prouinces, which himselfe no long time enioyed.

Tho. Elienſis.

(6) For growne proud through his many prosperous victories against his enemies, and tyrannizing over his own Subjects, the West-Saxons, fell into such contempt, that they ioyned with the Britaines for his destruction. The greatest against him, was disloyall Chell or Cealricke, his nephew, the sonne of Cuthwin his most loyall brother, whom both the Nations had elected for Generall. Vnder him they muster and march into Wilshire, and at Wodnesbeath (now Wannes-ditch) pitch downe their Standards. Cheuline that thought hee led fortune in a lease, with confident boldnesse built his present proceedings upon his former successe, and in the face of his enemies displayed his colours. But the Battles joyned, and the Field goared with bloud, the day was lost upon the Kings side, and he in distresse saued himselfe by flight. Heere might you haue seene the world, as it is, unconstant and variable; for he a Mars, that had over-borne the Britaines in so many Battles, and had raised his Saxons unto so great a height, is forced to flee before his conquered Captives, and to exile himselfe from the sight of his owne Subjects, after he had gloriously raigned thirty one yeeres, or (as some will) thirty three, and as a meane meane man, dyed in his banishment, the yeere of grace fiue hundred ninety two.

His Issue.

(7) He had issue two sonnes, which were Cuth and Cuthwin, the elder whereof had valiantly serued in his fathers warres, namely at Wimbledone in Surrey, against King Ethelbert and his power of Kentishmen, in the yeere of Christ five hundred sixety seuen; and lastly in the Battle at Fethanleah, where the Britaines receiued a great ouerthrow. Notwithstanding he valiantly fighting among the thickest of his enemies, was there slaine, in the yeere of our Lord five hundred eighty foure, being the five and twentieth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and that without issue.

(8) Cuthwin, the younger sonne of King Cheuline, survived his Father, but succeeded him not, because of his young yeeres; or else (and that rather) for the hatred that his father had purchased of his Subiects; which they repaied him in his owne expulsion, and in this his sonnes deprivation. But although the wreath of the West-Saxons did not adorne this Cuthwins head, yet shone it more bright, and stood with greater majesty upon the browes of Ina, the warlike and zealous King of West-Saxons and of Egbert the victorious and first sole absolute Monarch of the English Empire: both of them in a right line issued from this Cuthwin, as in the seventh Chapter we have said.

ETHELBERT THE FIFTH, AND FIRST CHRISTIAN KING OF KENT, AND THE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

An. Dom. 561.

THe flame of the West-Saxons for a time thus quenched; the Lampe of Kent began againe to shine, and to assume the Title of the Monarchy, after it had been suppressed in them through the raignes of these foure last Kings: for young Egberts entrance, with the great losse of his Kentish, overthrowne by King Cheuline, gave rather inducements to a tributary subiection, then any apparant hopes to purchase an Empire.

Will. Malmesb.

(2) But such is the disposé of God in his hidden Counsell, that things of least appearance many times become the greatest in substance, as in this Prince it was evidently seene, who making use of his owne youth and losse, got thereby experience, both to defense himselfe, and to provoke others, and with such victories abroad, repaired his losses at home, that as farre as Humber he made all subject to Kent.

Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 25.

(3) Thus growne to be the greatest of any Saxon before him, he sought to hold it up by forraine alliance, and to that end became suter for Berta a most vertuous Christian Lady, the Daughter of Chilperike King of France; unto whom by her father she was lastly granted, but with these conditions, that shee might reserve her Christian Profession, enjoy the presence and the instructions of Luidhard her learned Bishop, with the place of his Queene.

(4) These covenants concluded, and many French Christians attending her in his Court, by their daily service of God, and continuall practise of piety, drew many of the English to favour their Religion, yea and the King also to be inclined that way. And as these were working the salvation of Kent, behold Gods proceedings for the conversion of the rest.

(5) It chanced great Gregory (then Arch-deacon of Rome) to see certaine youths of this Iland brought to that City, to be sold for slaves: His Christian heart pitying at such heathenish tyrannizings, and beholding stedfastly their faces to bee faire and Angellike, demanded of their Merchants, from what Nation, and whence they were; who made him answer, that they were Angles, and by that name knowne in the Ile of Britaine. Indeed, said Gregory, and not without cause are they so named, their resemblance is so Angelicall, and fit it is that they be made inheritours with the Angels in heaven. But of what Province in Britaine are they, said Gregory, of Deira, say they, a Country in the North of that continent. Now surely, said hee, it is great pitty but that these people people should be taken from Dei ira, the ire of God. And farther asking, what was the name of their king, it was answered, that he was called Ella; whereunto he alluding, said, that Alleluia, to the praise of God, in that Princes Dominions should shortly be sung.

(6) And to that purpose himselfe, being afterwards Pope, sent Austine a Monke, with forty others his assistants, whereof Melitus, Iustus, and Iohn were chiefe. These landing in Tanet, in the moneth of July, about five hundred ninety and sixe yeeres after the Incarnation of Christ, and one hundred forty and seven after the first arrivage of these Angles into Britaine, had immediately accesse unto the presence of King Ethelbert, but yet in the open Field; for he feared to conferre with them in any house, lest by sorcery (as he fondly surmised) he might be overcome.

Austine and his followers entertained in Canterbury.

(7) These preaching unto him the word of life, his answer was, that presently he could not consent to their Doctrine, neither rashly forsake his ancient and accustomed religion. But seeing (said he) you tell us strange things, and give us faire promises of after life, when this life shall be ended, we permit you to preach the same to our people, and to convert as many as you can; and wee our selves will minister all things bechoovefull for your livelihood. Which promise he instantly performed, and in Canterbury his head City, allowed them fit places for residence, and sufficient provision for their maintenance, wherein these religious men, following in some measure the examples of the Apostles, spent their times in preaching and prayers, watching for the peoples conversions, and exercising the works of true piety, as examples and motives unto others, to embrace the Gospell which they sought to plant.

Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 26. Beda hist. lib. 1. cap. 26.

(8) Neere unto the East part of the City stood an ancient Church, built by the Christian Romans, whiles they had dwelt in Britaine, and by them dedicated to the honour of S. Martin, and is so yet called. To this Church the Christian Queene Berta, with her Communicants the French, daily resorted to pray, and unto these, and in this Church, Austine and his fellowes began daily to preach: unto whose Sermons so many of the Kemish also resorted, that a plentifull harvest in short time appeared, upon the seed-plot of their tillage, for it is reported that ten thousand of the English people were baptized there in one day, insomuch that the King himselfe forsooke his Heathenish Idolatrie, and likewise received the Sacrament of Baptisme, unto his salvation in Christ: in witnesse whereof hee gave the Lordship and Royaltie of his chiefe Citie Canterburie, unto Augustine and resigned his Princely Palace therein unto him; who in the East of this Citie laid the foundation of that great, and afterwards magnificent Church, dedicated to the service and name of Christ, which at this day is the Cathedrall of that Metropolitan See: and Ethelbert to give him more roome, withdrew himselfe unto Reculuer in Tanet, where he erected a Palace for himselfe and his Successours, the compasse whereof may be traced by an old wall, whose ruines remaine there yet to this day.

Gregory lib. 7. epist. 6.

Canterbury given to Austine.

(9) Austine thus seated, and in the well-deserved favour of King Ethelbert, got one request more, which was this; that whereas by the Law of the Twelve Tables, it was forbidden to bury the dead within the walles of any Citie, (the practise whereof, wee daily find by monuments taken up in the fields adjoyning) it would please him to give to that use, an old Idoll-Temple standing without the East wall of the Citie, wherein the King himselfe had wontedly worshipped his Idols. This obtained, and the Church purged from that profane exercise, to the service of God, being honored with the name of S. Pancras, King Ethelbert added thereunto a most faire Monasterie, built upon his owne cost, and dedicated it unto the name of Peter and Paul the Apostles, appointing it to be the place for the Kemish Kings Sepulchers; and Austine, likewise meant it for the burials of his successours in that See. But first it became the monument of his owne name: for in regard of the Procurer, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were soone swallowed up, and the whole called onely by the name of S. Austines. In this place, eight Kings of Kent had their bodies interred, and ten of their Archbishops therein laid, untill that Cuthbert the eleventh in succession, in favour of S. Iohn, a new Church by him erected, procured of King Egbert the sonne of Ercombert, that the succeeding Arch-bishops might be buried there. This Monastery, as all the rest did, came to her fatall period in the daies of King Henry the eighth; whose uncovered walles stood so long languishing in time and stormes of weather, that it daily increased the aspect of her ruines, till now lastly they are made subject to other publike uses, and the wholetract of that most goodly foundation in the same place no where appearing. Only Ethelberts Tower, in memory and honour of the man, as yet hath escaped the verdict and sentence of destruction; whose beautie, though much defaced and overworne, will witnesse to succeeding ages the magnificence of the whole, when all stood compleat in their glory together.

(10) These his happy beginnings, Austine signified by Letters to Rome, and withall demanded directions, how he might further proceed: which questions, were they not written by the Venerable Beda, wee could hardly beleeve that such idle conceits should have place in the minde of a man so well and fruitfully busied: as, Whether a woman with child might receive the Sacrament of Baptisme, or in her monethly disease, she holy Communion, or enter the Church: How long after her deliverance, she husband ought to refraine her Bed: How the Gifts that were offered on the Altar, ought to bee destributed: and unto what degree of consanguinitie Christians might marry: and many others such like, as though himselfe had never read either Moses or Paul. But of the thing then more needfull, for that at that time it stirred most contention, it seemeth he was sufficiently instructed; neither among his other questions is it once named: and that was, the due time for the celebration of Easter: the difference whereof, betwixt the Britaines and the Romanes was such, that it caused Lord-like Austin to prophecy (if not to seeke) their destructions; and they in their opinions, to hold him no better then the Man of Sinne: for thus the Story is reported.

Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 2. Ranul. Cestr. Sigebertus. Galfrid. lib. 8. cap. 4.

Austines questions to the Pope.

(11) Austine, by the assistance and authoritie of King Ethelbert, called an Assembly of the British Bishops and Doctours, that had retained the Doctrine of the Gospell amongst them, even from the first plantation thereof by the Apostles themselves, to be holden in the Borders of the Victians and West-Saxons, and at the place upon that occasion called * Austines Oake: thither resorted seven British Bishops, & many other well-learned men (saith Beda) out of their greatest Monastery at Bangor, where at that time Dinoth was Abbat. These men now ready to go to the foresaid Synod, came first to a certaine holy and wise man, which lived there about an Anchorets life, to aske his counsell, whether they ought at Austins preaching and exhortations, leave their Traditions or no: The Anchoret replied, If he be a man of God, follow him: But how shall we prove (said they) that he is a man of God? The Anchoret answered, Our Lord saith, Take yee on you my Yoke, and learne yee of mee, for I am milde and humble of heart: If therefore this Austine bee milde and humble of heart, it is like that himselfe beareth the Yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare: But if hee be curst and proud, it is certaine that he is not of God, neither must we much esteeme his words: Then they enquired, how must we much esteeme his words: Then they enquired, how they might know whether this Austine were proud or no: they might know whether this Austine were proud or no: provide (quoth he) that he and his companie may come first to the place of the Synod or Councell-house: and if it bee so that when you approch neere him, he arise courteously, and salute you, then thinke him to be the servant of Christ, and so heare him, and obey him: but if when you approch, hee despise you, and will not vouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are the greater number, let him likewise bee despised of you. And truly (saith hee) as this Anchoret bade them, so did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, S. Austine was already set in his Chaire, and shirred not: which which when they saw forthwith waxing wroth, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeavoured to overthwart and gainsay what soever he proposed. And so the Synod brake up without any thing done.

Gal. 4. 9.

Thus then we see, that the substance of doctrine was embraced in Britaine, before the sending of Austin from Rome: only in ceremonies they dissented, as the most of Christian Churches, without derogation to the Gospell, at this day doe. And this for the celebration of Easter, a matter of no great moment (if we consider our Christian liberty, and the Apostles feare, that the observations of dayes, moneths, times, and yeeres, turne the hearts after beggerly rudiments, bring againe into bondage, and make his labours for Christ in vaine) yet for the different observation only of this Feast from the Romans, how oft are the Britaines tearmed by Beda, a wicked people, a curfed nation, and well deserving those calamities which the Lord did inflict upon them? This controversie for Easters celebration, thus begun, continued no lesse then ninetie yeeres after, and was lastly concluded in manner as followeth.

Beda hist. lib. 3. cap. 25.

(12) This variance (saith Beda) made not onely the people to doubt and feare, lest bearing the name of Christians, they did and had runne in vaine, as the Apostle speaketh, but also good Oswy King of Northumberland, and le arned Prince Alkfryd, with Queene Eanfled, were much distracted and perplexed: for by this variance (saith he) it oftentimes hapned, that in one yeere two Easters were kept; for the King breaking up his Fast, and solemnizing of the Feast, the Queene with Prince Alkfrid, continued their Fast, and kept that day their Palme-Sunday. To conclude which contrarietie, a Synod purposely was called, and the Question disputed by their best Divines. The place was Strunfhalch or Whitby, whereof Hilda was Abbesse. The chiefe parties for, and against the accustomed time of keeping that Feast, were King Oswy and Prince Alkfrid his sonne. The Disputers for Oswy and the established orders, were Colman Arch-bishop of Yorke, with his Scottish Clergie, and Hilda the vertuous and learned Lady Abbesse of the place. For Alkfrid and the attempted alteration, were Agilbert Bishop of the West-Saxons, Wilfrid Abbat of Rippon, with Iames and Romanus, two learned men, and the reverend Cedda newly consecrated Bishop, appointed Prolocutor of the Assembly.

Strunfhalch Synode.

King Oswy perswadeth to union.

The Convocation set, King Oswy made a solemne Oration, wherein he urged a necessity, that those people which served one God, ought to celebrate his heavenly Sacraments alike, and should keepe one order and rule in the same: the truth of which service, and surcease of that long unchristian variance, for the Christian celebration and time of Easter, was then presently by those learned men to be handled, and by best approovements to be determined; whereunto hee requested their uttermost endeavours, and to that purpose commanded his Arch-bishop Colman first to speake: whereupon Colman with reverence stood up and said: The Easter which I observe, I received of my fore-fathers, of whom I was consecrated, and sent hither for your Bishop. They all (you know) were godly men and observed the Feast as wee doe now; neither thinke you they kept this tradition without sure warrant from greater then themselves, which was Saint Iohn the Evangelist, and the Disciple whom Iesus especially loved, who in the Churches which himselfe planted, celebrated the Feast of Easter, as we doe now. Therefore knowing the man so worthy, and the manner so ancient, I hope you will all confesse, it is not safe for us now to reject it.

Colmans speech to the Synode.

Wilfrid the declaimer, appointed to answer, stood vp and said: The Easter which we observe, we our selves have seene observed in Rome, where the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul lived, preached, suffered, and are buried: and in our travels thorow France and Italy, either for study or upon pilgrimage, we have seene the same order kept: and we know by relation, that in Africke, Asia, Egypt and Greece, nay thorowout all nations and tongues in the world where Christ hath his Church, that this our time and order is observed. Shall then these obstinate Picts (I meane the Britaines) and these remote Ilands in the Ocean Sea, and yet not all of them neither, fondly contend in this point against the whole world?

Wilfrides answer.

Colmans vanitie.

But heare Colman interrupted him, and said, I much marvell, brother, that you tearme our doings a fond contention, seeing we have for our warrant so worthy an Apostle as Iohn was, who onely leaned upon our Lords brest, and whose life and behaviour all the world acknowledgeth to be most wise and discreet.

Iustinian. histor. angl. lib. 14. cap. 3. Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 3.

Wilfrides moderation.

God forbid (said Wilfrid) that I should accuse Iohn: but yet we know that he kept the decrees of Moses literally, and according to the Iewish Lawes; and so the rest of the Apostles were constrained in some things to doe, for the weakenesse of them who accounted it a great sin to abrogate those rites that God himselfe had instituted; and for that cause S. Paul did circumcisse Timothy, offred bloudy sacrifices in the Temple, shaved his head at Corinth with Aquila and Priscilla: upon which consideration also spake Iames unto Paul, you see brother how many thousand of the Iewes have received the faith and all of those are yet zealous followers of the Law. But the light of the Gospell now shining thorow the world, it is not lawfull for any Christian to be circumcised, or to offer up bloudy sacrifices of Beasts. Saint Iohn therefore, according to the custome of the law, in the fourteenth day of the first moneth, at euen began the celebration of Easters Festivitie, regardlesse whether it fell upon that Sabbath day, or any other of the weeke. But S. Peter preaching the Gospell in Rome, remembring that our Lord arose from his graue the first day after the Sabbath, giuing thereby unto us certaine assurance of our resurrection, observed the Feast of Easter according to the commandement of that Law he looked for, euen as S. Iohn did, that is to say the first Sabbath after the full Moone of the first moneth. Neither doth this new observation of the Gospell, and Apostles practise, breake the old law, but rather fulfilleth it; for the Law commandeth the Feast of Passeouer to be kept from the fourteenth day of that moneth, to the twentie and one of the same. And this hath the Nicene Councell not newly decreed, but rather confirmed (as the Ecclesiasticall History witnesseth) that this is the true observation of Easter, and of all Christians after this account is to be celebrated: and thereupon charged Bishop Colman, that hee neither observed it according to Iohn or Peter.

Exod. 12.

Rossensis lib. 3. cap. 6.

To this the Bishop replied, that Anatholius for his holinesse much commended by the said Ecclesiasticall History, and Columba a Father of like sanctitie, by whom miracles were wrought, kept the Feast according as he then did, from whose imitation he durst not digresse.

Colman.

Your Fathers, which you pretend to follow, how holy soever they be (said Wilfrid) and what miracles soever they have wrought, yet this I answer, That in the day of iudgement many shall say unto Christ, that they have prophecied, cast out divels, and wrought miracles in his name, to whom our Lord will answer, I know you not. And if your Father Columba (yea and our Father, if he be the true servant of Christ) were holy and mighty in miracles, yet can he by no meanes be preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, unto whom our Lord said, Thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevaile against it, and to thee will I give the keyes of the Kingdome of Heaven. Thus said, the King asked Colman, whether our Lord indeed spake thus unto Peter, who answered. He did. But, Can you (said he) give evidence of so speciall authoritie granted to your Father Columba? The Bishop said, No. Then (quoth the King) doe you both agree confidently, that these words were principally spoken unto Peter, and that unto him the keyes of the Kingdome of Heaven were given? They all answered, It is most certaine. Whereupon the King concluded this great controversie, and said, Then will not I gainesay such a Porter as this is, but as farre as I know, and am able, I will covet in all points to obey his ordinance, lest perhaps when I come to the Doores of Heaven, I find none to open unto mee, having his displeasure, which is so cleerely prooved to beare the keyes thereof.

Wilfrid.

Matth. 7.

Matth. 16.

And with this so simple a collection of King Oswy, concluded this long and great contention for the celebration of Easter; which here, as borne before the time, time, I have inserted, to continue the narration thereof together, and to avoyde repetition of the same things, which I seeke purposely to shunne; and so returne againe to King Ethelbert.

The Synode mildly dismissed by King Oswy.

(13) Who now became an instrument himselfe for the conversion of his Nation the Saxons. The first fruits of his intendments were wrought upon Sebert King of the East-Angles, his own sisters son, whom not only he converted to Christianity, but therein assisted him in the building of the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul for Miletus his Bishop; as also the Church of S. Peters on the West of London then called Thorny, with the assistance of a London Citizen, as some have said; and himselfe at Rochester built the Cathedrall Church there which he dedicated to the Apostle Saint Andrew.

Will. Malmesb. viri. Thorne. Register. Cant.

(14) This noble King having a care for them that should come after, brought the lawes of his Country into their owne mother tongue, and left nothing unattempted, that might advance the glorious Gospell of Christ, or with honour adorne his owne temporall raigne; and is worthily an example to all succeeding Princes, in all true piety and heroicall parts of a true Christian King. Hee dyed the foure and twentieth day of February, in the yeere of our Lord God fixe hundred and sixteene, being the one and twentieth of his Christianity, the three and twentieth of his Monarchy, and the fifty fixth of his Kingdome of Kent, and was buried at Canterbury in the Church of Saint Peter and Paul, afterwards called Saint Augustines, in the Chappell of Saint Martines.

His Wives.

(15) His first wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperike King of France, as we have said, who was the sonne of King Clotayre, the sonne of Clodone, the first Christian King of that Country. She deceased before the King her husband, and was buried in the Church of Saint Peter and Paul at Canterbury, within the Chappell of Saint Martines there.

(16) He had a second wife, whose name is not recorded by any Writer, being, as is thought, unworthy of remembrance, because of the unnaturall contract and marriage of Edbald her husbands sonne; a sinne that both law and religion doe condemne: and lastly by her converted husband was forsaken, without either note of her issue or death.

His issue.

(17) The issue of King Ethelbert by Queene Berta were Edbald that succeeded him in the Kentish Kingdome, Ethelburge, and Edburge two daughters.

(18) Ethelburge, the elder, was a Lady of passing beauty and piety, and surnamed Tace, who greatly desired and intended a Virgins life; had not her mind beene averted by the intreaty of her brother, the perswasions of Bishop Paulinus, and the earnest suit of Edwine King of Northumberland; unto which Edwine lastly, she yeelded to be his wife in hope of his conversion, and unto whom for that purpose Pope Boniface directed his Epistle from Rome, earnestly exhorting her that she should be diligent for the Kings salvation: which shee soone after effected, to the great joy of both the Kings; and to the comfort and increase of the Christian Faith thorowout England.

Who sent her a looking glasse and an ivory combe, which my kinde hearts keene, in Sir Thomas Cottons Library. Beda hist. lib. 2. cap. 11. Copgrave.

(19) Edberge, another daughter of King Ethelbert, is warranted onely by the testimony of Iohn Capgrave, a great traveller in Antiquities, and should bee most skilfull in his owne County of Kent: notwithstanding he is to be suspected in this, that he reporteth her to have beene a Nunne in the Monastery of Minster in the Ile of Thanet, under the Foundresse Domneve: being the daughter of her nephew Ermenred, and that shee succeeded in the government of that house, Mildred the daughter of the same Domneve. Hee reporteth also, that shee dyed and was buried in the same place, and that her body was from thence mooved by the Arch-bishop Lankfranke, to his Church of Saint George in Canterbury.

Redwald.

REDVWALD THE THIRD KING OF THE EAST-ANGLES, AND SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS WIFE AND ISSVE.

Monarch. 7.

Chapter. XIX.

An. Dom. 616.

REdwald, the sonne of Titulus, and the third King of the East-Angles, had beene a substiture under Ethelbert King of Kent, and served a long time as his Vice-roy over all his dominions, whereby he gained such reputation to himselfe, that either for his owne valour, or Edbalds vices, (contemned of the people for his Apostacy, frenzie, and incestuous bed) became the seventh Monarch of the Englishmen, about the yeere of Christ his Incarnation fixe hundred and sixteene; and the twentieth and fourth of his raigne over the East-Angles.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 15.

(2) This Redwald (saith Beda) had received Baptisme

tisme in Kent, but in vaine, and without zeale, as it afterwards appeared. For returning to his Country, through the perswasion of his wife, returned againe to his superstitious worships; and in one and the same Temple, after the manner of the old Samaritans, he erected an Altar for the service of Christ, and another little Altar for burnt sacrifices to his Idols, which stood unto the dayes of Beda himselfe. But as she was an instigator to the East-Saxons idolatry, so was shee an instrument to the further spreading of Christianity (though not by her so purposely meant) in saving the life of Edwine, who afterwards planted the Gospell in all the North parts of the Saxons government.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 12.

(3) For Edwine flying the rage of wilde Ethelfrid was succoured and maintained in the Court of King Redwald, unto whom lastly, the Northumbrian sent both threats and rewards to have him delivered, or else put to death; And surely had not the Queene stood for his life, he had presently dyed. But she alleaging the law of humanity, the trust of a friend, and the royalty of a Prince, prevailed so farre, that Redwald did not onely save his life, but assisted him in battell, to the destruction of his enemy, and the gaining of Northumberlands Crowne. For upon the returne of Ethelfrids Ambassadors, unto whom Redwald yeelded not to make Edwin away, he with his power of the East-Angles were at their backes, and as an enemy made towards Northumberland.

Hen. Hunting.

(4) Ethelfrid, whose rage and revenge was ready enough upon lesser occasions, with such sudden preparation as he was able to make, met the East-Angles almost at Notingham, and that not farre from the River Idle, where boldly encountring his unequall enemy, at the first brunt slew Reynhere the sonne of King Redwald, to the great griefe of him and his whole host: whose revenge was so violently sought, that they slew King Ethelfrid in the Field, and established Edwine to be his successor; which was the second yeere of Redwalds Monarchy.

Redwald his raigne.

(5) Wherein he raigned the space of eight yeeres, and was King of the East-Angels thirty one, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord five hundred twenty foure: the eighth of Edbalds King of Kent: the thirteenth of Kingils King of the West-Saxons, and the eighth of Edwines over the Northumbrians.

His Wife.

(6) The Queene and wife of this King is not named by any of our Writers, but that shee had beene the widow of a Nobleman, descended of the Blood-Royall of that Nation, and was a Lady that had deserved great commendations for the many vertues by her possessed, had she beene a Christian, or a favorer of the Christians, or had not beene an utter enemy to their faith. Notwithstanding by her first husband she had a sonne named Sigebert, that prooved a learned and most religious Prince, of whom we have spoken in Chapter eleventh.

Sigeberts good parts.

His issue.

(7) His issue were Reynhere and Erpenwald. Reynhere the elder, and Prince of the East-Angles, was slaine as you have heard, in the battell that his father fought against wilde Ethelfrid, neere unto the River Idle in Notingham-shire.

(8) Erpenwald the younger succeeded his Father Redwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and was the fourth King of that Nation, whose life and raigne we have declared in the succession of the East-Angles Kings: Chapter 11.

Edwine.

EDVVINE THE GREAT KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE EIGHTH SOLE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

Monarch. 8.

CHAPTER. XX.

An. Dom. 617.

HIS Monarchy reverted from the East-Angles, was next possessed by the Northumbrians, wherein it was held with greater glory and for longer time. For Edwine in King Redwalds life growne very porent, after his death became his successor in the English Monarchy, and most worthily did adorne the same by his civill justice and divine piety: his exile, visions and obtaining of the Northumbrian Crowne, wee have already spoken of, and therefore without repetition will passe on to his end.

An. Dom. 624.

(2) This Edwine, the sonne of great Ella, the first King of the Deirians, was the third King that possessed the same, the eighth of Bernicia, the second (and first Christian) King of all Northumberland, at the age of twenty three, and in the yeere of Christ five hundred twenty foure, succeeded Redwald in the Monarchy, and was the greatest King of all the Saxons. For as Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 9.

Invites.

(as Beda saith) he subdued all the coasts of Britannie wheresoever any Provinces were inhabited, either of English or of Saxons, which thing no King of the English before him had done; and added the * Mevian Iles unto his owne Dominions. The first of them, next the South, was large and fertile, affording roome for nine hundred and sixty of his English Families, and the second, gave ground for above three hundred Tenements.

(3) His first wife dead, he became suiter for Lady Ethelburg, daughter to Ethelbert King of Kent, deceased, and sister to King Eadbald then raigning: whose Ambassadours were answered, that it was not lawfull for a Christian Virgin to be espoused to a Pagan, lest the faith and sacraments of the heavenly King should be prophaned, by the matching with that earthly King, which knew not to worship God aright. But Edwine hearing of the Virgins beauty, integrity, and piety, was so farre overgone and ravished there with, that hee condescended, shee should with her place retain her owne Christian Profession, and enjoy the Christian society both of her men, women, Priests, and servants her attendants in his Court. These covenants thus confirmed, the Lady accompanied with Paulinus the reverend Bishop, and an honourable retinue, all of them Christians, came to King Edwins Court, and with great joy shee was espoused his Queene.

Ethelburgs good parts.

(4) The greatnesse and prosperity of this Northumbrian King, was both feared by them afarre of, that raigned in no such power; and beheld by his neerer, with an envious eye: among whom, Quinchelme that raigned with his father king over the West-Saxons, sent a desperate Ruffin, whose name was Eumerus, to murder Edwin the next yeere of his mariage; who repairing to his Court, then resident neere the river Dervent, at the place that is now called Aldelbyin York-shire, with a double-edged short sword, the point thereof poisoned, and girt under his garment, upon Easter day entred his Palace, as an Ambassadour, and with crafty speech retained the Kings attention; where getting occasion, and stepping forward, drew his sword which one Lilla the Kings servant saw, and wanting wherewith to defend his person, put himselfe betwixt the King and the sword: and thorow his body so slaine, the same was so farre runne, that it dangerously wounded the King with his point, and with the same sword, before he could be beaten down by the Guard, slew another servant, whose name was Fordhere.

A conspiracie.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 9.

(5) It happened the same night, being holy Easter Sunday, that Queene Ethelburg was brought to bed of a daughter: for joy whereof, and her safe deliverance, the King gave thankes to his Idols; which Bishop Paulinus, then in presence, greatly reproved, and bade Edwin to give thankes unto God, from whom onely all goodnesse came; and spake unto him of our new birth in Christ: at which conference the King much rejoyced, and promised that he would ever after renounce all his Idols, and worship that Christ whom he preached, if that God should grant him his life, and give him victory against that King, who had sent this Manqueller to murder him; in pledge wherof, he assigned Paulinus to baptize his daughter, the which upon Whitsunday following was performed in her, by the name of Eanfled, and shee the first of the Northumbrians which received that sacrament. At which time also, Edwin being recovered of his wound so lately received, made an Army, and marched forth against the West-Saxons, and in battle either slew or took prisoners all them that had conspired his death, and as a victorious Conquerour, returned to his Country.

Bishop Paulinus.

(6) Where continuing in honour, and his affaires prospering to his owne desires, hee was yet in minde distracted, and his thoughts continually perplexed, what God hee should worship. The sanctity of the Christians moved him much, and the ancient customes of his Ancestours sate neere his heart, betwixt whom there seemed a combare in himselfe. And in these dumps sitting one day alone, it chanced Bishop Paulinus to have accesse to his presence, where laying his right hand upon the Kings head, demanded of him whether he remembred that signe: whereat Edwine suddenly fell at the Bishops feete, whom he in haste, and reverence presently lifted up, and spake unto him as followeth,

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 12.

Behold O Soveraigne (saith he) by the bountifull hand and power of our God, you have escaped the hand and vengeance of our most hated and dreadfull enemie. Behold also, by his most gracious goodnesse you have obtained the soveraignitie of raigne and rule of the Kingdome. Remember now therefore the third thing which you promised him, and deferre no longer to accomplish the same by receiving his faith, and keeping his commandements, who hath delivered you from your temporall adversities, and exalted you to the honour and Majesty of a King; whose holy will if you hereafter obey, and doe his precept which by me is preached; he will also deliver you from the perpetuall torment of Hell, and make you partaker with him in his heavenly Kingdome, and eternall blisse without end.

Edwine put in mind of covenants.

(7) Whereupon conferring with his Councell, whereof Bishop Coyfi was chiefe, for the establishing of the Gospell, and suppressing of Idolatry, it was then concluded, that the true God, should be worshipped, and the Altars of their wonted Idols overthrowne: unto which action, Coyfi himselfe became the first man; for mounted on horseback in armour, with a girt sword and launce in his hand (all which was unlawfull for those Idoll-Priests) hee brake downe their Altars, Grates, and Barres, and destroyed their Temples wheresoever he came. Some ruines thereof not farre from Yorke, and neere unto the rising of the river Dervent, remained to be seen unto the dayes of Beda, and were then called Gotmond in Goham. And king Edwine himselfe, with all his Nobility, and most of the Commons, received the laver of Baptisme, the eleventh yeere of his raigne, and of Christs Incarnation six hundred twenty and seven, one hundred and eighty yeeres after the Saxons entrance into Britaine. The king was baptized the twelfth of Aprill, being Easter Sunday, at the City Yorke, in the Church of S. Peters, built then of wood, and was the Kings Oratory, which hee enclosed about with a deepe foundation; and laying the walles with squared stones, made it the Cathedrall Church, and his Converter Paulinus Archbishop of that See.

Idolatry abolished.

Beda hist. Angl. cap. 13.

(8) The Gospell thus established in these Northerne parts, spread dayly further into other Provinces, and with such fruit of peace, that in the raigne of this Edwin, and thorowout his Dominions, a weake woman with her new-borne babe might have passed without dammage or danger over all the Iland, and from Sea to Sea. And so much did the King tender his Subjects, that his provident care was extended to the way-faring passengers, for whose use he enclosed cleere Springs by the wayes, where hee set great Basons of brasse, both to wash and to bathe in; which either for love or displeasure of the King, no man defaced, or tooke away.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 16.

And so great was the magnificence of this Monarch, that (according to Bede) he had not onely in Battle the Ensignes proper to battle borne before him, but in his ordinary passages thorow the Cities and Townes of his kingdome, there alwayes went an Ensigne-bearer before him. And (to use the words of the same venerable Author) he went not in any street, in which there was not borne before him that kinde of Standard which the Romans called Tufa, and the English Thuuf. That the Romans had such an Ensigne, as that which here is called Tufa, Iustus Lipsius in his Commentary upon that place in Vegetius (lib. 3. cap. 5.) where the several Ensignes of the Romans are recited, doth declare, correcting that place of Vegetius (where Rufa was set for Tufa) by this place of Bede, and in the same shewing, that Tufa signified a Ball, as the Ball (by the example of Augustus) was an Ensigne of Monarchy, or absolute government.

Tufa the Romans Ensigne.

Iustus Lipsius.

(9) But as the Sunne hath his rising, his height and descent, and ever is mooving in the circle of his celestiall orbe; so man hath his birth time, being, and death, and till then is never stayed in one certaine point. Kings therefore, as they be Kings, are the Suns of their owne world, but as they are men, goe to the shadow of death: neither can the strength of their power, wisedome, or policie, love or applause, stay the hand heere that holds the fatall knife; for so in this King Edwin we see, raised above hope to attaine the Diademe, and ruling in love and liking of the people, was notwithstanding cut off in the midst of his glory and greatnesse of strength.

(10) For Penda the stout Mercian, envying his peace, and Cadwallo the Britaine seeking to receive his right, joyned in friendship against this Monarch, and met him as his enemies in the face of a Field. The plaine was large, and called Hethfield, where after a long and most bloudy fight, King Edwin was slaine, with Prince Offryd his sonne, his whole Host put to the sword, or most shamefull flight: which chanced the fourth of October, the yeere of our Lord six hundred thirty three, the sixth of his Christianity, the seventh of his Monarchie, the seventeenth of his Kingdome, and the forty seventh of his age. His body was lastly buried in S. Peters Church at Streanshall, after called Whitby.

His Wives.

(11) Quenburge his first wife, was the daughter (as Beda reporteth) of Ceorle, but as all other Writers doe witnesse, of Crida King of Mercia. Shee was married unto him in the beginning of his youth, (and when he was dispossessed of his inheritace by the Tyrant Ethelfrid, as we have said:) with him shee lived a great part of his banishment, and in the Court of Redwald King of the East-Angles deceased, before her husband could recover his Kingdome.

(12) Ethelburg, surnamed * Tate, was the second wife of this King, who was the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, and of Queene Berta his first wife. Shee was married unto him in the yeere of grace six hundred twenty five, being the second of his Monarchy, and was his wife six yeeres: but surviving him, and desirous to live a religious life, shee returning into Kent, withdrew her selfe to a place not farre from the Sea-side, called Lymming, wherein shee built a Monasterie of Nunnes, and among them spent the rest of her life, and therein dyed, and was there buried.

*Tate.

His Issue.

(13) Offride, the eldest sonne of King Edwine, and Quenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile among the East-Angles. He was baptized in the faith of Christ by Paulinus the first Archbishop of Yorke, and was slaine the same day, and in the same battell that his father was. He had a sonne named Iffy, who was baptized also by Bishop Paulinus; and after the death of his Father and grand-father, for feare of King Oswald, was conveied over the Seas into France, to bee brought up in the Court of King Dagobert, where he died in his childhood, and was there honorably interred.

(14) Edfrid, the second sonne of King Edwine and Lady Quenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile, and baptized with his brother Offrid by Bishop Paulinus. After his Fathers death, for feare of King Oswald, hee fled to Penda King of Mercia, who was his fathers enemy, and his mothers kinsman; by whom he was most treacherously murthered. He left behind him a son named Heverik, who by his wife Berefwith had issue the vertuous and learned Lady Hilda, Abbesse of Streanshalch: and Queene Herefwith her sister, the wife of Ethelhere King of the East-Angles, brother to King Anna, by whom shee had issue Aldwolfe, Elfwold, and Botorne, all three succeeding Kings of the East-Angles.

(15) Ethelme, the third sonne of King Edwine, and the first of Queen Ethelburg his second wife, was baptized by Paulinus Archbishop of Yorke, not long after his father and halfe-brethren; but in short space after his baptisme, hee departed out of this world, even in the time that he wore the white attire, which in those dayes was used to be worne by such as were newly baptized for a certaine space. His body was with all due funerall obsequies enterred within the new Church of S. Peter in the City of Yorke, which his father had newly founded.

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 25.

(16) Vsfrea, the fourth sonne of King Edwine, and the second of Queene Ethelburg his second wife, and the last and youngest of them both, bare the name of his fathers great grand-father. He was baptized by the Archbishop Paulinus at one time with his brother Ethelme. After the decease of his father, his mother carried him with her out of Northumberland into Kent, and from thence conveyed him over into France with his Nephew Iffy, the sonne of his halfe-brother Offrid; where hee continued in the custody of King Dagobert, being his mothers cosen-german, and there died, and was honourably buried in a Church with his Nephew Iffy.

(17) Eanfled, the elder daughter of King Edwine, and Queene Ethelburg his second wife, was borne the night following that her father was wounded, and baptized, he being a Pagan. Shee was afterwards married to Osiw, the fourth King of Northumberland, and tenth Monarch of the Englishmen, as shall bee said,

(18) Etheldrid the younger daughter, the fifth and last-borne child to King Edwine and of Queene Ethelburg, was baptized at the same time with Ethelme and Vsfrea her brethren. Shee died an infant, the white clothing not yet put off, which in those dayes was usually worne at certaine set times after their baptisme, and was with like funerall obsequies buried by her brother Ethelme in the Church of S. Peters in Yorke, which their father had founded.

OSVVALD

Oswald.

OSVVALD KING OF NORTHVM. BERLAND, AND THE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIFE, AND ISSVE.

Monarch. 9.

Chapter. XXI.

An. Dom. 634.

Oswald, the fifth King of Deira, the ninth of Bernicia, the third of Northumberland, and the ninth Monarch of the Englishmen, began his raigne the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred thirty foure. He with Eanfrith and his brethren, the sons of wilde Ethelfrid, and Osrik also the sonne of Alfrid King Edwins Vncle, had been secured in Scotland all his raigne, and among the Red-shankes lived as banished men, where they learned the true Religion of Christ, and had received the Laver of Baptisme. But Edwines death wrought and divulged, these Princes returne to their Countrey, and the Northumbrians kingdome lately governed by one, was now again divided into two severall parts, as formerly it had been.

(2) Over the Deirans, Osrik was made King, and of Bernicia, Eanfrid assumed the raigne; but Gods justice overtaking their Apostasie, neither their lives nor this division lasted long. For Cadwall the Christian, and Penda the Pagan, were Gods instruments, that with worthy vengeance in the first yeere of their government, cut the one off in battell, and the other by trechery; whose names and yeares of raigne as unhappy and of hatefull remembrance, the Historiographers of those times would have to be omitted.

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(3) But Religious Oswald lamenting the effusion of his Countries blood, long slept not their revenge. For assembling his power, which was not great, hee suddenly and unlooked for came upon Cadwallo, and at Denisburne pitched downe his Tents. The place (saith Beda) stood neere the wall that Severus had made, where Oswald for the first day forbare to fight, and among his Souldiers for his Standard set up a Crosse of wood; whereunto it seeming those dawning daies of Christianity were overmuch addicted. Here Oswald making first intercession to God, the onely preserver of his people, in sore and long fight obtained great victory, with the slaughter of Cadwallo, and of all his British Armies: which so accomplished many have attributed the vertue of the Crosse to be no small cause of that great overthrow. This Crosse so set up, was the first we reade of to have beene erected in England, and the first Altar unto Christ among the Bernicians, whose pretended miraculous cures, not onely in the wood it selfe, but in the mosse, and in the earth wherein it was set, let Beda report them, and Stapleton urge them, yet for my part, I hold them no Article of our Canonicall Creed.

(4) But certaine it is, that Oswald himselfe was a most religious and godly King, and tooke such care for the conversion and salvation of his subjects, that he sent into Scotland for Aidan a Christian Bishop, to instruct his Northumbrians in the Gospell of Truth. And whereas the Bishop could not speake their language, the King himselfe was Interpreter at his Sermons, and gave his words in the English, as he spake and pronounced them in the Scotish; which language Oswald perfectly spake, having beene there the space of eighteene yeares.

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 3.

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 3.

Thus the godly proceedings of the King and Bishop, produced such increase of their heavenly seed, that it is reported in seven dayes space, fifteene thousand Christians received Baptisme; & many of them forsaking the pleasures of the world, to have betooke themselves to a religious and solitary life.

(5) At this time the whole Iland flourished both with peace and plenty, and acknowledged their subjection unto King Oswald. For, as Beda reporteth, all the Nations of Britanie which spake foure languages, that is to say, Britaines, Redshankes, Scots, and Englishmen, became subject unto him, and yet being advanced to so royall Majestie, he was notwithstanding (which is marvellous to be reported) lowly to all, gracious to the poore, & bountifull to Strangers. The fruits whereof the same Authour exemplifieth in his bounty and humility towards the poore; who upon a ſolemne feaſt day, ſeeing many ſuch at his gates, ſent thē both the delicares for himſelfe prepared, and commanded the charger of ſilver to be broken, and divided among them. The Biſhop much rejoycing thereat, tooke the king by the right hand, and prayed that it might never conſume; as after his death it did not, but was ſhrined in ſilver, & in S. Peters Church at Bebba, now Bamborough, with worthy honour was worſhipped for the many miracles and cures that it did, as likewiſe the earth wherein his bloud was ſpilt: with ſuch laviſh enlargements have thoſe Writers enterlined the deeds of Gods Saints.

(6) But as the Sunne hath his ſhadow, and the higheſt Tide her ebbe, ſo Oſwald, how holy ſoever, or government how good, had emulators that fought his life, and his Countries ruine: for wicked Penda the Pagan Mercian, envying the greatneſſe that King Oſwald bare, raiſed warres againſt him, and at a place then called Maſerfield in Shropſhire, in a bloudy and ſore fought battell ſlew him; and not therewith ſatiſfied, in barbarous and brutiſh immanity, did teare him in peeces, the firſt day of Auguſt, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, ſixe hundred forty two, being the ninth of his raigne, and the thirty eight of his age; whereupon the ſaid place of his death is called to this day Oſwaldſtree, a faire Market Towne in the ſame Countie.

Oſwy. Monarch. 10.

OSVVY KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE TENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND CHILDREN.

CHAPTER. XXII.

An. Dom. 643.

OSwye, the illegitimate ſonne of King Ethelfrid, ſurnamed the Wilde, at thirty yeares of age ſucceeded Oſwald, his halfe brother in his Dominions, being the fourth King of Northumberland, and the tenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, entring his government the thirteene day of October, and yeare of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred forty three. His firſt beginnings were much diſquieted by Penda the Heathen Mercian, by the rebellions of his baſe ſonne Alkfrid, and by the oppoſitions of Ethelwald the ſon of King Oſwald: but none fate more neere his heart then Oſwin King of the Deirians did, whoſe vertuous government did much darken (as he tooke it) his own and the free love of thoſe ſubjects, daily to leſſen his, among the Bernicians.

(2) This Oſwin of Deira was the ſonne of Oſricke (who

(who did apoſtate from his faith) and ruling his Province in plenty and peace the ſpace of ſeven yeeres, was there fore greatly envied by Oſwy of Bernicia, and laſtly by him provoked into the field. Their hoſts met at the place then called Willfares Downe, ten miles Weſt from the village Cataracton, and there attended to hazard the day. But Oſwyn finding himſelfe too weake for Oſwy, alſo to ſave the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, forſooke the field; accompanied onely with one Souldier, and went to Earle Hunwald his friend as he thought to ſecure his life. But contrary to truſt, he delivered him unto King Oſwy, who cruelly ſlew him the twentieth of Auguſt, and ninth of his raigne, at the place called Ingethling; where afterwards for ſatisfaction of ſo hainous an offence, a Monaſtery was built, as upon like occaſions, many the like foundations were laid; whoſe ſtones were thus joyned with the morter of blood.

(3) Of this Oſwine thus ſtaine, Beda reporteth the Story following: Among his other rare vertues and princely qualities, his humilitie (ſaith he) and paſſing lowlineſſe excelled: whereof he thus exemplifieth: The reverend Chriſtian Biſhop Aidan uſing much travel to preach the Goſpell throughout that Province, the king for his more eaſe, gave him a goodly Gelding with rich and coſtly trapping. It chanced one day, as the Biſhop rode to miniſter the word of Life, that a poore man demanded his almes: but he not having wherewith to releeve him, and pitying his diſtreſſed poore eſtate, preſently alighted, and gave unto him his horſe and rich furniture; whereof when the king heard he blamed him, and ſaid, What meant you (my Lord) to give to the begger the horſe that I gave you, with my ſaddle and trapping? Had we horſes of no lower price to geve away to the poore? To whom the Biſhop replied, And is the brood of a beaſt dearer in your ſight, then this poore man the child of God? The King thus reproved, turned himſelfe towards the fire, and there ſadly pauſing upon this anſwer, preſently gave from him his ſword, and in haſt fell at the Biſhops feet, deſiring forgiveneſſe in that hee had ſaid. The Biſhop much aſtonied, ſuddenly lift up the King, deſiring him to ſit to meat, and to be merry; which the King immediately did, but the Biſhop contrariwiſe began to be penſive and ſad, and the teares to tricle downe his cheekes: in which paſſion he burſt out into theſe ſpeeches, and ſaid to his Chaplaine in an unknowne tongue, I never till this time have ſeene an humble King; and ſurely his life cannot be long, for this people are not worthy to have ſuch a Prince to governe them. But to returne to King Oſwy.

(5) The Army of this enemy is reported to redouble thirty times his, all well appointed and old tried ſouldiers: againſt whom Oſwy with his ſonne Alkfryd boldly marched, Egfryd his other ſonne then being an hoſtage with Cimwiſe an under Queene of the Mercians: Ethelwald the ſonne of Oſwald, tooke part with Penda, againſt his naturall Vncle and native Country: ſo did Ethelherd the brother of Chriſtian Anna, ſide with this heathenish and cruell Mercian.

Chapter. XXIV.

An. Dom. 675.

Thelred, the third sonne of King Penda, and brother to the last deceased Vulfhere, in the yeare of Christ Iesus, six hundred seventy five, began his raign in the Kingdome of Mercia, and at the same time in the Monarchy of Englishmen, being the seventh King among them that wore their Diademe, and the twelfth person that bare the Imperiall Title of the whole: his claime was not immediately, nor next in succession, young Kenred his Nephew standing betwixt him and the Crowne. But himselfe a childe in yeares, and in them also addicted unto a private life, hee gave his Vncle way to undergoe so publike a charge which without contradiction was likewise accepted of the subjects.

Circumstances belonging to the beginning of his raigne.

(2) His entrance was with warre against the Kentish Lothair, whose country he destroyed, sparing neither Churches nor religious Abbeyes, the king not daring daring to appeare in field. The City Rochester felt also his fury, whose Citizens were ransacked, their buildings ruinated, and their Bishop Putta driven to such distresse, that he became a Teacher of good Arts and Musicke in Mercia, to maintaine his aged yeares from the necessity of perishing want. These stirres (saith Beda) happened in the yeare of grace sixe hundred seventy seven; and the next following, so fearefull a Blazing starre, as was wonderfull to behold, first discovered in the moneth of August, and for three moneths together continued rising in the morning, and giving forth a blazing pile very high, and of a glittering flame.

Beda hist. Angl. lib.4. cap.12. A blazing star.

(3) The remorse of conscience for the bloud hee had spilt, and the places of Oratories by him destroyed, (besides his intrusions into another mans right) strucke so deepe a wound into King Ethelreds breast, that ever hee bethought him what recompence to make. First therefore building a goodly Monastery at Bradney, and that most fruitfully seated in the County of Lincolne, he thought that not sufficient to wash away the scarres of his foule offence, but determined in himselfe to forsake the world, for that was the terme attributed to the monasticall life: wherein notwithstanding, in lesse cares they lived, and their persons more safe from all dangers attempted, then when they publikely administred their lawes to their people, the just executions whereof, many times breed the overthrow of their Princes, and their Persons never secure amids their owne guards.

(4) But such was the Religion then taught, and the godly zeale of the good Princes then raigning, whose workes have manifested their vertues to posterities, and faith in Christ the salvation of their soules, in whose Paradise we leave them, and Ethelred to his devout intent: who to reconcile himselfe first unto Kenred, bequeathed the Crowne solely to him, although he had a sonne capable thereof: then putting on the habit of religion, became himselfe a Monke, in his owne Monastery of Bradney, where he lived a regular life the terme of twelve yeares, and therein lastly dyed Abbat of the place, when he had raigned thirty yeares, the yeare of Christs Nativity, seven hundred sixteene.

Shee was his wife twentie yeares: and passing thorow the North parts of Mercia, she was set upon and slaine by the people of that Countrey, in revenge of the death of Peada their King, who had long before been murthered by Alkefled his wife, and her halfe sister, as we have said. Kenred the sonne of Vulfhere, because of his minority at his Fathers death was defeated of his Dominions by his Vncle Ethelred, and untill it pleased him to resigne his Crowne, lived a private life, whereunto by nature, he was most inclined. But king Ethelred for the wrongs to him committed, and to redeeme the time that in warre and wealth he had prodigally spent, yeelded the Scepter unto his hand, and set his seeming over-heavie-Crown upon his nephew Kenreds head: who began his raigne at one and the same time, both over the Mercians and Monarchy of the Englishmen, which was the yeare of Christs Incarnation seven hundred and foure.

plation, after the example of his uncle, fought a more private and religious life: and thereupon appointing Chelred his cosen germane to rule in his place, in the fifth yeere of his raigne, abandoned his Kingdome and Country, and departed for Rome, accompanied with Offa King of the East-Saxons, and with Edwine Bishop of Worcester: where both these Kings were made Monkes in the time of Pope Constantine the first, Iustinian the younger then wearing the Imperiall Crowne; and in a Monastery at that City, both these penitent Converts in the Coules and Orders of Monkes, spent the rest of their lives, and therein died and were enterred; this Mercian King Kenred having had neither wife nor child, that I can reade of.

(3) It is not greatly to be wondred at, that in these times to much overshadowed with superstitious zeale the holy acts of men, which no doubt were many, and the habit of Monks, the accounted holy garments of humility, were so meritoriously respected and reputed in the devout hearts of the religious, when by the Clergy (that are accounted the light of the world) in a Councell at Rome held under this Pope Constantine the first, it was decreed and commanded, that carved Images, which neither had action, nor life, nor could save themselves from the stroke of destruction, should bee made to the memoriall of Saints, and should be set up in Churches, with respective adoration, contrary to Gods most expresse Commandement, and condemned for idolatry by the warrant of sacred Scripture.

Chelred, the sonne of King Ethelred, was of sufficient yeeres, and well able to rule, at such time as his father resigned his Scepter unto his Nephew Kenred, had not the pricke of that sinne touched his conscience, which made him to bestow the same as hee did notwithstanding the Crowne being too waighty for Kenred to weare, he as freely againe gave it the sonne, as he had received it of the father before, and relinquished his claime and title thereto.

The appendances of his ingresse into government.

(2) Chelred thus advanced before he it expected, entred his government with great applause of the people, in whose opinions he was held the onely man worthy of their Crowne. For Kent he had forced to buy their peace with money; the Britaines subdued, and had inlarged his confines upon them; and now against Chelred this new risen Monarch, hee meant to try chance, whose glory he looked at with an over envious eye.

Ina King of the west-Saxons.

(4) His greatnesse likewise Chelred suspected, who either to himselfe or successors, (by the foundation which he laid) would divert the monarchy from him and his Mercians, and entaile it to himselfe and his West-Saxons. Hereupon great preparation was made, and each set forward with all their powers, the one to attaine, and the other to keepe, the glory and title that both of them so much thirsted after. At Wodensbury they met, and with undaunted spirits so fought, that the victory was doubtfull, for neither could say the battell was his, or that hee departed with the lesser losse.

Kenwolfe.

KENVVOLFE THE THIRTEENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE EIGHTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Monarch. 18.

Chapter. XXX.

An. Dom. 794.

Kenwolfe, not so neere in blood to King Ethelred, as he was like him in all vertuous conditions, by him was ordained to succeed in his Dominions, whereby hee became the thirteenth King of the Mercians, and the eighteenth Monarch of the Englishmen, in the yeere of our Lord seven hundred ninetie seven. At home hee was an example of pietie, peace, and religion, and set the scale of justice without respect to all alike; abroad, temperate, humble, and courteous, without vaine ostentation or ambitious conceits; in warres hee was stout and victorious; in peace studious to enrich his subjects: briefly, at all times so carrying himselfe, that envy could not touch him with her tongue.

Kenwolfes genius.

(2) Whether upon a new quarrell begun, or the old retained, (as inheritable to the Mercians against those of Kent) I cannot say; but true it is, that in the entrance of his raigne, he entred that Province with a great host of men, and in a fore fought field discomfited the Kentish, and carried away prisoner their King, whose surname was Pren. His kingdome hee gave to Cuthred, and kept him captive in Mercia, to his great griefe, and his subjects dishonour.

Will. Malmesb.

(3) But Kenwolfe in peace, and minding the works of true piety, gave himself to the building of a goodly Church at Winchcomb in Glocestershire, where, upon the day of dedication, in the presence of Cuthred (assigned his Viceroy in Kent,) thirteene Bishops, ten Dukes, many Nobles, and a great concourse of people, he led Pren this Kentish captive to the high Altar, and there without either his entreaty, or ransome for Redemption, released and set him free; shewing thereby his devotion to God, and the heroicall parts of a magnanimous Prince.

Winchcombe Monastery.

(4) His reigne was twenty two yeeres, and death in Anno eight hundred nineteene, being solemnely buried in the Church of the Monastery of Winchcombe aforesaid which himselfe had founded.

Kenwolfes buriall.

His Wife.

(5) Elfryd, the wife of King Kenwolfe, hath not her parentage certainly reported by any of our Historians; yet some later upon a likelihood of her name, the place and time agreeing, having thought her to be the daughter of Offa, affianced to King Ethelbert, as hath beene said: but in these obscurities, conjecture may wander astray.

Elfrids parents unknown.

His Children.

(6) Kenelm the sonne of King Kenwolfe, and of Queene Elfryd his wife, was very yong at his fathers death, and succeeded him in the Mercians kingdome, but not in the Monarchy of the English; King Egbert the West-Saxon King then growne too great. And in the same yeere that he began his reigne, by the Treason of his unnaturall Sister he was murthered, and first obscurely buried, but afterwards solemnly removed and reposed neere to his Father in the Monastery of Winchcombe, as in the Mercian Kings successions we have said.

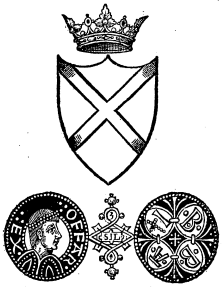
Kenelm beh. chap. 10 follo.

(7) Quendred the eldest daughter of King Kenwolfe, and Lady Elfrid his Queene, after the decease of her father, ambitiously aspiring to compasse the sway of the Mercian Kingdome wholly to her selfe, wickedly conspired the death of her brother King Kenelme, which was traiterously acted by Askebert her instrument, who had the charge of him: but the same turning to her reproch, for very shame of so damnable a deed, shee within short time after ended her life, but not her ignominie.

Quendred the eldest daughter of Kenwolf.

(8) Burgenhild, the younger daughter of King Kenwolfe, and of Queene Elfrid, hath not beene so famous to posteritie as her sister Quendred was for her infamous Act; notwithstanding, shee may reasonably be supposed to have led a better life, and to have dyed a better death; especially of us, who finde her not stained with any aspersion of misdeserving.



Burgenhild the younger daughter.

Offa.

OFFA THE ELEVENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE SIXTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, WIFE, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 16.

Chapter. XXVIII.

An. Dom. 758.

Offa, the cosen of King Ethelbald, after some time of Inter-regnum, succeeded him in his dominions of Mercia; a man of so high stomacke and stoutnesse of mind, that he thought nothing unpossible for him to attaine; and for vertue and vice, so equally composed, that hardly could bee judged to whether of them the scale of his carriage most inclined, although the Monke of Saint Albans and Writer of his life, doth blanch out his graces with superlative praises.

Will. Malmesb. Liber M. S.

(2) His Parents he nameth Twinfreth and Mercella, and himselfe he saith to have beene first named Pinered, borne both lame, deafe, and blind, wherein he so continued unto his mans estate. The rage of Bermed (saith the same Author) had forced all three into a solitary place, where suddenly by miracle Pinered was restored, and for that cause called another Offa; who presently affailed, and in a great battell, manfully fought, slew the usurping Bermed. The Nobles of Mercia being rid of that Tyrant by the valour of Offa, gladly imbraced and received him for their King; who began his raigne with greater shew of glory, then any Mercian before him had done, being in number the eleventh that had raigned in that Province, and is accounted the sixteenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

(3) His neighbour Kings foreseeing whereat his eye glanced, sollicited by Letters Charles the Great then King of France, against him; who wrote unto Offa in their behalfe, and in threatning wise commanded him to desist. But he was so farre from fearing of his threats, that to his contempt he was the more eager.

King Charles the Great.

(4) The first that felt his fury, were the Kentishmen, under Alrike their King, whose overthrow was the lesse dishonorable (saith Malmesbury) for that they were vanquished by so great a Monarch. The place was Otteford, unfortunate to them, where their King was slaine by the hand of Offa himselfe, their forces quite discomfited by the losse of this field, and their Country trodden downe under the feet of the Mercians.

Malmesbury.

(5) From South to North King Offa then marched and beyond Humber made havocke of all that stood against him; whence returning triumphant, hee set upon the West-Saxons, that had formerly joyned with his enemies: the place was Bensington, which Castle King Offa tooke, with the discomfiture of King Kenwolfe, and all his West-Saxons, who sought their revenge by the aydes of the Britaines in Wales. Their King (saith mine Author) was then Marmodius betwixt whom some intercourse by letters passed, and great presents to King Offa sent, onely to protract time, and to worke upon advantage.

Bensington Castle taken by King Offa.

Liber S. Albani, M.S. Marmodius a Welsh King.

(6) In this Interim of complements for a further security, Offa caused a great ditch to be drawne betwixt his and the Britaines borders, which worke began at Basingwarke in Flint-shire, and North Wales, not farre from the mouth of Dee, and ranne along the Mountaines into the South, and ended neere Bristow at the fall of Wye; the tract whereof in many places is yet seene, and is called to this day Clawdh Offa, or Offaes ditch. Marmodius, who openly bare saile to this wind, and seemed to winke at Offaes intents, secretly called a Councell of State, wherein he declared how the Act thus in working, would soone proove the bane of liberty unto their country, and the marke of dishonour to themselves and posterity for ever: therefore his advice was, that by some stratagem it might be staid betime.

Marmodius treachery.

(7) To this his Britaines consented, the truce yet lasting, and the feast of Christs Nativity even then at hand; in the celebration whereof was held the greatest advantage with least suspect, to put themselves in action against it; and secretly working the assistance of their allies the Saxons, both of the South, the West, and the North, upon Saint Stephens day at night, suddainely brake downe the banke of this Fortification, filling up againe a great part of the Ditch, and in the morning most furiously rushed into Offa his Court, putting putting a great number to the sword, who were more intensive and regardfull to the Feast, then to any defence from their cruell and mercilesse swords.

Marmodius vanquished by Offa.

(8) These wrongs King Offa delayed not to requite, first making their hostages his vassals and slaves, and then with a great army entring Wales, in a bloudy and fore-fought battle hee overcame Marmodius and all his associates in the field. Thus then as a Conquerour over all his enemies, triumphantly after ten yeeres warres abroad, returned he to his owne Kingdome, neither puffed with pride, nor suffering his title to be enlarged according to his conquests: yet he was not negligent of regall state, by the report of the Ligger booke of S. Albans, which saith, that in regard of his great prerogative, and not of any pride, he first instituted and commanded, that even in the times of peace also, himselfe and his successors in the Crowne, should, as he passed through any Citie, have Trumpeters going and sounding before them, to shew that the person of the King should breed both feare, and honour, in all which either see him or heare him.

King Charles congratulateth Offa.

(9) Vnto King Charles of France he wrote in excuse of his warres, and desire of his amity; whom Charles againe congratulated with letters of gladnesse, both for his victories, and the Christian piety in his land embraced; desiring of Offa safe conduct for such his subjects, as came to his country in devotion to God, and withall sent to him, (for a present) a Booke of the Decrees of the second Councell of Nice. Which Synodall Booke (to use Roger Hovedens owne words) was sent unto King Charles from Constantinople, Wherein (saith hee) alas for pitty, by the unanimous assertion of three hundred Bishops or more congregated in that Councell, were decreed many things ingregated in that Councell, were decreed many things ingregated in that Councell, were decreed many things inconvenient, yea and quite contrary to the true faith; as is convenient, yea and quite contrary to the true faith; as is most especially the worshipping of images, which the Church most especially the worshipping of images, which the Church most especially the worshipping of images, which the Church of God doth vtterly detest. Against which Booke * Albinus wrote an Epistle, admirably strengthned by the authority of the holy Scriptures, which together with the foresaid Booke himselfe presented in the name of the Princes and Bishops of this land, vnto the foresaid Charles King of France. Such intercourse both for State and Church had this great Offa with that great Charles.

Offaes last warr.

(10) His last warres (according to mine Author) were against the Danes, whom he forced to their ships with the losse as well of their booties, as of many of their lives; and then (saith he) with the spirit of humility, both to recall himselfe from the trace of blood, and to the better establishment of his Kingdomes peace, he joyned in affinity with his neighbor Princes upon whom he bestowed his daughters in marriage.

Offa went to Rome.

(11) And making Egfrid his sonne a King with himselfe, in great devotion went to Rome, where with the like zeale and example of Ina the West-Saxon, he made his Kingdome subject to a Tribure, then called Peter-pence, afterwards Rom-Scot; besides other rich gifts that hee gave to Pope Hadrian for canonizing Albane a Saint: in honour of whom, and in repentance of his sinnes, at his returne (over against Verolanium, in the place then called Holmehurst, where that Protomartyr of Britaine, for the constant profession of Christ, lost his head) Offa built a magnificke Monastery in Anno 795, indowing it with lands and rich revenewes for the maintenance of an hundred Monkes: upon the first gate of entrance in stone standeth cut a Saltier Argent in a field azure, and is assigned by the judicious in Heraldry to bee the Armes that he bare.

His repentance.

(12) Also in Testimony of his repentance for the bloud he had spilt, he gave the tenth part of all his goods unto the Churchmen, and unto the poore. At Bathe hee also built another Monastery, and in Warwickeshire a Church, where the adjoyning Towne, from it and him beareth the name Off-Church.

Off-ley Towne.

(13) Finally, when hee had raigned thirty nine yeeres, he dyed in peace at his Towne Off-ley the nine and twentieth of July, the yeere of Christ Iesus, seven hundred ninety foure: and with great solemnity his body was buried without the Towne of Bedford in a Chapell standing upon the Banke of Ouse, which long since was swallowed up by the same river: whose Tombe of lead (as it were some phantasticall thing) appeareth often (saith Rouse) to them that seeke it not, but to them that seeke it, is altogether invisible.

His issue.

(14) Quendrid the wife of King Offa hath not her parentage set downe by any of our Writers: notwithstanding, the recorder of this his life, saith that her name was Drida, and that she was the Kinswoman to Charles the Great King of France, and by him for some offence banished his Realme, who arriving upon the coasts of England in a ship without Tackle, was taken thence, and relieved by Offa, being then a young Nobleman, where shee changed her name unto Pretronilla, with whom hee fell so farre in love that hee made her his wife, contrary to the liking of his parents. She was a woman of condition ambitious, covetous, and cruell, as appeared specially in the death of Ethelbert, King of the East-Angles, that came to her husbands Court to marry their daughter; whose port shee so much envyed, that she procured him to bee treacherously murdered: the manner the foresaid Author declared to be by his fall into a deepe pit, purposely made in his bed-chamber and under his chaire of estate. That his head was cut off, and found by a blind-man; that the Well which beares his name sprung up presently in the place where it lay, that the bloud thereof gave the blinde man his sight, and that Dryda dyed in the same pit which shee had digged for Ethelbert, I leave to the credit of my Author, and the liking of my Reader: but certaine it is that Gods vengeance followed this heynous fact within one yeare after the same was committed, by the death of her selfe, her husband, and her sonne, and the translation of that Kingdome from the Mercians to the West-Saxons.

(15) Egfrid the onely sonne, and heire apparant of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was the onely joy and pride of his parents, who succeeded his Father in his dominions and title, and in the same yeare also in the shades of death.

Egfrid the onely son of Offa.

(16) Ethelburga, the eldest daughter of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was married to Brithricke the sixteenth King of the West-Saxons: shee was a Lady of passing beauty, but withall of an insolent disposition, hating all whom her husband loved, and practising the deaths of them that shee hated; Shee departed into France after the poysoning of her husband, and for that her offence, a law was enacted to the great prejudice of the West-Saxons Queenes, as in the raigne of Brithrike we have declared.

Ethelburga the first daughter.

(17) Elfled the second daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, by the report of Randulph Higden the Monke of Chester, was the second wife to Ethelred King of Northumberland; who in regard of her had put from him his former wife, for which his subjects rose in Armes against him, and slew him in the last yeare of King Offa, his raigne.

Chap. 8. Saint. Polychr.

Elfled the second daughter.

(18) Elfrid the third and youngest daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, being promised in marriage, and assured unto Ethelbert King of the East-Angles, after the murther of her hoped Bridegroome with great lamentations, and prophesying threats of revenge, abandoned the society of men, and withdrew herselfe unto the monastery of Croyland in the Fennes, West-Saxons ambition.

Elfrid the third daughter.

Egbert.

EGBERT THE NINETEENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, THE NINETEENTH, BVT FIRST SOLE AND ABSOLVTE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 19.

CHAPTER XXXI.

An. Dom. 800.

THE Saxon Heptarchy drawing now to a period, the spring of an entire Monarchie began to shew it selfe, and the glory of the Englishmen more cleerely to arise: for though they had weakned each other by their owne warres, yet stood their power strong in the possession of the whole, and the over-borne Britaines held still at the worst.

Egbert vnlearned and rebelles.

(2) But such is the dispose of the sole disposer of Empires, that they have their risings, their falls, and their falls: never staying in one and the same point, neither entailed to one and the same Nation, how strong, politicke or populous soever. The proofe whereof is apparant in all the Kingdomes of the earth, and this of ours as mutable as any; whose change of State unto, and in, this Seven-fold Government hath hitherto beene seene: the severall Kings thereof long contending to branch their owne fountaines furthest and fairest, lastly let them fall into one streame, which so meeting, made a more famous influence in this Monarchy, then the seven heads of Nilus, in the Egyptian Sea.

Simon Dunel. lately Rog. Wendo. worst. saith Bed.

(3) Formerly, the Kentish, South-Saxons, East-Angles, Northumbrians, and the Mercians, who through no lesse then eight descents had worne the Emperiall Diademe, whose rayes thone now so bright in the West-Saxons eyes, that they againe sought to re-estate themselves in so glorious a possession. For, whereas Brightrik was possessed and contented with the West-Saxon Crowne, neither that worne without jealousie and feare: yet others of the blood royall from Cherdik raised the wings of their soaring thoughts much higher, among whom Egbert was one, neither the last nor the least in the opinion of the people, or suspect of his Prince.

Iohn Bever.

(4) This Egbert having command of some part of that Province, so carried himselfe, that his fame grew fearefull to Brightrik the King, and hatefull to the envious Ethelburg his most proud Queene, by whom he was enforced first to secure himselfe with the Mercian Offa; and lastly constrained to flie into France: where under Charles the Great, he turned his adverse into an occasion of his valour, by serving in his warres, and learned by his politicke government, how to rule a quiet or disturbed State.

Chap. 5.

(5) But King Brightriks death acted, and his Queene the contriver banished, Egbert is solicited to the wearing of the West-Saxon Crowne, where he became the eighteenth King in number, and nineteene yeeres after the nineteenth Monarch of the Englishmen; entring his reigne the yeere of Christ Iesus, eight hundred, being the same yeere that Charles was made Emperour of the West, and Conwall then ruling over the Scots.

Chap. 5.

(6) His first warres were against the Cornish, and their associats the Welsh, both of them a remnant of the old Britaines, who had beene oftentimes vanquished, but never would seeme to be subdued, and for foureteene yeeres continuance held side against Egbert; which their resistance so provoked his furie that hee enacted a most severe law against them, commanding that no Britaine should presume to passe over great Offaes ditch, and prefent death to them that durst set foot upon any English ground. Their greate Caer-legion (now West-Chester) hee tooke from them, and at London from their West gate cast downe the brasen Image of Cadwallo there set up by the Britaines for a terrour to the Saxons, as wee haue said.

Chap. 5.

(7) His warres thus prospering, his puissance grew dreadfull, and his glory much envied at by the other Princes, whereof Bernulfe of Mercia was the first attempter that sought to pluck the wing of this West-Saxon Eagle, but thereby wrought his owne down-fall; for Egbert joyning battell with him at Ellendon overthrew his power, and in that quarrell Bernulfe was lastly slaine.

Chap. 10. & 11.

(8) Kent was the next, and fairest marke in Egberts

berts eye, whose King not gracious in his owne subjects sight, was the easier to be subdued, him he chased over Thamisis, and added not onely that Countie, but also Suffex and Surrey, for Provinces unto his owne Kingdome: next were the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, and in truth all, that both upon the North, and the South of Humber gave him obedience; so that the bounds of his dominion were greatly enlarged, and his royall authoritie by those severall Kings acknowledged.

(9) Then to confirme his estate he called an assembly unto the Citie Winchester, where causing himselfe to be solemnly crowned, became the first Saxons absolute Monarch of the whole Iland, so reducing the Monarchicall title from the Mercians to the West-Saxons, in whose Progeny it continued without reversement untill the Danes first got, and againe lost it, and the Saxons issue failing, the same fell to the Normans Duke by Conquest, as in continuance of our History, Christ assisting, shall be seene.

(10) His Coronation was at Winchester, and entrance in the yeere of grace, eight hundred and nineteene, at which time by his Edict in that City dated, he caused all the South of the Iland to bee called England, according to the Angles, of whom himselfe came, and promising great felicitie to his State and Successors, was therein not so happy as in his affaires he had beene fortunate.

(11) For those Saxons that by warre and blood, had made themselves Lords of other mens rights, and of one Kingdome no lesse then seven, are now endangered to be made servants unto subjection, and by warre and blood their seven-fold Kingdome brought againe unto one; neither yet freed from the revenge of bloody violence: for that a fierce and cruell nation (the Danes) ceased not continually to invade them, till they had subdued and set the Crowne thereof upon their owne heads, who in King Brightrick dayes, and about the yeere seven hundred eightie seven, having with three vessels landed in the West of England, at three severall times, in so many severall places, sought the ruine of the land in the raigne of this Egbert.

(12) The first was in his thirty third yeere, when with thirtie five ships they landed at Lindisferne upon the North of England, where they were met and fought with at Carham, but with such losse to the English, that two chiefe Captaines, Dudda and Osmond, two Bishops, Herefrid of Winchester, and Vigferd of Shirborne, with many Souldiers were therein slaine, King Egbert himselfe hardly escaping by the covert of the night.

(13) Their second attempt was in the second yeere following, when in West-Wales they landed, unto whom the Britaines there joyned, and at the place called Hengistenton abode the King in Field, where Egbert with prosperous fortune vanquished and slew both the Danes and the Welsh.

(14) The third place of their arrivage was Sheepie in Kent, which Iland they sacked, and with much adoe were expelled in the last of King Egberts raigne, and but the new beginning of their savage cruelties.

(15) This Egbert by Florentius of Worcester is said to be the sonne of Alkemund, who was the sonne of Eafa, and he the sonne of Eoppa, the sonne of Ingils, the brother of Ine, the eleventh King of the West-Saxons, and both of them the sonnes of Kenred, descended from Cherdike the first King of that Province: he was but low of stature, yet well composed and strong of limme, very valiant, wise, and politicke, a skilfull souldier, and as great in minde, as fortunate in warre; he raigned over the West-Saxons the space of thirtie sixe yeeres and seven moneths, and Monarch of the whole Iland seventeene yeeres; his death happened the fourth day of February, and yeere of Christs Incarnation eight hundred thirtie five.

(16) His body was with all obsequies solemnly buried at Winchester, and his bones since taken up, remaine with others in that Cities Cathedrall Church, bestowed in Chests set upon the wall of each side the Quyer, with these verses neither ancient, nor elegant, thereon inscribed:

Hic Rex Egbertus pausat cum Rege Kenulpho,
Nobis egregia munera uterque tulit.

His Wife.

(17) Redburg, the Wife of King Egbert, was the first of the West-Saxons, that by their new made law was deprived of title, authority, or place of a Queene; notwithstanding it seemeth shee bare a great stroke with her husband, in that Iohn Bever the Monke of Westminster reporteth, that shee procured a law to be made against the Britaines; the penalty whereof was present death for any of them to set footing within the Realme of England, or to passe the Ditch that King Offa had made.

His Issue.

(18) Ethelwolfe, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, and Lady Redburg his Wife, was in his childhood committed to the charge of Helmestan Bishop of Winchester, under whom he was carefully trayned up in learning and vertue, who comming to mans estate prooved also a perfect Souldier, and had the leading of his fathers power against Baldred King of Kent, whom he forced to flie over the Thamisis, and to abandon his kingdome, which he subdued to the subjection of his father, and afterwards succeeded him in the Monarchy of the Englishmen.

(19) Ethelstane, the younger sonne of King Egbert, and of the Lady Redburg his wife, was by his father deputed King over the Kentishmen, the South-Saxons, and the East-Saxons after he had brought them unto his subjection; which people he most valiantly defended against the invasions of the Danes, defeating their forces both by Sea and Land, and at Sandwich gave them a most memorable overthrow, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred fiftie one, being the sixteenth of his brother King Ethelwolfes raigne; in whose time he deceased, and is reported to have left a sonne named Osrid, who by reason of his minoritie succeeded not in his fathers dominions; which Ethelbert the second sonne of King Ethelwolfe entred upon, and being Monarch re-united these kingdomes inseparably unto the Monarchy.

(20) Edgith, commonly called Saint Edith the daughter of King Egbert, was in her childhood by her brother Ethelwolfe committed to the charge and bringing up of a Lady in Ireland, greatly renowned for her holinesse of life, named Modewine, by whom she was afterwards recommended to a Disciplesse of the said Lady, named Athea, and made Governesse of a Monastery of the Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had given her, called Pollesworth, situated in Arden in the North verge of the County of Warwicke, wherein she lived, died, and was honourably buried, and the place in regard of her afterwards called Saint Ediths of Pollesworth.

ETHEL-

ETHELVVOLFE THE NINETEENTH
KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN; HIS WARRES, ACTS, WIVES, AND CHILDREN.

CHAPTER. XXXII.

Thelwolfe, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, committed in his youth to the care of Helmestan, Bishop of Winchester, and by him unto Swithun a famous learned Monke of that time, tooke such a liking unto the quiet and solitary life, (onely enjoyed by vertue of Religion, all other estates molested to withstand the intruding Danes) that hee undertooke the Monkish vow and profession, and was made Deacon; shortly after which degree taken, Helmestan dyed, in whose place Prince Ethelwolfe was confecrated, as Roger Hoveden affirmeth, or at least elected, (as Iohn Brampton Abbat of Iarvaux writeth) Bishop of Winchester. But the death of his Father King Egbert immediately following, by great intreaty of the Nobles, and partly by constraint of the Clergie, hee was made King, and was by the authority of Pope Gregory the fourth, (whose creature in both professions he was) absolved and discharged of his vowes.

(2) Hee entered his Monarchy the fourth day of February in the yeere of Christs Incarnation, eight hundred thirty seven, and was the nineteenth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Englishmen. His Bishopricke he gave unto Swithun his Tutor, and according to his place, combined all his powers to withstand the dangerous Danes, that attempted the vtter subversion of his faire land: whose fifth invasion in his first yeere happened; which drew the Saxons civill warres unto a constrained peace, having more then they could well doe to defend their lives from their slaughtering swords, or to save their unjustly gotten land from the spoiles of those common enemies; who, not like Conquerours, but destroying Caterpillers, left nothing undevoured whersoever they came, and had now begunne their mercilesse depopulations in divers places at once, so that the distracted English were to seeke where was most need first to withstand.

(3) At Hampton and Portesmouth many of these Norway Pirates had entred; at Hampton with their overthrow, at Portesmouth with victory; and the same time at Carrum, a Troupe of these Danes discomfited King Ethelwolfes power. The next yeere at Meresware, Lindsey, in East-Angle, and Kent, they did much mischiefe, and harried all the Country before them: yet in his tenth yeare at Pedredesmouth, the Somersets and Dorsetshire men gave them a memorable overthrow, under the conduct of Earle Enwulfe, Bishop Adelstan, and Osred their captaines.

(4) But in the sixteenth yeare of this king, the great Planet Mars seemed to predominate continually, and Fortune to cast the chance of victory ever on his side: for two hundred and fifty ships, (some reckon a hundred more) entred into Thamisis mouth and set on shore an infinite number of these destroying Danes. London and Canterbury they had sacked and left waste, had pierced into Mercia, and chased Berthulfe their king out of his Country, and now in Southery had pitched their battle, as able and resolute to abide all the power of the English; whither king Ethelwolfe with his sonne prince Ethelbald repaired, and tooke the field at the place called Osley; wherein after a long and fore fight, the victory fell to the English, with such slaughter of these Norway invaders, as is incredible to report, and the same held as great and famous, as ever had happened in the land before.

(5) With the like successe his Brother Athelstan king of Kent, fought with the Danes at Sandwich, where chasing them to Sea, tooke nine of their ships; and in Devonshire, Earle Ceorle at Wiclesthore so overthrew their whole power, that in despaire they withdrew themselves into the Ile of Thanet, where they made their abode all the Winter seasons; and if destiny had not withstood the English, the Danes had beene expulsed for ever. But the Saxons, seeming seeming cleared of this common enemy, fell to their wonted quarrells with the ever depressed Britaines, against whom Burthred the Mercian obtained the assistance of King Ethelwolfe in his eighteenth yeare, whose daughter Ethelswith hee had obtained in marriage; whereby for a while was encreased the fame and power of that valiant, but unfortunate King.

Flores Hist. S. Chap. 10. Sect. 20.

(6) In this State the affaires of the land stood unto the nineteenth yeare of King Ethelwolfes raigne, who now remembring his former Ecclesiasticke profession, ordained that tithes and Lands due to holy Church should bee free from all Tributes or Regall services; and in great devotion went himselfe to Rome, where hee was both honourably received, and entertained the space of a whole yere; in which time hee new built the English Schoole that Offa the Mercian before had there founded, and lately was fired, bearing the name of Thomas the Holy; confirming also his Grant of Peter pence, and further covenanting in lieu of his Kind entertainement to pay yeerely three hundred markes to Rome, thus to bee employed; one hundred to Saint Peters Church, an other hundred to Saint Pauls Light, and the third to the Pope: the Bride that evermore must be kissed and largely payd.

Will. Malmsb. Simon Dun.

(7) His returne from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, hee there married Iudith the most beautifull daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperour; in honour of whom in his owne Court, he ever placed her in a Chaire of Estate, with all other majesticall complements of a Queene, contrary to the law of the West-Saxons for Ethelburgaes offence, formerly made. Which his doing so disliked the Nobles, that Prince Ethelbald his eldest Sonne, Adelstan Bishop of Shirborne, and Enwulfe Earle of Somerset rose up rebelliously in Armes and sought to depose him; yet by mediation of friends, the matter came to a comprimize, and the land to be divided betwixt the Father and Sonne, but with such partiality that the better part west-ward was allotted to Ethelbald: which unequality gave great suspition that this revolt was rather grounded upon ambition, then any inclination they had for the defence of their lawes, which commonly is the pretence and vaile for all disloyall attempts of seditious subjects against their soveraigne Lords.

Will. Malmsb.

(8) Howsoever it was, long after this he lived not, but left his Monarchy unto his eldest Sonne Ethelbald: and by will appointed Ethelbert his second, to be King of Kent and Essex, which countries he had conquered. He raigned twenty yeares, one moneth, and nine dayes, and deceased at a place called Stamrige, the thirteenth day of January, in the yeare of our Lord, eight hundred fifty seven, being the twenty one of his raigne. His body was first buried at the place of his decease, and afterwards removed into the Cathedrall Church at Winchester.

Ethelwolfes time of raigning.

His Wives.

Osburgs parentage.

(9) Osburg, the first wife of King Ethelwolfe, was the daughter of a Nobleman named Oslake, who had the Office of Great Butler of England, and was descended of the stocke of Stuffe and Withgar two brethren, being noblemen of the people called Iutes, who were the first Princes of the Ile of Wight, and Nephewes to Cherdike, and cozen-germans to Kenrike, the first and second Kings of the West-Saxons, and the third and fourth Monarches of the Englishmen. She was the second Kings wife that was debarred of the title and place of Queene. Shee deceased three yeares before the King her husband, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Christs Nativity eight hundred fifty and five.

Iudith a second wife.

(10) Iudith his second wife, was the daughter of Charles the Emperour, and King of France, as wee have said: her Mother was Queene Ermentrude, the daughter of Vodon Earle of Orleance. She was a Lady of passing beauty, and married to this King in France, and when she came into England, was received with the Title and place of a Queene, in abolishment of the perverse law of the West-Saxons, made against the Kings Wives, as before was touched. She was his wife three yeares, and survived him without any issue.

Ethelbald the first sonne.

His issue.

(11) Ethelbald, the eldest sonne of King Ethelwolfe and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was brought up in his youth in the exercise of warre, and served under his Father in the great victory obtained against the Danes at Ocley in Surry, in the yeare eight hundred fifty one: afterwards hee turned his force against his Father; and at his returne from Rome, practised to defeat him of his Kingdome, and was ready to have given him battaile, had not his father parted with him his Dominion.

Ethelbert his second sonne.

(12) Ethelbert, the second son of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his first wife, was in the life time of his Father, after the decease of his uncle Ethelstan, appointed and placed his Successor in his Kingdome over the South-Saxon, the Kentish, and the East-Saxons, without any mention or meaning (as it seemeth) that he should intermeddle further with any other part of England. Notwithstanding after the death of his brother Ethelbald, it was generally holden of all men for law, equity, and reason, that he should succeed him in the Monarchy: and so he did, with the consent of his brethren, and without resistance, or contradiction of any other.

Ethelred's third sonne.

(13) Ethelred the third sonne of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his first wife, had by the disposition of his Father in his last will, the one halfe of his Fathers proper inheritance; which was all such land as King Egbert his Grandfather had before hee was King, and was no part of the Demaines of the kingdome; and this was divided betwixt him and his brother Elfred, as the kingdome was betweene their elder Brethren Ethelbald and Ethelbert: with an intent that this Ethelred should succeed his brother Ethelbald in the kingdome of the West-Saxons; notwithstanding, his brother Ethelbert, after the decease of King Ethelbald, entred into the other part, adoyning it to his former kingdome, and was king of the whole, and after left it entire to this Ethelred, who succeeded him in the Monarchy.

Elfrid a faire Queene.

(14) Elfrid the fourth sonne of King Ethelwolfe and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was borne at Wantage in Barkeshire, in the yere of our Lord God, eight hundred forty nine; and the thirteenth of his fathers raigne. Being a child of five yeeres old, he was sent very honorably attended to the City of Rome, where Leo the fourth then Bishop confirmed him, was his Godfather at the confirmation, and anointed him to to the expectation of a kingdome. Growne in yeares, he grew so in discretion, magnanimity and favour of all men, that in the successive raignes of his three elder brethren, hee ruled as a Vice-roy or secondary king under every of them, and after them at the last succeeded in the English Monarchy.

Ethelswida daughter.

(15) Ethelwith, the daughter of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg; was married to Burthred the twentieth king of Mercia, which marriage was solemnized at the towne of Chippingham in Wiltshire, in the moneth of April, and yeare of Christs Nativity eight hundred thirty five, and the fifteenth of her fathers raigne; but within twenty two yeares after, they were both forced by the Danes to abandon their kingdom and departed into Italy, where the King died the same yeare in the English Colledge at Rome: the lived after him fiftreene yeares in the habite of a Nunne, at the City of Padua, and there dyed, and was there honourably buried in the yeare of our Lord God eight hundred eighty nine, which was the eighteenth yeare of her brother King Elfreds raigne.

Neote a stopped sconce.

(16) Neote, supposed by John Capgrave the Legend Writer, to be the sonne of King Ethelwolfe, was in his youth brought up at Glastenbury under Dunstan, who was afterward Archbishop of Canterbury. He proved a man of great learning, and was one of the first Readers of Divinity in the Vniversity of Oxford, at the foun-foundation, or as some will have it, the restauration thereof by King Elfred; hee planted a Monasterie in Cornwall, whereunto hee used for devotion and studious meditations often to withdraw himselfe, which, of his abode there, was afterward called Neotestocke; and when he was dead, his body was with great honor enterred in the County of Huntingdon, at a place then called Anulfesburie, and afterward in regard of his enterment, Saint Neotes, and now Saint Needes.

Sallecter vom.

Ethelbald.

ETHELBALD THE TVVENTIETH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIE ONE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS ACTS, AND RAIGNE.

Monarch 21.

Chapter XXXIII.

An. Dom. 857. Florilegium.

Thelbald, the eldest sonne of King Ethelwolfe, having had part of the Kingdome in the life time of his Father, after his death entred upon the whole, and was the twentieth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentie one Monarch of the Englishmen, beginning his raigne in the yeare of Christs Incarnation eight hundred fifty seven.

His warres against the Danes.

(2) His youth he had spent in the exercise of war, having made proofe of valour in his service against the Danes in many battels; and likewise attempted (though not in so good a cause) to have fought against his own father. Which his affaies, as they seemed violent and unnaturall, yet being in the quarrell of the West-Saxons lawes, enacted in prejudice of their Queenes, he was both sided and approved, as hath been said.

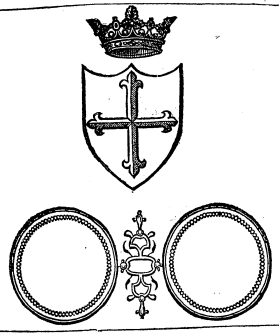
Will. Malmsb.

(3) But howsoever unwilling hee was this faire Queene should sit in state by his fathers side, yet contrary to all lawes either of God or Man, hee laid her by his owne, and by nuptiall rites, brought her to his sinfull and incestuous bed. Which Act, though foule enough, some have made worse, in reporting his Wife to be his owne Mother, whom King Ethelwolfe kept for his Concubine. And surely this his sinne was not long unpunished by the shortnesse of his raigne and life, leaving no other memory of his acts, besides this foule blot to his faire name.

The time of his raigning.

(4) His raigne was onely two yeares and a halfe, his death chanced upon the twentieth day of December, the yeare of Christs assuming our flesh, eight hundred and sixty. His body was first buried at Shirburne in the County of Dorset, where at that time was the Cathedrall Church and Episcopall Sea; but afterwards was removed and interred at Salesbury, in the Countie of Wiltshire.

His Wife.



1 Cor. 5. 1.

(5) Iudith, the Wife of King Ethelbald, was the widow of his owne Father, a most unlawfull Matrimony contracted against all law of God or of Nature; which being both dissolved and punished by the hasty death of the King, and the returning towards her father and country in Flanders, was ravished by Baldwin the Forrester of Arden in France, and by him forcibly kept untill she consented to become his wife, who in regard of that marriage, when he was reconciled to the Emperor Charles her Father, was by him created the first Earle of Flanders, by whom she had issue Baldwin the second, who espoused Lady Elfrid the youngest daughter of Elfred King of England; from whom, through five descents lineally, Maude Queene of England, Wife to William the Conquerour, descended, and from her, all our Norman English Kings unto this day.

Ethelbert.

ETHELBERT THE TVVENTY ONE KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWO AND TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE AND ISSVES.

Monarch 22.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

An. Dom. 860.

ETHELBERT, the second sonne of King Ethelwolfe, who had succeeded his Vncle Ethelstan in the Kingdome of the South-Saxons, Kentish, and East-Saxons, and for five yeares continuance, ruled those Countries with great equity and valour; after the decease of his brother Ethelbald, succeeded him also both in the West-Saxons Kingdome, and the whole LandsMonarchy: whereof he was the one and twentieth King, and the two & twentieth Monarch.

(2) His raigne began in the yeare of Christs Nativitie, eight hundred and sixtie, and was disquieted from first to last by the Invasions of the bloudy Danes. For presently after his Coronation, these common enemies entred the Land, ruinating all before them unto the Citie Winchester, which they sacked, and left it troden under their destroying feet, even to the ground. But in their returne were encountred by the Barke-shire-men, under the leading of Osrirke Earle of Hampton, by whom they were vanquished, the prey recovered, and a great number of those Infidels slaine.

Hen. Hunting.

(3) In his first yeare also a Navie of Danes and Normans entred into the Iland Thanet, and began their wonted spoiles among those people: whereupon the Kentish compounded their peace for a great summe of money given. Notwithstanding those miscreants, which knew not God, gave little regard to their promised covenants, and before the dayes of truce were expired, like a sudden cloud over-bare all before them. These their irruptions to withstand, the Kentish then prepared, rather adventuring themselves upon the chance of battell, then to rest upon a seeming truce, wherein their destruction was too apparant, and forthwith assembling all their powers together, set upon those Truce-breakers, and with much slaughter forced them at length out of their Country.

The Kent. frim compound for their peace.

Ethelbert rirts of raigning.

(4) But the date of King Ethelberts life being expired, hee yeelded his body to the course of nature and his Kingdomes to his next brother, after he had raigned over the Kentish, South, and East-Saxons, the terme of ten yeares, and had fate Monarch of the whole onely five. He died the yeare of grace eight hundred sixty six, and was honourably buried in the Cathedrall Church of Shirborne in Dorset-shire, by his brother King Ethelbald.

His supposed issue.

Athelm the eldest sonne.

(5) Athelm, the brothers sonne of King Elfred, mentioned in the last Will and Testament of the same King, seemeth by all likelihood to be the eldest sonne of this King Ethelbert, elder brother to the same king Elfred, although he succeeded not his father in his kingdome. For in those dayes, if the kings sonne were under age, the succession went to the next brother; and if that brother left his sonne at full age, then it went unto him; otherwise it reverted to his eldest brothers sonne.

Ethelwald the second sonne.

(6) Ethelwald, surnamed Clito, which is a word of addition given to all the Saxon kings sonnes of England; is mentioned in king Elfreds Will to be his brothers sonne, and is most likely to be the sonne of this king Ethelbert: he proved a most deadly enemy to his cosen king Edward, the sonne of king Elfred his Vncle, destroying his townes in Dorset-shire; and being driven out of England, joyned himselfe with the Danes, who made him their king in Northumberland, and under his leading, grievously assailed the Countries of the East-Saxons, East-Angles, and Mercians; wherein he was lastly slaine, the yeare of our Lord nine hundred and five, being the fourth of King Edward his cousen-germans raigne.

Ethelred.

ETHELRED THE TVVO AND TVVENTIETH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTY THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN; HIS ACTS AND ISSVE.

Monarch. 23.

CHAPTER. XXXV.

An. Dom. 866.

ETHELRED, the third sonne of King Ethelwolfe, after the decease of his brother, succeeded him in his Dominions, and was in number the two and twentieth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentie third Monarch of the Englishmen; he began his raigne in the yeare of our salvation eight hundred sixty and sixe, and for the time that he was King, raigned in continuall wars against the Pagan Danes, whose numbers now were greater, and footing furer in this land then formerly had been.

Hungar and Hubba.

(2) In the first yeare of his raigne, there arrived upon the English coasts, a huge army of these Danes, whereof Hungar and Hubba, men of incredible strength and cruelty, were the Captaines: These wintred in East-Anglia, made truce with the inhabitants upon certaine conditions, and forbare a time from their wonted ravening.

The Danes march Northward.

(3) But in the next yeare, the King being busied to put backe a fresh inrode of Danes in the South and West of the Iland then entred; these devourers tooke advantage upon the civill broiles commenced among the Northumbrians, who in these turmoiled times sought to with draw their subjection from the West-Saxons, and to set up Kings against of their owne, The foresaid Captaines Hungar and Hubba, having in time of their truce strengthened themselves with new supplies of aid, marched further into the North, where finding the people unprovided of strength, and the two Kings Osbright and Ella, of reconciled enemies to be made no sure friends, they harried the Countrey before them, and entring Yorke slew the two Kings, with infinit number of the English; which City they consumed with fire, and burnt therein all those that had fled thither for succour.

(4) The State thus standing, and their forces encreasing every day, brought new feares upon the inhabitants, when every late victory with increase of Captives and rich spoiles, ministred occasion and meanes of some other conquest to follow, which these Pagans so pursued, till lastly they set a Substitute King to raigne under them, over all the North Borders beyond the river Tyne; and so retiring themselves out of Northumberland into Mercia, came to Nottingham, which Citie they wonne, and therein wintred the third of King Ethelreds raigne, who with the aid of Burthred the Mercian King, constrained the Danes to sue for peace, and safe departure, yeelding the Citie, and againe retyring themselves over Tyne, remained in Yorke all the next Winter.

(5) The Summers opportunity approaching, their wonted desire for spoile was with it increased, and to cut off long travell, these Danes by Boats passed Humber, where Hungar and Hubba began with fire and sword to lay all waste before them, sparing neither Person, sexe nor age. The places respected for publike good, and sacred Temples consecrated onely to God, which all other Tyrants have forborne, these savage men as the earths destroyers, cast downe and trampled under their prophane feet: among which for note were the goodly Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Huntington, all laid levell with the ground, and their Votaries, as well the Nuns as the Monkes, murthered with their unhumane and mercilesse swords; to avoyd whose barbarous pollutions, the chaste Nunnes of Coldingham, deformed themselves to their lascivious eyes, by cutting off their upper lippes and nose; but to everlasting remembrance they remain most faire, and well beseeming faces of pure Virgins.

(6) These Pagans piercing further into the land, came into the Territories of the East-Angles, wherein holy Edmund raigned King, whose Martyrdome in most cruell manner they wrought, hee constantly calling upon the name of Christ; whereof we have already ready spoken, and shall be occasioned hereafter to speake.

(3) But in the last yeare of this Kings raigne, their raging power was most great: for with a new supply, two Danish Kings, Sweg, and Halden, entred into West-Sexia, and at Reading, the Kings Towne entrenched themselves: these forraging the Countrey, were encountred with at Englefield by Ethelwolfe Earle of Barke-shire, and his men, who in skirmish slew one of their Leaders; and chased the rest backe to their Trench.

(8) These Danes fearing lest delayes would prove dangerous, and knowing that the first successe is commonly seconded with further courage of hope; foure dayes after shewed, themselves in field ready to fight: their hoast they divided into two battalians; whereof the one was guided by two of their Kings, and certaine Earles were Leaders of the other; which when the English perceived, they also divided theirs, whereof King Ethelred had the leading of the first, and Elfred his brother was Generall of the second; the place was Assendon, where their Tents were pitched, and the day approached for battaile: King Ethelred in his Tent staid so long in prayers that Elfred upon a forward courage hasted to encounter the enemy, and that with a most fierce and sharpe fight, wherein having spent the most of his strengths, and ready to decline, and give backe: Ethelred manfully entred the battaile, and so seconded his brother, and over-tyred Souldiers, that hee made way by dint of his sword through the thickest of their almost-conquering enemies, and with such losse of the Danish bloud, drawne from the sides of one of their Kings, five Earles, and an infinite number of the common souldiers, that the streams thereof seemed as an over-swelling Tide, altogether to cover the face of the field, and is accounted for the noblest Victory that the English till then had gotten of the Danes.

(9) Yet were not these Pagans therewith discouraged, but gathering more strengthes and supplies from other parts; fourteene dayes after, made head againe against the English, and pitching downe their Standards at Basing, abode the comming of Ethelred, and triall of battell: wherin successe was altogether altered; for herein the Kings part was discomfited, and the Danes the winners of the day.

(10) Thus both sides borne upon rage and hope, in their heat of bloud prepare for new fight. The Danes power was augmented with a further supply sent from beyond Seas, and the English confirmed with hope of Successe: These meeting at Merton (two moneths after the battle of Basing) encountred each other both boldly and bloodily; wherein at first the English prevailed, and the Danes were chased; but their numbers the greater, and fresh supply maintaining their battaile, they recovered themselves, and wonne the day; wherein King Ethelred received his deathes wound, with such slaughter of his people, that little wanted the end of all encounters, to have been afterwards attempted any more by the English.

(11) Great was the valour and resistance of this King; for in his short time of Raigne as Writers record, no lesse then nine set battels against the Danes he fought in one yeare, to the great effusion of Christian bloud, and to no little losse of the Danish power; for in his raigne fell of them one King, nine Earles and of the common sort without number.

(12) He died at Wittingham of his wound received the three and twentieth day of April, in the yeare of our Lord God eight hundred seventy two, and was buried in the Collegiat Church of Wimborne in Dorsetshiere, where remaines his Tombe, and his Armes unto this day, with this Inscription.

In hoc loco quiescit corpus Sancti Ethelredi Regis West-Saxonum Martyris, qui Anno Domini 872. 23. die Aprilis, per manus Dacorum Paganorum occubuit.

His Issue.

Elfred, the eldest sonne of King Ethelred seemeth to be Grandfather to the noble and learned Ethelward, who being Kinsman, Counsellour and Treasurer to King Edgar, wrote an Historie of his Countrey, beginning at the first arrivall of the Saxons into England, and continuing unto his owne time: which history hee dedicated to his kinswoman, and cozengerman the Lady Maude, Abbesse of Quedlingburg in Saxony, being the daughter of the Emperour Otho, by Edgith his Wife, daughter of King Edward the elder, and sister of Ethelstane and Edmund, Kings of England.

Oswald, a young sonne of King Ethelred, is mentioned in a Charter of his fathers, by which he gave lands to the Monastery of Abingdon neere Oxford; and to which this son of his hath his name set downe for a witnesse; which Charter is yet extant, recorded in a great Legier-booke, and Register of the Evidences of the lands, sometime belonging to the said Monastery.

Thyre, the daughter of King Ethelred, is reported by the histories of Ireland to bee married to Gormon King of the Danes, and to have had issue King Harald, which Harald, by Queene Gonhild his wife, had issue Sweyn King of Denmarke, Iringe King of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. King Sweyn by King Sigred his wife, had issue Cnute King of England and Denmark, Ostryde, wife of Duke Wolfe, and mother of King Sweyne the younger, and Thyre the first wife of Earle Godwin of Kent.

ELFRED THE TVVENTY THIRD KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIE FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE WIVES AND ISSVE.

Elfred. Monarch 24.

Chapter. XXXVI.

An. Dom. 872.

Elfred, or Alfred, the fourth son of King Ethelwolfe, though he had beene anointed King at Rome by Pope Leo in his yong yeares, and fathers life time, yet raigned he in no part of his Dominions, before the deaths of al his brethren, under whom he served in most of their warres, assisting them likewise in all their counsels. The land now miserably torne by the cruell intrusions of the bloudy Danes was left unto him both to redeeme, and to raigne over, by the death and Testament of King Ethelred his last brother.

Matth. West.

Mariana. Florilegus.

(2) He began his raigne in the yeare of his age twenty two, and of our Lord God, eight hundred seventy two, being crowned in the City of Winchester, the twenty third King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty fourth Monarch of the Englishmen: but of some Historians hee is famoused by the stile of the first absolute Monarch.

(3) His raigne began with troubles and warres in defence of the land which the Pagan Danes intended to destroy; and though his powers were small, yet was he forced into the field, within one moneth after his Coronation, the place was Wilton in the County of Wiltshire, on the South-banke of the River Wily: where the Danes at first gave backe and fled. But seeing the fewnesse of their pursuers, reenforced their battle, and got the field, with whom the West-Saxons entred league, and compounded for their departure from among them.

After.

(4) These Rovers then with their Associates at Reading, got themselves into London, where they wintred (with whom the Mercians likewise compounded for their peace; which proved shortly to be the destruction of their princely bloud; and lastly, the lands subversion by a forraigne Nation. For the Danes having got footing in the North, the West, and the South of this land, (unto whose aide many new-come guests from their Easterne Countries were arrived under the leading of other three Kings Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond) all together set their griping talons with such fast hold upon Mercia, that at Ripendon they constrained Burthred the King with his Queene Elfwith out of the land, and in his stead placed a King of their owne choise, upon condition to deliver up the same againe unto them when they should demaund it.

Sweyn. Hist. Norweg. Ethelwerd. Simeon. Dunelm.

(5) In the fourth yeare of King Elfred their armies divided themselves into two parts, the one of them guided by King Halden, returned into Northumberland; where hee bestowed that Country among his followers, and therein remained for two yeares continuance, doing much harmes both to the English and Picts. The other part led by the last new-come King, came to Grandbridge, where they wintered and spoiled the Countrey, and there spreading themselves as Grashoppers upon the face of the earth, eate up all where they came; so that King Elfred was enforced to compound for their departure out of his kingdome West-Saxia; to which covenants they promised and swore; yet contrary to both, tooke into Devonshire, and wintered at Excester: unto whom a further supply by sea fought to joyne themselves, but met with such boisterous blasts, that one hundred and twenty of their ships were cast away by tempest at Swanwiche upon our coasts, and their land-army marching towards Excester, were there welcommed with so sharpe an encounter by King Elfred, that they gave him both pledges and oath to depart with all speed.

(6) But Fortune ever dallying with them whom she meanes to downe-cast, set the chance of losse presently fently upon the Saxons side: for now the three Kings, Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond thought it not good to let Elfred thus reſt, and thereupon drew their forces Weſtwards towards him, where at Chipingham (a Mannor of his) they wintered and compelled the Weſt-Saxons there, either to yeeld, or to forſake the Countrey.

An. Dom. 876.

(7) King Elfred therefore, with ſuch ſtrength as he had, haſted towards them, and ſeventeene miles from Briſtow pitched downe his Tents even in the face of the Enemie; where betwixt theſe fierce Nations a great battaile was fought, to the infinite loſſe of blood on both ſides, and that upon ſuch equall departure, as neither could challenge to be maſters of the field; yet the report went, that King Elfred was diſcomfited, which turned greatly to his advantage; for thereupon many of the Engliſh haſted to his ſuccour, leſt the overthrow of him ſhould be the bane of them all; his ſtrengthes thus renued with an unexpected ſupply, no time was detracted to ſtay the Daniſh rage who were now returned further into the heart of the land, and at Abington by Oxford had pitched their ſtandards for fight.

Abington.

(8) Thither the Engliſh repaired, and the next morning Elfred ordered his Army; neither were the enemies unprepared, but with braves ſtood ready to receive the encounter. The battaile joyned, continued with ſuch loſſe of blood, that it is accounted one of the foreſt that ever betwixt them before had been fought, and onely parted by the approach of the night, neither party challenging the honour of the day, the loſſe being ſo great upon both ſides.

Seven of theſe battailes are reported to be fought in that yeare, whereby both their ſtrengthes were much abated, and their ſpilt blood ſoone cooled their livers; that laſtly they concluded upon a peace: one article was this, that the Danes ſhould admit no more of their Nation to arrive in this Iland: but how ſoone that was broken, the ſequels did ſhew.

Seven Battails in one yeare.

An. Dom. 876. Simon Dun.

(9) For in the yeare eight hundred ſeventy ſixe (ſaith Simon Dunelmenſis) Rollo a Noble man of Denmarke with a great army entred into England, with no leſſe ſpoile and deſtruction then other of thoſe Danes before him had done, notwithſtanding the truce: with whom King Elfred met, and gave him ſo hot a welcome, that he liked not greatly his entertainement, and being warned (forſooth) in his ſleepe that better fortune attended him in France, he left his countreymen to tugge with the Engliſh.

Elfreds exigences.

(10) The Danes then accounting the peace to be broken, like Bees from the Hive, inſeſt all the land, in ſo much that this undaunted King Elfred was oftentimes brought to ſuch extremities, that hee hid himſelfe out of ſight, and in the Fennes and Marſh grounds, was forced with ſuch ſmall companies as he had, to live by fiſhing, fowling, and hunting of wilde beaſts for his food, having no more of his great Monarchy left him but Somerſet, Hampton, and Wiltſhires onely, neither yet them free from the incurſions of the Danes.

Edelingſey Iland.

(11) The ſolitary place of his moſt reſidency was an Iland incloſed with the two rivers, Thone and Parret, at their meeting in the County of Somerſet, commonly called Edelingſey, where he in very poore attire diſguiſed, was entertained in a Cowheards houſe (if not into his ſervice) where on a time as hee ſate by the fire in trimming of his bowe and ſhafts, a Cake of Dow baking upon the hearth before him, chanced to burne; the Cowheardeſſe coming in, and ſeeing him minde more his bow then his bread, in a great fury caſt away both his bow and arrowes, and checking him as her Groome, ſaid, Thou fellow, doeſt thou ſee the bread burne before thy face, and wilt not turne it? and yet art thou glad to eate it before it be halfe baked? Little ſuſpecting him to be the man that had beene ſerved with farre more delicate Cates.

(12) But this Prince the very mirrour of Princes, more minding the wealth of his Subjects, then the majeſty of State, diſguiſed himſelfe in the habite of a common Minſtrell, and in perſon repaired to the Danes Campe, who lay like Senacheribs, wallowing in wantonneſſe, and ſecure in their owne conceit from impeach of danger; which Elfred a moſt ſkilfull Muſitian, and an excellent Poet, did not a little egge on by his ſweet muſicke, and ſongs of their valour, ſo that he was ſuffered to paſſe uncontrolled into the company of their Princes, at banquets, or elſewhere: whereby he both ſaw their negligent ſecurity, and by diligent obſervance learned the deſignes that in their counſels they entended.

Walſing.

(13) Returning to his comfortleſſe company, he told them the condition of the hoſtile Campe, and how eaſie it was to recover againe their decayed eſtates: whereupon ſhewing himſelfe to his ſubjects, unto whoſe ſight nothing could be more joyous; on the ſuddaine ſet upon the careleſſe Campe of the Danes, and made thereof a very great ſlaughter, to the great terrour of others in other parts, that had accounted him dead long before.

Henry Hunt. An. Dom. 878.

(14) Hubba, that had harried the Engliſh, and now rowzed upon the newes of King Elfreds victory and life; with thirty three ſhips ſailed from Wales, and arriving in the mouth of Tau, where it falleth into the Severne Sea, aſſayed to take there the then ſtrong Caſtle called Kimwith, unto whom the Devonſhire men gave battle, and ſlew eight hundred and eighty perſons of their retinue; where died the Daniſh King Hubba, whoſe corps being there interred under a great heape of copped ſtones, gave name to the place, and was called Hubbleſtone. There and then was taken the Daniſh much eſteemed Banner, called Reafan, wherein a Raven was purtraied wrought in needle-worke, (ſo Aſſerius Menevenſis reporteth) by the three ſiſters of Hubba and Hunger the daughters of Lothbroke (that is, Leather-breach) the Dane: In regard whereof, as alſo for the opinion of good lucke, as they tooke it, it was ever born before them in their wars.

An. Dom. 879.

(15) Theſe adverſe proceedings of the Danes deſignes, eſpecially falling when the game was neere wonne, made them ſuſpect, how faire ſoever the ball lay to hand, yet fortune would ſerve it in the end to their loſſe: for Elfred now flocked unto upon every ſide, beganne to build fortreſſes behind his backe, and forward to march with his conquering ſword: whereupon the Danes ſent to him for Peace, and delivered him hoſtages, upon aſſurance that they meant as they ſpake: The Conditions were, that their King ſhould receive Baptiſme, and the great Army of the Danes quietly to depart out of the land.

Aſſer. Menev.

(16) Whereupon Gurmound or Gurthrun the Daniſh King repaired to the new built Caſtle of Edelingſey unto King Elfred, and in the place then called Alre, was waſhed in the laver of Baptiſme, whom Elfred received for his God-ſon by the name of Athelſtane, and gave him in free gift the Country of Eaſt-Angles. In the ſame fountaine of grace (ſaith Simon Dunelmenſis) thirty of the chiefe Daniſh Nobility were initiared: upon whom the truly Chriſtian King Elfred beſtowed many rich gifts: And that the limits of the Engliſh might bee free from their incurſions, thus the confines of King Elfreds kingdome were laide forth, as we find it in the end of thoſe Lawes that Elfred publiſhed, whoſe words are theſe: Let the bounds of our Dominion ſtretch from the river Thamiſis, and from thence to the water of Lea, even unto the head of the ſame water, and ſo forth ſtraight unto Bedford: and finally, going along by the river of Ouſe, let them end at Watling ſtreet.

(17) But ſo farre were the Danes from performance of covenants, that in this eight yeere of King Elfreds raigne, and the eight hundred ſeventy nine after Chriſt, this Gurmund and his company wintered at Chipnam in Wiltſhire, and a new ſupply of theſe Pagans (known by the name of the Wiccingi) wintred at Fulham neere London; yet after upon better advice, the one went into their aſſigned circuit, and the other others departed to the realme of France, and ſo to his tweſfe yeare the land tooke ſome reſt, that had been kept long waking by the loud ſound of warre.

(18) In the yeare of Grace eight hundred eighty five, theſe laſt retyred Danes, finding France not fitting their purpoſe, returned into Kent, and put into Medway, where on his Eaſt ſide they began a fierce ſiege unto the City Rocheſter, before whoſe gate they built a ſtrong Caſtle: Thither King Elfrid haſted, before whoſe power theſe Danes could not ſtand, but were forced to their ſhippes, and backe againe into France.

An. Dom. 889.

(19) Whereupon the King removed his ſiege unto London, whence all the Danes fled (as Wolves abide not the preſence of the Lion) the inhabitants rejoycing to ſee the face of their King: which City hee reſtored to her former liberty and beauty, and committed the cuſtody thereof unto Ethelred Duke of Mercia, that had married his daughter the Lady Ethelfred, whoſe title the king had maintained againſt Colwolphus, made king thereof by the Danes. Whereupon both Kent, the South-Saxons, and Weſt-Saxons, came willingly, and ſubmitted themſelves to King Elfred. (20) But in the one and twentieth of his raigne, and of Chriſts Incarnation eight hundred ninety two: thoſe roving Danes returned out of France, and againe arrived in Kent in the mouth of the river Limen, with two hundred and fifty ſhips, which they drew foure miles into the great wood, then called Andreads Weald, and there deſtroyed a Caſtle that ſtood for defence, building another more ſtrong at Apulder, wherein they kept. At the ſame time likewiſe entered one Haſtings, a Noble man of Norway, with eighty ſhips; but with a fairer ſhew as hee entended, for he ſent his oath unto Elfred, not to annoy any part of his Dominions; and withall his two ſonnes to be baptized, which King Elfred accepted, himſelfe becomming the Godfather of the one, and Duke Ethelred of the other; and both they, and his Ambaſſadors returned with rich gifts. Againſt theſe Kentiſh invaders, King Elfred fought a great battaile at Fernham, neere unto Aceſſford, wherein hee wounded their King, and forced his Army to flee over Thameſis; in paſſing whereof, through overmuch haſte and great feare, many of them were drowned, and they that eſcaped, fled to an Iland called Brekleſey, incloſed about by the river Colne.

(21) Newes then being brought into the Eaſt, that the Danes from Northumberland had infeſted the Weſt, and with a ſtrong ſiege begirt the Citie Exceſter: Elfred left for Generall his ſonne in law, Duke Ethelred, whileſt he with a ſtrong power went to ſuppreſſe their rage, who hearing of his comming, brake up their ſiege, and were gone: upon the advantage of his abſence, perjured Haſtings then wrought, who out of his new built Caſtle at Beamfield, made ſpoile of the Kings people, and forraged all the Countrey before him. Whereupon Duke Ethelred aſſembled a power, and firſt affailing his well ſtored Caſtle, took thence his Wife and two Sonnes, with exceeding ſpoiles of gold, ſilver and garments; all which were preſented unto King Elfred at his returne to London: who out of his Princely magnanimity, ſent backe to Haſtings, his wife and two ſonnes; becauſe (ſaid hee) ſhe was no Warriour, and his two ſonnes were his God-children: whereupon Haſtings repaired his Caſtle, and ioyned with the other Danes that lay at Apulder.

(22) Thoſe then that had fled but lately from Exceſter, in their returne met with other their conſorts, and roving about the coaſt for their prey, fell laſtly upon the ancient City Cheſter, which preſently they beganne to facke and burne. But the Countrey Inhabitants comming to the reſcue, begirt them about with their hoaſt, and foreſtalled the paſſages of all ſupply of victuals; ſo that for want of food, the Danes were conſtrained to eate up their horſes, and upon compoſition thence to depart.

(23) Thence fetching a compaſſe all along the coaſts of Wales, in the ſame yeare they arrived in Eſſex, being the twenty foure of King Elfreds raigne: and in the Winter following, drew their ſhips by the Thameſis into the river Lea, by which they paſſed in thoſe light Pinnaces twenty miles Northward into the land, and built them a fortreſſe at the place called Weare*: thither forthwith the King repaired, and pitched his Tents before his enemies in the ſame place; who ſeeing their ſtrength, and the danger of long ſiege, did that by policy, which power could not ſo ſodainly doe: for he divided the River into ſundry ſtreames, whereby the Channell was made unnavigable, and the Ships bedded in the mudde, lay rather to their annoiance then defence. The former experience of their hunger-ſtarved ſiege made them more fearefull to fall into the like: and therefore in great haſte departed their fortreſſe, leaving their wives and children to the mercy of the Engliſh. Neither ſtayed they till they came unto the borders of Wales, when at Carthridge upon Severne they built another Caſtle, and lay there all the next Winter.

(25) The vertues of this Prince are matchable to any that ever raigned before him, and exceed the moſt that ever raigned after him, both in ſervice of God, whoſe Subſtitutes they are; in defence of his Countrey, which charge they all beare; in providing good lawes, the ſinewes of Kingdomes; and care of poſteritities, from which no man is exempted.

Scal. Chr. Polyd. Virg. Trithem. Functorius. Reſtitut.

The day and night containing twenty foure howers, he deſigned equally to three eſpeciall uſes, and them obſerved by the burning of a Taper ſet in his Chappell or Oratory; eight howres hee ſpent in contemplation, reading and prayers; eight, in proviſion for himſelfe, his repoſe and health; and the other eight in the affaires of the Common-wealth and State. His Kingdome hee likewiſe divided into Shires, Hundreds, and Tithings for the better ordering and adminiſtring of Iuſtice, and for the abandoning of Theeves, which had formerly increaſed by the meanes of long Warres; whereby, notwithſtanding the multitude of Souldiers continually imployed, it is reported that a Virgine might travaile alone in his dayes through all his Dominion, without any violence offered; and that bracelets of gold were hanged in the high wayes, and no man ſo hardy as to take them away.

Aſſerius Menev.

He was a moſt zealous, and ſtudious Protector and provider for the Clergy, Widdowes, and Orphans, liberall of his goods, wiſe, temperate and juſt, valiant, patient in adverſities, and ever religious in the ſervice of God. A moſt learned Poet: the beſt lawes full Muſition, and an excellent Poet: the beſt lawes befitting his Subjects, he tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue: as alſo the Paſtorall of Gregory, the Hiſtory of Beda, and Boëtius his Conſolation of Philoſophy; the Pſalmes of David (whoſe godly raign he propoſed to himſelfe for imitation) hee likewiſe began to tranſlate, but died before he could finiſh the ſame. And ſo great a deſire had he unto learning, that (as Aſſirdius Rivallenſis witneſſeth) he publiſhed this Act: We will and command, that all Freemen of our Kingdom, who soever possessing two hides of land, shall bring up their sons in learning till they be fifteene yeeres of age at least, that so they may be trained to know God, to be men of understanding, and to live happily: for, of a man that is borne free, and yet illiterate, we repute no otherwise then of a beast, or a brainelesse body, and a very sot. And for the furtherance of this his royall intent, consorted with Asserius Menevensis, Grimbald, John Scot and others: neither permitted he any in office in Court, or elsewhere, unlesse he were learned, which incited his nobles to the earnest pursuit of learned arts; and to traine up their children in good letters. His buildings were many, both to Gods service, and other publike use, as at Edelingsey a Monastery, at Winchester a New Minster, and at Shaftsbury a house of Nunnes, wherein hee made his daughter Ethelgeda the Abbesse. But the foundation of the Vniversity of Oxford (which he began in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred ninetie five, and whose Lectures he honoured with his owne presence) surmounteth all his others, to the continuance of posteriries, a living spring and gracious fountaine, whence issue the streames of all knowledge, that abundantly have watered both this and other kingdomes.

(26) His body was first buried in the Cathedrall Church of S. Peters at Winchester, under a faire Monument of most precious Porphyry, afterwards because the lewd religious Chanons gave it out (to work some feat of their usuall imposture) that his ghost did walk every night from house to house; both it and the Monument were taken up, and by his sonne the Kings command (in detestation of those sorceries) remooved into the Church of the new Monastery: and lastly, his body, Monument, Church and Monastery, were taken thence, and remooved without the North gate of the Citie since called Hyde.

Malmsf. de Reg. l. 2. c. 4.

(27) Some alledge that the malice of those Chanons against him, was for displeasure that he placed over them a rude Swinheard named Denewulphus, whom he made their Bishop; but the ground of that assertion seemeth unwarrantable by the relation of Wigornensis, and also of Thomas Rudburne; the first of which saith, that Elfred caused him to be trained up in learning, and the later, that after long study, he attained to the degree of a Doctor of Divinity in the Vniversitie of Oxford, and was afterward made Bishop of Winchester by the King. For doubtlesse at that time the Bishops of Rome had not devested our Kings of that prerogative.

His Wife.

(28) Elfwith the Wife of King Elfred was the daughter of Ethelred surnamed Muchel, that is, the Great, an Earle of the Mercians, who inhabited about Gainesborough in Lincolnshiere: her mother was Edburg a Lady borne of the Blood royall of Mercia. Shee was married unto this King in the twentieth yeere of his age, being the second of the raigne of his brother King Ethelred; and was his wife twentie eight yeeres, and living after him foure; died in the yeere of grace nine hundred and foure, and was buried in the Monastery of Nunnes which shee had founded at Winchester; out of which afterwards King Henry the first tooke to his wife Maud the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots, by whom the royall blood of the ancient Kings of England became united to the Normans, whereby he wanne much love of the English nation.

Elfwith.

Malcolme King of Scots.

His Issue.

Edward, the eldest sonne, and second child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfwith, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers raigne, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred seventy one: hee was brought up in his Fathers Court, and carefully attended, and instructed by men of great vertue and knowledge, in learning, and in all other qualities, and exercises convenient for Princes. He was married, and had divers children: being thirtie yeeres of age before his Father deceased, and then succeeded him in his Kingdome and Monarchy.

Edward the eldest sonne.

Ethelward, the second sonne, and fifth, and last child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith, was borne about the midst of his Fathers raigne, and about the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and eightie. Hee was in his youth by his Fathers appointment, and for the example of other young Nobles brought up in the study of good Arts, at the Vniversity of Oxford, where (saith Th. Rudburne, and the Annals of Winchester) he became a man very learned, and a great Philosopher: hee had of his Fathers gift by his last Will great livings in the Counties of Devon, Somerset, South-Hampton: hee prooved a man of great judgement and wisedome, and living untill he was above forty yeeres old; hee died the fixteenth day of October, in the two and twenty yeere of his brother King Edwards raigne, Anno nine hundred twentie two, and was buried at Winchester.

Ethelward the second sonne.

Rudburne Antiquities South Saxon.

Elfleda, the eldest daughter and first child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfwith his Wife, was married to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, who in respect of this marriage was suffered to have all royall juridiction over that Countrey, in as ample manner as the Kings thereof had enjoyed; and after the decease of her husband, which happened in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred and twelve, shee continued the government in the same sort eight yeeres, with such resolution and valiant resistance of the common enemy (the Danes) that shee stood her brother Edward in great stead, as in the relation of his life shall be further shewed. She died the fifteenth of June, nine hundred and nineteene, and was buried in S. Peters Church at *Glouc*ester, leaving issue, a daughter, named Elfwin, whom King Edward her brother deprived of that Dutchy which her owne mother enjoyed, and he his crowne by her assistance.

Elfleda the eldest daughter.

Ethelgeda, the second daughter and fourth child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith, was never married, but tooke upon her the profession and vow of Virginity, and was by her fathers appointment made a Nunne of Shaftsbury in the County of Dorset, in the Monasterie there founded by him: who is also accounted the first of the Towne it selfe. Shee was afterward Abbesse of the house, and therein spent and ended her life, and was there also buried.

Ethelgeda the second daughter.

Elfride, the youngest daughter, and child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith his wife, was married to Baldwin the second, surnamed the Bald, Earle of Flanders, sonne of Earle Baldwin the first, and Queene Iudith his wife, the widdow of King Ethelwolfe her Grandfather. Shee was his wife thirty yeeres and more; shee survived him and was a widdow eleven yeeres: shee died the seventh of June, in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred twenty nine, being the fift of the raigne of King Ethelstan her Nephew. She is buried by her husband in the Chapell of our Lady, within the Monastery of S. Peter, at the City of Gaunt. She had issue Arnulfe the third Earle of Flanders, progenitor of all the Earles of Flanders since his time; Adulfe Earle of Boloigne and Terwin.

Elfride the youngest daughter.

Edward.

EDVVARD SVRNAMED THE ELDER, THE TVVENTY FOVRTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTY FIFTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 25.

CHAPTER. XXXVII.

An. Dom. 901.

NO greater, were the griefes conceived for the death of worthy Elfred, then were the hopes of the people in his sonne Prince Edward, whose valour had beene often approoved against the raging Danes, and whose vertues were both many and princely; not so learned as his Father, neither so patient to undergoe his chance; but as glorious in martiall prowesse, and as fortunate in all his fights; under whose hand the Danes every where fell, and under his Monarchy all the English did stoope, excepting the Northumbrians.

Mon. Mantuing.

(2) Hee entred his raigne the yeare of Christs nativity, nine hundred and one, and at Kingston upon Thames was crowned and annointed with holy oyle. The Danish warres continuing in a successive manner, fell as it were hereditarily from the Father unto the Sonne, and ripened dayly towards their wished harvest. Besides Ethelwald the sonne of Ethelbert the uncle to this King Edward, young at his fathers decease, and therefore perhaps held uncapable of government, shewed now the blossomes of under-sucking plants, whose fruits are neither plenteous nor pleasant in taste; for his humors ever working upon discontents, drew his thought onely how to make the possessor fall.

Rom. Hist.

(3) He then entring action of rebellion, tooke the Towne of Wimborne neere unto Bathe, and besides the allegiance due to his Prince, in sacrilegious manner brake the hests of holy Church, in deflowring and taking a Votarist to wife. Edward the elder, so called (it may be in regard of this his Opposite) with a selected Army repaired to Bathe, and thence prepared for the field: whose sight was so cockatrice-like to his cosen-garmens eye, that in the night he bade his Num and Wimborne adew, posting to Northumberland, and proffering his service to the Danes that lay for advantage of rapine and spoile.

Saint Edmunds Ditch.

(4) Him as a fit instrument they created their King and forward in hope of some prosperous successe, passed through the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, and the Mercians Countries: and laden with robberies came to Crikelade in Wiltshire, whence they departed over Thamisis to Basingstocke; and harrying the land before them, with triumph returned unto East-Anglia. Edward thus endangered by these dreadfull enemies, gave them no advantage by lingering delayes, but followed their tract unto Saint Edmunds Ditch, whence in his returne, the Danes gave him battaile, and obtained the victory, though bought with the lives of Ethelwald and Cochricus their Kings, and losse of many English, which made Edward the readier to enter a truce with them about the fift of his raigne.

Ethelwald his minority.

Wimborne taken by him.

(5) That the English were most expert for warre in these dayes, is witnessed by their resistance of those sturdy Danes, against whom the Commons many times with victory fought, without either King of Captaine to guide them: and they were likewise famous in other lands; for about this time it was, that the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Gothes, besieged the great City Argilla in Barbary, which they wonne with such slaughter of the enemy, and spoile of the towne; that for thirty yeares after it lay desolate without inhabitants, whereby it was hoped that the Saracens would have departed Europe, as Ioannes Leo Afer hath told us, who according to the Saracens doth referre this siege to the three hundred and foureteenth of Mahomet Hegira, which meeteth with the yeare of Christs Nativity, nine hundred and five.

(6) The truce yet lasting, the Danes in Northumberland were nothing quiet, to stay whose irruptions King Edward sent a great power, who harried the Country before them, and with much slaughter returned victorious. These dalliances of Fortune made the Danes very desperate, and therefore to stay the rowling ball before it should passe their goale, they gathered their powers and entred Mercia, where with victory and spoile they raged for a time. But Edward to ayd Ethelred his brother in law, and Earle of that Province, mustered his men, and at Wodnesfield neere Wolfrunc-hampton in Staffordshire gave them battaile, wherein the English so behaved themselves that the two Pagan Kings Cowilfus and Healidine, the two Earles Yter and Scurfa, besides other Nobles and Commons innumerable they slew: and now the clouds of these distemperatures being driven backe, King Edwards Monarchy ascended the Horizon, and the Sunne of his power began to shine very bright, therefore he seeking to hold what he had got, set his thoughts to secure his Townes with Castles and wals of defence.

(7) These his proceedings caused him to bee both beloved and feared; but his mind still free from any ambitious pride, as may appeare by the intercourse betwixt Leolin Prince of Wales and himselfe whereof Wal. Malmes maketh mention as followeth. What time Edward the Elder (saith he) lay at Austeline, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Bethelley, intending a Parly, Leolin refused to come downe, or to crosse the Severne: Whereupon Edward tooke boat and entred the river towards him, which when Leolin saw, and knew who hee was, he cast off his rich roabe wherewith he was clad, and which he had prepared for that royall assembly, and entred the river breast-hye, where clasping the boat with an imbrace, submissively said: Most wise and sage King, thy humility hath overcome my insolency, and thy wisedome triumphed over my folly; come, get upon my necke, which I have (foole as I am) lifted up against thee, so shalt thou enter into that land which thy benigne mildnesse hath made shine owne this day: and after he had taken him upon his shoulders, he would needs have him sit downe upon his royall roabe, and so putting his hands joyntly into his, did him homage.

(8) In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, as Henry Huntington hath it; Ethelred Earle of Mercia, who had married Elfleda King Edwards sister, departed this life, she having borne him one onely daughter named Elfwin, whose travell in childbirth was so grievous, that ever after she forbare the nuptiall imbracements of her husband, alledging that it was an over foolish pleasure, which brought with it so great paines; and thereupon changing the wonted Affection of her sexe from the bed unto battaile, governed Mercia eight yeares after her husbands decease, as another Zenobia, and did not a little assist her brother in his warres: for the Welsh shee pursued as farre at Brecknoke, which she tooke with their Queene: from the Danes shee wonne the County of Darby, and assaulting the Towne upon them, put her selfe in great danger; for enterprising to enter the Gate, shee was regerd; for enterprising to enter the Gate, shee was repelled by whole multitudes of Danes; notwithstanding, the persisted, and got entrance, in which encounter many dyed, and foure of her chiefe men of war, being Warders of her person, even fast by her side were slaine.

The Danes in Yorkeshire she constrained to bee at her devotion, so that some of them became her subjects, some vowed to attend in her ayde, and some promised to bee prest at her dispose. Her policy in warre prooved ever the surest; her counsell of State was regarded with the wisest, and her providence in building, and repairing Cities for the weale-publike, or fortifying places for munition of warre exceeded others: which she extended upon Chester, Tamworth, Litchfield, Stafford, Warwicke, Shrewsbury, Wednesbury, Eadsbury, Fimborow, Rincorne, Brimsbery-Bridge, and others.

(9) The last battaile of this King against these unsatiate enemies, was in the Country of the East-angles, whereof Edricke the Dane was King; for he intending new warres with the English, sought to incite other Danes to his ayde, whereof Edward having intelligence, prevented his purpose, by his sodaine approach into those parts.

Edricke therefore having all in a readinesse, rashly encountered with his enemy, and fought a fierce battaile to the great losse of his Army, and damage of his life; for returning to his Court after so foule a discomfiture, became odious to his owne subjects, who violently fell upon him and murdered him; and themselves brought low by civill dissention were shortly made subject to the English King Edward, and that Kingdome with Mercia, joyned unto his West-Saxons. And now having raigned in great warres and honour the space of twenty foure yeeres, deceased at Farringdon in Barkshire, the yeare of Christs incarnation, 924. and was buried in the new Monastery of Winchester, which his Father begun, and himselfe wholly finished.

His Wives.

(10) Egwina the first wife of King Edward, was the daughter of a meane Gentleman named Beorhec, whose eye-pleasing feature and alluring beauty made her to be educated above the degree of her birth, and was brought up by the nurse of King Edward in tender affection and great esteeme. It chanced Prince Edward in kindnesse came to visite his nurse, where seeing the admirable beauty of the Maid, fell so farre in love, that he tooke her to his wife without the consent or knowledge of his father: In which regard she is reputed by some Writers rather his Concubine then his Queene, no other cause mooving them but her meane parentage, and secret making and keeping of this marriage although there be some good historyes and many likelyhoods to induce that she was his lawfull Queene.

(11) Elfleda the second wife of King Edward, was the daughter (as Matthew of Westminster reporteth) of an Earle named Ethelhelme, and Affer the Bishop of Sherborne maketh mention of an Earle in Wiltshire among the West-Saxons of the same name; who was in great favour with King Elfrid, the father of this King, by whom hee was sent Ambassador to carry his Almes to Stephen, the sixt of that name Bishop of Rome, in the yeere of our Lord 887. and by all probable conference of name, time, and place, hee seemeth to be the man that was father to this Queene.

(12) Edgiva, the third wife of King Edward, was the daughter and heire of Earle Sigeline Lord of Mepham, Culinges, and Leanham in Kent, who was there slaine in battaile against the Danes, Anno 927. Shee was married unto King Edward about the foureteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace, 916. She was his wife ten yeares, and after his death shee lived a widdow all the times of the raignes of King Ethelstan her fonne in law, of King Edmund, and King Edred her owne fonnes, of King Edwy her Grand-child; and was living in the Raigne of King Edward another of her Grand-children, almost forty yeares after the death of her husband. It is writ of her that in the yeare of Grace, 959. shee offered her lands and evidences to Christ upon his Altar at Canterbury. She deceased the twenty fift of August in the fourth yeare of the said King Edgar, and of Christ, 963.

ner of creation, as William the Monke of Malmesbury, a great observer of such things, hath left in writing: who reporteth, that he put upon him a Purple Robe, and girt him with a girdle wrought with pearle, and a Saxon sword in a scabbard of gold, hanging at the same. He was the successor of his Father in the West-Saxons dominions, and the English Monarchy.

(14) Elfrid, the second sonne of King Edward and the Lady Egwina, is warranted by the testimony of the story of Hyde, to have beene loved of his father above all his other children, that he caused him in his owne life time to be crowned King, and to sit with him in his Seat of Estate, as his Partner in the Kingdome, and that he enjoyed that great honour but for a small time, deceasing shortly after his creation; and long before his fathers death; and was buried in the New Monastery at Winchester, which afterwards was removed to Hyde.

(15) Editha (whom the Scotish Writers call Beatrice) the daughter of King Edward and the Lady Egwina, with great honour was married to Sythricke, the Danish King of Northumberland, in the first yeere of the raigne of her brother King Ethelstan, being the yeere of grace 915. Within one yeere after her marriage, her husband deceased, and his sonne Guthfrid succeeded him in his Kingdome. Wherefore she forsaking that Countrey, obtained of her brothers gift, the Castell of Tamworth, in the County of Warwicke, where she began a Monastery of Nunnes, and therein lived, died, and was interred, and both the Monastery and Body afterwards was removed from thence unto Polleforth.

Ethelhild the fourth daughter.

Edhild the fifth daughter.

Edgith the fixth daughter.

(16) Elfward, the third sonne of King Edward, and the first of Queen Elfleda his second wife, was born, as it seemeth, about the beginning of his fathers raigne. He was carefully brought up in the study of Liberall Arts, and in all other princely qualities; so that it was expected hee should have succeeded his father in the Kingdome: but presently upon his fathers decease, he died himselfe in Oxford, and was buried at one time, and in one place with him in the New Monastery at Winchester, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 924.

(17) Edwine, the fourth sonne of King Edward, and the second of Queene Elfleda his second Wife, was very young when his father was buried, and his brother Ethelstane crowned. Notwithstanding a deepe jealousie possessing the King, that his title was too neere the Crowne, he caused him to be put into a little Pinnasse, without either Tackle or Oares, one only Page accompanying him, that his death might be imputed to the waves: whence the young Prince overputed to the waves: whence the young Prince overcome with griefe, and not able to master his owne passions, cast himselfe headlong into the Sea, and his dead body being driven upon the coasts of Flanders, was taken up by Adulphe, Earle of Bolaine, his cosengermane, and honourably buried in the Monastery of Saint Bertin, in the Towne of S. Omers. Which fact was much lamented by King Ethelstan, who grievously punished the suggestions of his owne jealousie, and the procurers of his brothers death, sending great thanks to the Earle that buried him, and rich Presents to the Monastery which entombed him, and to appease the ghost of his innocent brother, built the Abbey of Midleton in the County of Dorset.

(18) Elfleda, the second daughter of King Edward and the first of Queene Elfleda his second Wife, entred into the orders of Religion, and tooke upon her the profession and vow of Virginitie, in the Monastery of Ramsey, situated upon the River Test, in the County of Southampton, in which Monastery, she was first a Nunne, and afterward Abbesse during the whole time of her life, which was there spent and ended; and her body in the said Abbey buried.

(19) Egwina, the third daughter of King Edward and the second of Queene Elfleda his second Wife, was the second Wife to Charles the third, surnamed the Simple, King of France, son to King Lewis the brother of Iudith, Queene of England before mentioned. She had issue by him Lewis the third, surnamed Beyond Sea, because he was brought up here in England with his Vnkle King Ethelstan; and Gillet Dutchesse of Normandy married to Rollo the Dane: who in regard of his marriage, was allowed to be the first Duke of that Country. This Queene survived King Charles her husband; and afterwards was remarried to Herbert, the younger Earle of Vermandoys; which marriage was taken for so great an indignity, because Earle Herbert the elder, father to this Earle, had caused the King her Husband to die in prison, that King Lewis her sonne presently pursued her, apprehended, and committed her to the strait custody of Queene Gerberge his wife: so as shee had no recourse unto him, nor issue by him.

Her marriage with Herbert disliked.

(20) Ethelhild, the fourth daughter of King Edward, and the third of Queene Elfleda his second wife, followed the example of her elder sister Elfleda, and became a Nunne in the Monastery of Wilton, which was sometime the head Towne giving name to the whole County of Wiltshire; and anciently called Ellandon.

(21) Edhild, the fifth daughter of King Edward, and the fourth of Queene Elfleda, was married to Hugh surnamed the Great, Earle of Paris, Grand-master and Constable of France, in the yeere of our Lord 926. being the third of her brother King Ethelstanes raigne. This Hugh was the sonne of Robert, brother to Endes King of France, and father of King Hugh Capet, progenitor of the Kings of France, ever since unto this day: but thee died before him without any issue by him.

(22) Edgith, the sixth daughter of King Edward, and the fifth of Queene Elfleda, was the first wife of Otho the first, surnamed the Great, Emperour of the West, sonne to the Emperour Henry, surnamed the Falconer. By him shee had issue Ludolfe, Duke of Swade, William Archbishop of Mentz, Ludgard married to Conrad Duke of Lorrayn, and Mechthild Abbesse of Quedlingburg in Saxonie: in which Citie she deceased the seven and twentie of August, in the yeere of Christs Nativitie 947. the eleventh of her husbands Empire, and the first of her brother King Edreds raigne in England. Shee was buried at the East end of the North side of a Chappell which her selfe had founded in the same Citie.

Edgith the fixth daughter.

(23) Elgiva, the seventh daughter of King Edward, and the sixth of Queene Elfleda his second Wife, was by King Ethelstan her brother, with her sister Egith, sent to the Court of the Emperour Henry the first, King of the Saxons in Germany, who honourably entertained her, brought her up with his owne daughters; and after he had married her elder sister to his eldest sonne, he placed her also in marriage with a Duke of Italy about the Alpes, who is not named of our Writers, but may easily be conjectured by the honourable disposition of the Maker of the match to have beene a Prince of note and account, worthy of her estate and parentage.

Elgiva the seventh daughter.

(24) Edmund, the fifth sonne of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgiva his third and last wife, was borne in the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of the worlds salvation 921. and at his fathers death little more then three yeeres of age; was notwithstanding by the carefull provision of his mother, brought up with all princely education convenient for his yeeres and estate, insomuch as there was generally a great expectation amongst the people conceived of him in the life of his brother King Ethelstan, under whom he learned some experience of service in warre, and after whom he succeeded in the kingdome of England.

and valour, as after the death of King Edmund his brother in regard of the minority of his Nephews, hee was with the Generall consent, and liking of the whole nation, chosen to be his brothers successor in the kingdome and government over them.

(26) Edburg, the eight daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgiva, in her childhood had her disposition tried, and her course of life disposed by her Father in this manner; hee laid before her gorgeous apparell, and rich Iewels, in one end of a chamber, and the new Testament and Bookes of princely instruction in the other; willing her to make her choice of which she liked best: she presently tooke up the bookes, and hee her in his armes; kissing her said, Goe in Gods name whither God hath called thee, and thereupon placed her in a Monastery at Winchester, wherein shee did most vertuously spend her whole life, and in that Abbey was buried.

Edgiva the ninth daughter. (2) Edgiva, the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the second of his last Queene, whose name shee bare, is reported in the History of the Monastery of Hyde by Winchester, and other Writers of our Countrey, to have beene married to Lewes Prince of Aquitaine in France, which not long before had beene a Kingdome of it selfe, sometime allotted to the portion of Lewes the third sonne of the Emperour Charles the Great; of which house it seemeth this Lewes was; afterward it became a Dukedome, and the possession of an other Family, by whom it came to be the inheritance after the Conquest to the Kings of England, which were descended of the house of Angeow.

CHAPTER. XXXVIII.

An. Dom. 924.

Thelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward (as hath beene said) for the great hopes conceived of him, was crowned with a greater solemnity then any of his ancestors ever before him. The place was Kingston upon Thamisis in the County of Surrey, the yeere of Christ Iesus nine hundreth twentie foure, where, in the midst of the towne a high Scaffold was built, and thereon the Coronation performed to the open view of all, by Athelmus Archbishop of Canterbury, with shouts of joy as that of Salomon.

Crowned at Kingston upon Thamisis.

(2) His beginnings were with troubles, and that rather by reason of friends then force of foes: for it is recorded, that Elfred a Nobleman, either in favour of King Edwards other sonnes, holding Ethelstan a Bastard, or else upon an ambitious hope for himselfe, intended at Winchester to have pluckt out the eyes of his Soveraigne: but his treason being known, before he seed could shew blade, he was apprehended and sent to Rome to purge himselfe by oath: where, before the Altar of S. Peter and Pope Iohn the tenth, he there abjured the act, and thereupon fell suddenly downe to the earth, so that his servants tooke and bare him into the English Schoole, where, within three dayes after he died: the Pope denying him Christian buriall untill he knew King Ethelstans pleasure.

Will. Malmesb.

(3) These stormes over past, as great a cloud seemed to arise unto Ethelstans sight, whose eye of iealousie ever following the assent, and his eare ever opened unto the instillations of Parasites, amongst whom his Cup-bearer was a chiefe, who brought daily more and more suspition into the Kings head that lastly (as wee haue shewed) hee consented to young Edwins death, though with too late a forrow hee repented the same: for besides his seaven yeeres pennance voluntarily undergone, to pacifie the the ghost of his betraied brother, he built the two Monasteries of Midleton and Michelnesse, as for the most part such seed-plots were ever sowne in the furrowes of blood, which hapned upon this occasion: It chanced his Cup-bearer in his service upon a festivall to stumble with the one foote, and recovering himselfe with the other, pleasantly to say, you see how one brother helpeth another; upon which speech the King with griefe and touch of heart, called to mind the death of his innocent brother, and forthwith commanded execution to be done on him the procurer, to repay his fact with deserved death: and himselfe was ever after more tender and carefull towards his other brethren, with a more repective regard, and bestowed his sisters most honorably in marriage, as hath beene said.

(4) At his entrance of government, to discharge the expectations of his subiects, hee endeavored both by warres and alliances to make them strong and rich. First therefore entring friendshippe with Sithricke the Danish King of Northumberland, upon whom with condition that hee should receive Baptisme, he bestowed his sister Editha in marriage, hee bent himselfe to ordaine Lawes for the weale-publike, and those to bind as well the Clergy as the Laiety, out of which first sprang the attachment of Fellons, to take hold of such as stole above twelve pence, and were aboue twelve yeeres of age.

(5) But Sythricke the Northumbrian dying the first yeare of his marriage, and his Queene returning to a religious life, his sonnes Godfrey and Anlafe, offended that their Pagan Gods were neglected, and onely by the meanes of this their fathers last wife, stirred the Northumbrians to disquiet the English, which occasioned Ethelstan to invade their Country: and forced Anlafe into Ireland, and Godfrey into Scotland, which last so wrought with Constantine their King, that hee undertooke to side in his quarrell, with whom joyned* Howell King of Wales. These in a fierce battle hee overcame and constrained them to submit themselves to his will, who knowing the chance of warre to bee variable, and pittying the case of these down-cast Princes, restored them presently to their former estates, adding withall this princely saying, that it was more honour to make a King then to be a King.

(6) This notwithstanding, the case of Godfrey so moved the spirit of King Constantine, that hee againe assisted him in his inroades into the English part, which drew againe King Ethelstan into the North: and comming to Yorkshiere (as he was a man much devoted to God-ward) turned aside to visite the tombe of S. Iohn of Beverly, where earnestly praying for his prosperous successe, for want of richer Iewels, there offred his knife, vowing that if hee returned with conquest, hee would redeeme it with a worthy price; and thus armed with hope, proceeded forward pitching downe his tents at Brimesbury, his navie wafting along those seas.

(7) To the aide of Constantine came Anlafe, called by writers king of the Irish, and of the Iles, who had maried his daughter, a man no doubt both hardy and desperate, as appeared by the action hee underwent; for it is recorded, that as Elfred the English had attempted to know the state of the Danes; so this Dane at this place did to understand the Englishs: for disguising himselfe like a Harper, hee went from Tent to Tent, and had accesse even into King Ethelstans presence, untill hee had learned what hee most desired, and then returned againe to his Campe, which part of his was no bolder nor more wisely performed, then was kept secret, and after revealed by a most faithfull souldier. For Anlafe departed and free from purfuit, this Souldier made the act knowne to King Ethelstan: who being fore displeased with his enemies escape, imputed the fault unto him the revealer; but he replying, made him this answere; I once served Anlafe (said he) under his pay for a souldier, and gave him the same faith that I doe now unto you; if then I should have betrayed his designes, what trust could your Grace repose in my truth? let him therefore die, but not through my Treachery, and by his escape secure your royall selfe from danger; remove your Tent from the place where it stands, lest as unawares hee haply assaile you.

(8) The King seeing the faith if his souldier, was therewith pacified, and forthwith commanded his Tent to bee removed, where presently a Bishop new come to his Campe pitched up his owne, and the night following both himselfe and retinue were slaine by the same Anlafe that fought the kings life in assaulting the place; and pressing forward came to his tent, who awaked with the suddaine Alarum boldly rushed upon his enemies, and encouraging his men, put them backe with the death of five petty Kings, twelve Dukes, and well neere of the whole Army, which Anlafe had brought.

Will. Malmes.

(9) The memory of this man is made the more lasting by a peece of ancient Saxon coine of silver, inscribed with his name, ANLAF CYNYNE, which for the antiquity of the thing, and honor of the man we have here imprinted, and placed, though in the texture of our English Saxon kings.

(10) To leave a memoriall of King Ethelstans great victory, give me leaue to write what I find; namely, that neere unto the Castle Dunbar in Scotland, he praying that his right unto those parts might be confirmed unto posterities by a signe, at one blow with his sword strooke an ell deepe into a stone, which stood so cloven a long time after, and undoubtedly was the whetstone to this Authors knife, with the like credit as Tarquinius his whetstone was cut asunder by Attius Navius the Augur his Razor: but this is most certaine, that hee joyned Northumberland to the rest of his Monarchy, and returning to Beverly redeemed his owne knife.

Vide lib. 1. Cicero de divinat. Liv. li. Beverly.

(11) From hence he turned his warres into Wales, whose Rulers and Princes hee brought to bee his Tributaries, who at Hereford entred covenant to pay him yeerely twentypound weight of gold, three hundred of silver, and twenty five hundred head of cattle, with hawkes and hounds to a certaine number, towards which payment by the statutes of Howell Dha, the king of Aberfraw was charged at sixty fix pounds; the Prince Dinewres, and the Prince of Powys were to pay the like summes.

(12) The Britaines, which to this time with all equall right inhabited the City of Excester with the Saxons, hee expelled into the further promontory of Cornwall, and made Tamar the confines of his own Empire; so that his dominion was the largest that any Saxon before him had enjoyed, and his fame the greatest with all forraine Princes, who sought his friendship both with love and alliance, by marching with his sisters, and presenting him with rich and rare presents; For Hugh King of France, besides other unestimable Iewels, sent him the sword of Constantine the Great, in the hilt whereof (all covered with gold) was one of the nailes that fastned Christ to his Crosse; he sent likewise the speare of Charles the Great, reputed to be the same, that pierced Christs side, as also part of the Crosse whereon hee suffered his passion, and a peece of the thorny Crowne wherewith his blessed Temples were begored; and with these came the banner of S. Maurice so often spread by Charles the Great in his Christian warres against the Saracens; And from Otho the Emperour, who had maried his sister, was sent a vessell of pretious stones artificially made, wherein were seene Lanskips with vines, corne and men, all of them seeming so natu-

Chapter. XXXIX.

Monarch. 940.

Edmund the fifth sonne of King Edward, borne unto him by Queene Edgiva his third and last wife, at the age of nineteene yeares succeded his brother King Ethelstan in his Kingdome and Monarchy: hee began his raigne the yeare of the worlds salvation, nine hundred and fourty, and with great solemnity was crowned at Kingstone upon Thamisis, in the fifth yeare of Otho, the first Emperour of that name, and his brother in Law; his valour had often been tried in the wars of King Ethelstan against those stout and sturdy enemies the Danes, Scottish, Irish, and Welchmen, that often had assailed to disturbe his peace.

Simon Dun.

(2) Athelstan deceased, and the crowne scarce set upon King Edmunds head, but that the Danes in Northumberland, disliking subjection, called againe Anlafe out of Ireland to be their King; who now in the infancie infancy of Edmunds estate, with great power of men purposed to subdue all before him; but Edmund as forward, with full resolution meant to keepe what was got; and so gathering his power, proceeded towards the North, and at Leicester encountred with the Danes: howbeit, through the interceding of the Archbishops of Canterburie and Yorke, Odo and Wolstan, the matter was mitigated before it came to the uttermost.

An. Dom. 942. Matth. West.

(3) The next yeere of his raigne, the said Anlafe (whom some hold to have beene the King of Norway) being dead, an other Anlafe, sonne to King Sithrick, of whom wee have spoken, intruded upon the kingdome of Northumberland. These heads, as Hidraes, springing up each after other, drew King Edmund againe into the North, who raging like a provoked Lion, subdued, as hee went, those townes where the Danes kept, and got from them Lincolne, Leicester, Darbie, Stafford, and Nottingham, compelling them to receive Baptisme, and to become his Subjects; so that the Country was wholy his unto Humber. These his proceedings caused Anlafe and Reinold the sonnes of the Danish Gurmo, subducers of Yorke, to yeeld themselves wholly to his devotion, offering him subjection, and withall to receive the Christian faith; for performance whereof, they likewise received Baptisme, unto whom King Edmund was God-father, to Reinold at his Confirmation, and to Anlafe at the Font: but how soone they fell from both, the sequell shewed; for casting off the faith and fealty thus promised, they stirred the Northumbrians to another rebellion, yet with no better successe then desert; for they were forced into a perpetuall exile, and King Edmund adioined that Country to his owne government, without the admittance of any Secondary or Vice-roy to rule there under him.

Will. Malmsb.

An. Dom. 944. Simon Dunel.

(4) Cumberland also, which seldome was quiet, having beene a Kingdome entire of it selfe, and now aided by Leolin King of Southwales, he utterly wasted; and apprehending the two sonnes of Dunmaile King of that Province, commanded the eyes of those over-bold Princes to be puld out, and gave their inheritance to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold the same by fealty from him. Thus by power and policie clearing those coasts whence the sharpest stormes had continually blowne, hee returned into the South, and there see himselfe to ordaine lawes for the good of his people, the which, lest time the consumer of all things might chance to obliterate, were by the labours of the learned Lambert translated into Latine, and imprinted in the yeere 1568. next, to shew his love to God, and bountie to his Church, hee gave the towne of Saint Edmundsbury with the liberties thereof, wholly to that Martyr, and to the Monks that lived in serving at his Altars.

(5) But as each thing hath his spring, growth, and decay; so all men their dates, howsoever eminent in degree, and the shank of their compas so set in a center that the Circle of their lines are oftentimes abrupt, before it be drawne to the full round. For so with others wee may see in this Monarchy, who being safely returned from many great dangers of war, at peace in his Palace, came to a lamentable and unexpected end: for at his Manor of Pucle-kerker in the County of Glouester, whiles hee interposed himselfe betweene his Sewer and one Leove to part a fray, was, with a thrust through the body, wounded to death the twenty sixth of May, in the yere of our salvation 946. when hee had prosperously raigned the space of five yeeres and seven moneths, and his body, with no lesse sorrow then solemnity, was buried at Glastenbury.

(6) Elfgine, the onely wife of King Edmund, hath not her parents declared (for ought I finde) by any of our Writers: but this is affirmed, that she was married unto him in the first yeere of his raigne, which was the yeere of grace, 940. and that she was his wife foure yeeres and upward, after whose slaughter she remained a mournfull widdow all the rest of her life, which she spent with so great vertue and opinion of the people, as by the Writers of that age shee is commended to posteritie by the name of a Saint.

(7) Edwy, the eldest sonne of King Edmund, and Queene Elfgine his wife, was borne in the second yeere of his fathers raigne Anno 942. When his father died, hee was but foure yeeres of age, and in respect of his minority was not permitted to succeed him in the Kingdome, but forced to give place to his uncle Edred, under whom he lived nine yeeres: and in the tenth, his uncle being dead, and himselfe then growne to the age of thirteene, was admitted to the succession of the Monarchy.

Edwy.

(8) Edgar the second sonne of King Edmund, and of Queen Elfgine, was borne in the third yeere of his fathers raigne, the yeere of Christ Iesus 943, and was but three yeeres old when his Father died; notwithstanding, he proved afterward a Prince of great expectation, and in the second yere of King Edwy his brothers raigne, being then but fourteene yeeres of age, hee was chosen King by the Mercians and Northumbrians, both which people hee governed under the title of King of Mercia, for the space of two yeeres before his brothers death, and then succeeded him in the whole Monarchy.

EDRED THE TVVENTY SEVENTH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTY EIGHTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER. XL.

An. Dom. 946.

EDred, the sixth sonne of King Edward, borne unto him by Queene Edgiva his third and last wife, at the age of twenty three yeares succeeded his brother King Edmund in the nonage of his children in all his Dominions, and was the twenty seventh King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty eight Monarch of the Englishmen. He began his raigne in the yeare of mans salvation 946. and was anointed, and crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, in the County of Surrey, upon Sunday the seventeenth day of August, by the hands of Otho Archbishop of Canterbury.

Polyd. lib. 6. 8.

(2) His Coronation robes scarcely put off; newes was brought him that the Northumbrians had revolted and stirred a dangerous insurrection, notwithstanding the Covenants that his brother Edmund had made with Malcolme King of the Scots, to secure the same. Therefore lest delayes might prove dangerous, with a great Armie he entred into the verge of Scotland, without sight of enemie, or any resistance. But peace being concluded betwixt Edred, Malcolme, and the Northumbrians; yea and the same confirmed strongly by oath, yet was it little regarded of the last named Iurers; for no sooner was Edred returned, but that they sent into Ireland for Anlafe, the sonne of Gurmo the Dane, who had beene expelled the Countrey, as we have said.

Edred. Malcolme.

Anlafe commeth into Northumberland.

(3) Anlafe gathering a Fleet and Forces accordingly, came into Northumberland, where hee was with great joy received and made their King, which title he maintained for foure yeares continuance, banding against Edred, and still holding him play, till lastly the Northumbrians disloyall to both, tooke their feather out of Anlafe his Plume, and sent him packing to the place, whence he came, electing one Heric King in his stead.

(4) Edred awaked with the wastes that they made prepared a journey into those parts, where with fire and sword he bare downe all before him; and albeit he was a man religiously bent, yet spared he not the Abbey of Rippon from flames, but laid all unto ashes as he went, the enemy not daring to shew his face. In his returne, suspecting no perill, suddenly an hoast brake out of Yorke, and fell upon the Rere-ward of his Army, marching but carelesly, and broken out of their array, whereby many perished before any complete order of resistance could be made. The King seeing this bold attempt of these Rebels, stroke down his Standard, turning his face againe to the North, and threatned the revenge, with the Countries spoile and their lives.

Rend. Hig. Simon Dun.

(5) In this plot of sedition Wolstan Archbishop of Yorke had sowne some seed of treason, both in the affistance of action, and counsell for the enterprise, very ill befeeming a man of his ranke: this Wolfe therefore having thus awaked the Lion from rest, was the onely man that fell in his pawes; for the Northumbrians expulsing their stateless Hericus, with submissive teares and golden showres, so pacified the King, that their offences were therewith cleane washed away: but hee good man (a Saint at the least) was mued up in prison (against whom accusations daily came, and namely, that hee had commanded sundry of the Burgesses of Thetford to bee slaine) where hee abode till he was by Edred upon a reverent regard of his calling, released from thence: for as this King is commended for his lenity towards the vertuous; so is hee no lesse for his justice towards the vicious: and for the practise of his Religion, as forward as any, suffering not onely his manners to be reproved and corrected, (a quality truely royall, and best seeming Princes) but also (so much below the pitch of Soveraigne Majestie) his body to bee chastised at the will and direction of Dunstan Abbot of of Glastenbury; unto whose custody, he also committed the greatest part of his treasure and richest jewels to be locke in his chests, and under the keyes of this Monastery.

(6) The stately Abbey of Mich at Abington neere Oxford, built by King Ines, but destroyed by the Danes, he newly repaired, endowing it with lands and faire revenewes, and confirmed the Charters with seales of gold: hee also ordained Saint Germans in Cornwall to be a Bishops See, which there continued till by Canutus it was annexed to the Episcopall See of Kyrton in Devon; both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confessor translated to the City of Excester: but sith the brightest day hath his night, and the highest tide his present ebbe, what marvaile is it, if then Edred in the middest of his strength were seazed upon by sickneſſe and death: which surprised him after hee had raigned in great honour nine yeares and odde moneths, to the great greife of his Subjects who solemnely interred him in the old Minster within the City of Winchester, the yeare of Christ Iesus 955. whose bones with other Kings, to this day are preserved in a guilt Coffer, fixed upon the wall in the South side of the Quier.

His Issue.

(7) Elfred, the sonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King; neither find I mention of his Mother, or any act by him done; onely in the sixt yeare of King Edred his raigne, which was the yeare of grace, 952. he is mentioned for a witnesse to his Fathers grant of lands in Wittenham, to Ethelwolfe a Duke of England in those dayes, as appeareth by the Charter thereof, bearing date in the yeare aforesaid.

Elfred.

(8) Bertfrid another, and as it seemeth, an elder sonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King, without any mention also of his Mother, who living in the second yeare of his fathers raigne, namely Anno 948. was written for a witnesse in the same yeare, to his grant of lands in Bedlaking, to Cuthred one of his Barons, the Charter whereof is extant to be seene unto this day.

Malmsbur. fol. 33.

(2) Young hee was in yeares, and vicious of life, if the Monkish Story-writers of those times his deadly enemies may be credited, nor past thirteene when he entred government, and that begun with a capitall sinne: for they report, that upon the solemne day of his Coronation, and in sight of his Nobles, as they sate in Counsell, with shamelesse and unprincely lust, he abused a Lady of great estate, and his neere kinswoman, whose husband shortly after hee slew, the more freely to possesse his incestuous pleasure: and to fill the pennes of his further infamy ready to their hands, that wrote his life, hee was a great enemy unto the Monkish orders (a fore in those dayes very tender to be touched, and may well be thought the cause of many false aspersions on him) whom from the Monastery of Malmesburie, Glastenburie and others, hee expelled, placing married Priests in their roomes: Dunstan likewise, the Abbot of Saint Glastenbury, he banished the Realme, for his over-bold reprehensions; if not rather for retaining the treasure delivered him by King Edred, and demanded againe in his sicknesse; when by the voyce (forsooth) of an Angell from heaven, his journey was stayed, and those rich jewels not delivered the King in his life; I will not say kept backe, lest Dunstan with Balaam (whose stories are not much unlike) should be thought to follow (as hee did) the wages of deceit.

(3) Howsoever, the reverent opinion of the Monks single life, and the conceived holinesse of Abbot Dunstan in those misty times, did daily counterpoize young Edwy in esteeme, which made his best acts construed and recorded to the worst; insomuch that his Subjects minds ebbing as the Sea from the Full, drew backe the Current of their subjective affections, and set the eye of obedience upon Prince Edgar his Brother: and albeit his young yeares may seeme to cleare him from the imputation of so lustfull a fact, as he is charged with, at the day of his assuming the Crown; and the separation from his wife (as too neere in consanguinity) wrought griefe enough in his distressed heart, yet pitilesse of his estate, and careless of their own allegiance, the Mercians with the Northumbrians did utterly cast off obedience, and sware their fealty to Edgar, not fully foureteene yeares aged: Edwy then raigning in a still decaying estate; was held of such his subjects, in no better esteeme; then was Iehoram of Iudah, who is said to have lived without being desired: for very griefe whereof, after foure yeares raigne he ended his life, the yeare of our Lord, 959. whose body was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hide at Winchester, erected without the Wall in the North of that Citie.

His Wife.

(4) Elfgive, the wife of King Edwy, was a Lady of great beauty, and nobly descended, yea, and by some deemed somewhat too neare in the bloud Royall, to bee matched with him in Spousall bed: her fathers name is not recorded, but her mother was Ethelgive, whom some scandalized to have beene his Concubine, and the onely causer of Dunstanes banishment. The Subjects disliking of this unlawfull marriage, and further infligated by the Monks, (whose humorous pleasures, or displeasure, could very much sway the State in those dayes,) failed by degrees to performe their duties to their King, and her they likewise enforced to a separation, in the third yeare of of his regardlesse government, and of Christ Iesus, 958. without other mention of her life or death.

EDGAR SVRNAMED THE PEACEABLE, THE THIRTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN: HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES AND ISSVE.

Chapter. XLII.

Edgar, the second sonne of King Edmund having raigned two yeares over the Mercians and Northumbrians, in the dayes of Edwy his brother, to the great impairing of King Edwyes reputation and esteeme; after his death at sixteene yeares of age was chosen to succeed in all his Dominions, and was the thirtieth Monarch of the Englishmen, or rather now of whole England, all other Titles of Kingdome falling under his Scepter, and becomming Provinces annexed unto his absolute Monarchy.

(2) Hee began his raigne in the yeare of Christs Nativity, 959. and was crowned (as some write) the same yeare at Kingston, upon Themesis, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury. But Randulphus Higden in his Polychronicon, referreth it to the twelfth yeare of his raigne: William Monke of Malmesbury to the thirteenth yeare of his age, and the Saxon Chronicle of of Worcester Church, to the yeare of Christ, 972. and that in the City of Bath, he was anointed and consecrated with great solemnity by Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury.

(3) The raigne of this King is said to have beene altogether in a calme tranquillity, and therefore hee was surnamed the Peaceable; his vertues were many, and vices not a few, the one gloriously augmented, and the other fairely excused, by those Monkish Writers, unto whose professions hee was most favourable: his Guides were Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, Ethelwold Abbot of Glastenbury, and Oswald Bishop of Worcester, three stout Champions against the married Clergy, (for women in those dayes were great bugs in their eyes,) therefore the married Priests he displaced, and brought in Monkes of single life to possesse their roomes, whose sinnes of incontinency grew after to be great, as the world did then witnesse, which caused Trevisa the translator of Higden, to blame King Edgar, charging him to be lewdly moved in following their counsell against married Clerkes.

(4) So doe Malmsbury and Higden taxe him with too favourable affections towards the Danes, who dwelled alike in every town with the English, though formerly they had sought the destruction of all, and still lay in wait attending for the spoile of his true Subjects, who apt enough unto evill, learned the beastly sinne of quaffing, and emptying their Cups, which King Edgar was enforced to redresse, by enacting a law against excessive drinking, ordaining a size by certaine pinnes set in the pot, with penalties to any that should presume to drinke deeper then the marke.

(5) His Policy was no lesse prudent (but much more successefull) for the destruction of Wolves, that in his dayes did great annoyance to the land: for the tribute imposed on the Princes of Wales, by the English king Ethelstan (as we have said,) he wholly remitted, and in lieu thereof, appointed certaine numbers of Wolves yearely to be paid; and Ievaf, or Iage, Prince of North-Wales, did for his part pay him yearly three hundred; which continued for three yeares space, but in the fourth was not a Wolfe to be found, and so the tribute ceased.

(6) His Navie Royall, containing three thousand and sixe hundred ships, he divided into three parts, appointing every of them to a severall quarter to waffe the Seas, and secure the coasts from Pirats, and forraine enemies; wherein himselfe every Summer would saile with those in the East parts, unto those in the West, and sending them backe to their charge, would with the West saile into the North, and with the Northerne Fleet compasse againe into the East, whereby the Seas were scowred, and his Kingdome exceedingly strengthned.

(7) The like custome used he in the winter season in his iesyls, and circuits throughout his Country, so to take account of the administration of his lawes, and the demeanour of his great men, especially of his Iudges, whom severely hee punished, so often as he found the execution of their places ballanced either with bribery or partiality; so that there was never lesse robbery, deceit or oppressions, then in the raigne of this worthy King.

(8) His state thus flourishing in peace and prosperity, he caused divers Princes to bind themselves unto his allegiance, but perchance it may justly bee doubted, whether in such performance of homage and service, as Malmsbury, Florentius, Randulphus, Marianus, Hoveden, and other Writers affirme to have beene at the City Chester, where (they say) Kenadie King of Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Maxentius an Arch-Pirate, with the petty King of Wales, Dufnall, Griffith, Huwal, Iacob, and Iudithil, did with oares row his Barge upon the River Dee, from his Pallace to Saint Iohns Church, and thence againe backe to his Pallace, himselfe the while steering the helme, and saying in his glory, that then his successors might truely account themselves Soveraigne Kings of England, when they enjoyed such a prerogative of Sublimity, and supreme honour: although (saith M. Fox) hemight much better, and more Christianlike, have said, God forbid that I should rejoyce, but in the Crosse of our Lord Iesus Christ.

(9) Warres he had none in all his raigne; onely towards the end, the Welshmen mooved some rebellion, which to prevent, hee assembled a mighty Army, and therewith entred into the Countrey of Glamorgan, sharply punishing the Ring-leaders thereof; but his souldiers doing great harmes in the country, laden with spoyles for the returne, the King out of his bounty commanded all to be againe restored, whereby he purchased singular love and honour of the Inhabitants.

(10) To his magnanimity was joyned much devotion, but most especially towards the Monks, for whom, and for Nunnes hee built and repaired forty seven Monasteries, intending to have continued their number unto fifty; as himselfe testifieth in these words of his Charter.

The Monasteries, as well of Monks as of Virgins, have beene destroyed, and quite neglected, throughout England which I have now determined to repaire to the glory of God for my soules health, and so to multiply the number of Gods servants and handmaids: and now already I have set up forty seven Monasteries with Monks and Nunnes in them, and if Christ spare me life so long, I am determined in offering my devout munificence to God to proceed to fifty, even to the just number of a Iubile.

And by this his Charter did not onely approove the enlargement of S. Maries Monastery in Worcester, and the restoring of Votaries instead of married Priests, but himselfe either new founded or repaired many others, as the house of Ely, Glastenbury, Abington, Burgh, Thorney, Ramsey, Wilton, Wenton, Winchorne and Thumstocke, with great cost, and large endowments, having the Clergy in an high and reverend esteeme, and most of all his Confessor Dunstan: but with this wheate, there were tares growing, though the late Monkish Writers binde them up for good corne: for some men tell (saith Randulphus Higden) that Edgar in his beginning was cruell to Citizens, and lecherous to maidens, whereof these his actions ensuing beare sufficient witnesse.

(11) The first was committed against the Virgin Wolfhield, a sacred Nunne as some affirme, though others somewhat mitigating that sacrilegious offence, have reported, that she to avoid his fleshly and lascivious lust, was forced to take the habit of a Menchion upon her, and in the same brought to his bed, wherein the chaste Saint Edith was begot, and for whom, say they, hee under went his seven yeares penance without the wearing of his Crowne.

(12) A like offence hee committed against the Virgin Ethelfleda, the daughter of Ordmar a Duke among the East-Angles, who for her surpassing beauty was surnamed the White; on whom he begat his eldest sonne Edward; for which fact as M. Fox affirmeth, hee did his seven yeares pennance injoyned by Dunstan: and indeed by Osberne it appeareth, that Edward was not legitimate, where he writeth, that the child begotten of the Harlot, hee baptized in the holy fountaine of regeneration, and so giving his name to bee called Edward, did adopt him to be his sonne. With whom agree Nicholas Trivet in his English Story, written in French, Iohannes Paris in his French Story, written in Latine, both of them calling Edward a sonne illegitimate; as also doth Vincentius and Antoninus, howbeit William of Malmesbury, Matthew Paris, Matthew of Westminster, Randulphus and others, will have her his first and lawfull wife, and Edward in true Matrimony to have descended from them.

(13) Another instance of his lascivious life is produced by the forenamed Writers, and thus both occasioned and acted. It chanced Edgar to heare a Virgin and daughter to a Westerne Duke, exceeding dingly praised for her incomparable beauty, the touch of which string from his eare refounded to his heart, and as a bait it drew him presently into those parts; where comming to Andever, commanded the Damosell to his bed: The mother tender of the Virgins honour, brought in the darke her maide, but not her daughter, who, as well pleased the King in his sinfull dalliance: the day approaching, this late laid maid made haste to arise: but the King loth to part yet with his supposed faire Lady, demanded why she made such haste? Who answered him, that her taske was great, and hardly would her worke be done, if day should prevent her ere the rose: but yet being stayed above her houre, upon her knees she made this humble request, that shee might be freed from her shrewde dame, alleadging, it was not fitting, that the woman who had tasted the pleasures of a Kings embracements, should endure a servitude under the rule of any other. The King perceiving the deceit, and therewith moved to wrath, yet could not recall what hee had done (or rather undone) and therefore turned his conceived wrongs unto a jest: but so, that he both sharpely checked the deceiver, and kept this Damsell, (whose nightworke and pleasance had fully wonne him) for his Concubine, whereby shee ruled them that lately had the command of her: and to use the words of Malmsbury, he loved his Concubine most entirely: keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, untill the time hee married for his lawfull wife Elfrida the daughter of Duke Ordgarus.

Malmsf. de regibus.

Duke Ordgarus

(14) His last lascivious Act, was as Davids joyned with blood, and wrought in manner as followeth. Fames lavish report of beaureous Elfrida (the Paragon of her Sexe, and wonder of Nature) the onely daughter of Ordgarus Duke of Devonshire, sounded so loud in those Westerne parts, that the Eccho thereof was heard into King Edgars Court, and entred his eares which ever lay open, to give his eyes the scope of desire, and his wanton thoughts the raines of will: to try the truth whereof, hee secretly sent his minion or favourite Earle Ethelwolfe of East-Anglia, who well could judge of beauty, and knew the diet of the King; with Commission, that if the Pearle prooved so orient, it should be seized for Edgars owne wearing, who meant to make her his Queene, and Ordgarus the Father of a King.

Ethelwold.

Ethelwold a jolly young Gallant, posted into Devonshire, and guest-wise visited Duke Ordgarus his Court, where seeing the Lady surpassing the report, blamed Fames over-sight for founding her praise in so base and leaden a Trumpet; and wholly surprised with her love, himselfe beganne to wooe the Virgin, yea, and with her Fathers good liking, so as the King would give his assent. Earle Ethelwold returning, related that the maide indeed was faire; but yet her beauty much augmented by babling reports, and neither her feature or parts, any wise befitting a King. Edgar mistrusting no corrivall in his love, nor dreaming false fellowship in wooing, did with a sleight thought passe over Elfrida, and pitcht his affections the faster another way. Earle Ethelwold following the game now afoot, desired Edgars assistance to bring it to a stand, pretending not so much for any liking to the Lady, as to raise his owne fortunes to be her fathers heire; to which the King yeelded, and for his minion solicited Ordgarus, who glad to be shrowded under the favours of such a favourite, willingly consented; and his daughters destinies assured to Earle Ethelwold.

Edgar a suter for Ethelwold.

The marriage solemnized, and the fruits thereof a short time enjoyed, the fame of her beauty beganne againe to be spread; and that with a larger Epithete then formerly it had beene: Whereupon Edgar much doubting of double dealing, laid his angle faire to take this great gull: and bearing no shew of wrong or suspect, invited himselfe to hunt in his Parks, and forthwith repairing into those parts, did not a little grace his old servant, to the great joy of Edgars plot to discover Ethelwold.

Ordgarus the Duke. But Ethelwold mistrusting the cause of his comming, thought by one policy to disappoint another: and therefore revealing the truth to his wife, how in his proceedings he had wronged her beauty, and deceived his Soveraigne, requested her loving assistance to save now his endangered life, which lay in her power, and of the meanes hee thus advised.

Ethelwolds speech to gi. frida.

"Like as (said he) the richest Diamond rough and "uncut, yeelds neither sparkle or esteeme of great "price, nor the gold unburnished gives better lu-"stre then the base brasse; so beauty and feature "clad in meane array, is either sleightly looked at "with an unfixed eye, or is wholly unregarded, and "held of no worth; for according to the Proverbe, "cloth is the man, and man is the wretch; then to "prevent the thing that I feare, and is likely to prove "my present time, and thy last wracke, conceale thy "great beauty from King Edgars eye, and give him "entertainment in thy meanest attires: let them "(I pray thee) for a time be the nightly Curtaines "drawne about our new-Nupciall bed, and the day-"ly cloudes to hide thy splendent Sunne from his "sharpe, and too too piercing sight, whose vigour "and Raies will soone set his Waxen wings on fire, "that ready are to melt at a farre softer heat. Pitch "(thou feest) defileth the hand, and we are forbid to "give occasion of evill: vaile then thy faireneste "with the scarfes of deformity, from his over-lavish "and unmastred eye; for the faireft face drawes ever "the gaze, if not the attempts: and natures endow-"ments are as the bush for the wine, which beeing "immoderately taken doth surfet the sense, and is a-"gaine cast up with as loathsome a taste. Of these "dregs drunke Amnon after his fill of faire Thamar, "Herod of Miriamy, and Aeneas of Dido; yea, and "not to seeke examples farre off, King Edgars varia-"tion on his unstedfast motion doth easily bewray it "selfe, for could either holy Wolfhield, beautifull "Ethelfled, or the wanton Wench of Andever, keepe "the needle of his Compasse certaine at one point? "nothing lesse, but it was still led by the Load-stone "of his ever-mutable and turning affections. But "thou wilt say, he is religious, and by founding of "Monasteries hath expiated those sinnes. Indeed "many are built; for which, time and posteritie "must thanke holy Dunstan, from whose devotion "those good deeds have sprung: but is thy person "holier then sacred Wolfields? thy birth and beauty "greater then Ethelfled the White, daughter also to a "Duke? The former, of any holy Votary, he made "the sinke of his pollution; and the later is branded "to all ages by the hatefull name of a Concubine, "and her sonne among us esteemed for a Bastard. "These should be motives to all beaureous and ver-"tuous Ladies, not to sell their honours at so low "and too-late repented a price. Neither think (sweet "Countesse) that thy husband is jealous, or suspects "thy constancy, which I know is great, and thy selfe "wholly complete with all honourable vertues: but "yet consider I pray thee, that thou art but yong, and "maist easily be caught, especially of him that is so "old a Master of the Game: neither perswade thy "selfe of such strength, as is able to hold out so "great an assault; for men are mighty, but a King is "much more. I know thou art wise, and enough "hath been said, onely let me adde this, that evill "beginnings have never good ends: and so with a "kind kisse, hoping hee had wonne his Wife to his "Will, prepared with the first to welcome King "Edgar.

Lady Elfrida thus left to her selfe, began seriously to thinke upon this Curtain Sermon, whose Text she distasted, being taken out of an over-worne and threed-bare cloth proverbe, as though her fortunes had been wholly residing, and altogether consisting in her parentage and apparell, but nothing at all in any parts of her selfe.

"Hath my beauty (thought she) beene courted of a King

Elfrida alone

"a King, famoused by report, compared with Helens "and now must be hid? Must I falsifie and bely Na-"tures bounties, mine owne value, and all mens re-"ports, only to save his credite, who hath impaired "mine, and belied my worth? And must I needs de-"faile my selfe, to be his onely faire foule, that hath "kept me from the State and seat of a Queene? I "know the name of a Countesse is great, and the "Wife of an Earle is honourable, yet no more then "birth and endowments have assigned for me, had "my beauty been far lesse then it is. He warns me of "the end, when his owne beginnings were with tre-"chery; tels me the examples of others, but observes "none himselfe: he is not jealous, forsooth, and yet I "must not looke out; I am his faire, but others pitch, "fire, wine, bush, and what not? Not so holy as Wolf-"hild, nor so white as Ethelfled, and yet that must now "be made far worse then it is. I would men knew the "heate of that Cheeke wherein beauty is bla-"zed, then would they with lesse suspect suffer our "faces unmaskt, to take aire of their eyes, and wee no "whit condemnable for shewing that which cannot "be hid, neither in me shall, become of it what will.

Ethelfrides difsimulation.

And thus resoluing to bee a right woman, defired nothing more then the thing forbidden, and made preparation to put it in practise. Her body sheeendulced with the sweeteste balmes, displaied her haire, and bespangled it with pearles, bestrewed her breasts and bosome with rubies and diamonds, rich Iewels glittering like starres depended at her necke, and her other ornaments every way sutable. And thus, rather Angell, then Lady-like, shee attended the approach and entrance of the King, whom with such faire obeisance and seemly grace she received, that Edgars greedy eye presently collecting the raies of her shining beauty, became a burning glasse to his heart; and the sparkle of her faire, falling into the traine of his love, set all his senses on fire: yet dissembling his passions, he passed on to his game, where having the false Ethelwold at advantage, he ranne him thorow with a Iaveline, and tooke faire Elfrida to his wife.

Ethelwold slaine.

(15) These were the vertues and vices of this King, little in personage, but great in spirit, and the first unresisted Monarch of the whole Land, whom all the other Saxons acknowledged their supreme, without division of Provinces or title. He raigned sixteen yeeres and two moneths in great tranquillity and honour, and died upon tuesday the eighth of July, the thirty seventh of his age, and yeere of Christ 975. whose body with all funerall solemnity was buried in the abbey of Glastenbury.

His Wives.

(16) Ethelfled, the first wife of King Edgar, was surnamed in the Saxon English Eneba, in Latine Candida, which with us is White, because of her exceeding great beauty. Shee was the daughter of a Duke amongst the East-Angles, named Ordmar, and was married unto him the second yeere of his raigne, and the eighteenth of his age, being the yeere of Christs Nativity 961. She was his wife not fully two yeeres, and died the fourth of his raigne, in anno 962.

Ethelfleds parentage.

(17) Elfrida, the second wife of King Edgar, was the widow of slaughtered Ethelwold, of whom wee have said. She was daughter to Ordgarus, and sister to Ordulfe, both of them Dukes of Devonshire, and the Founders of Tawestoke abbey in that Country: a Ladie of passing great beauty, and as ambitious as faire: for after the Kings death, she procured the murther of King Edward her sonne in law, that her owne son

Edward might came to the crowne: and afterwards to pacifie his and her first husbands ghost, and to stop the peoples speeches of so wicked a fact, she founded the Abbeys of Ambresbery and Whorwell, in the Counties of Wiltshire and Southampton.

His Children.

(18) Edward, the eldest sonne of King Edgar and Queene Ethelfled his first wife, was born in the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne, and a little before his mothers death, in the yeare of Christ Iesus, 962. He was a child disposed to all vertue, notwithstanding great meanes was made by his mother in law for the disinheriting of him, and the preferment of her owne son to the succession of the Crowne; yet by provident care taken in the life time of his father, he succeeded him after his death, as right heire both of his kingdome and conditions.

6 heard the eldest sonne.

(19) Edmund, the second sonne of King Edgar, and the first of Queene Elfrida his second wife, was borne in the seventh yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace 965. He lived but foure yeeres; and died in his infancy, in the twelfth yeere of his fathers raigne, and was honourably enterred in the Monasterie of Nunnes, at Ramsey in Hampshire, which king Edgar had founded.

Edmund the second sonne.

(20) † Ethelred, the third sonne of Edgar, and the second of Queene Elfrida his second wife, and the last of them both, was borne in the eighth yere of his fathers raigne, and yere of salvation 966. He was vertuously inclined, beautifull in complexion, and comly offstature; at the death of his father being but seven yeres old, and at his brothers murther ten: which deed he fore lamented, to the great discontentment of his mother, who for his advancement had complotted the same, and wherein at those yeeres he unwillingly succeeded him.

Ethelred the third sonne.

(21) Edgith, the naturall daughter of King Edgar, had to her mother a Lady named Wolfhild, the daughter of Wolfhelm, the sonne of Byrding, the sonne of Nesling, the two latter bearing in their names the memory of their fortunes: the last of them being found in an Eagles nest, by king Elfred as he was on hunting. This Edgith was a vailed Nunne in the Monastery of Wilton, and according to some Authors, made Abbesse thereof by her father at fifteene yeeres of age, saith her Legend. She died the fifteenth day of September, the yeere of her age twenty three; the sixth of her brother King Ethelreds raigne, and of Christ Iesus 984. By all which accounts it is manifest, that she was borne before Edward, and by master Fox proved, that for him, and not for her, King Edgar did his seven yeeres penance. She is greatly commended for her chastitie and beauty, which later she somewhat augmented with more curious attire then to her profession was beseeming; for which Bishoppe Ethelwold sharpely reprooved her; who answered him roundly that God regarded the heart more then the garment, and that sins might bee covered as well under rags as robes.

This Edgith, as Iohn Capgrave reporteth, after the slaughter of her brother Edward, the holy archbishop Dunstan would have advanced to the Crown, and invested her against Ethelred the lawfull heire, had shee not by the late experience of Edwards fall, utterly refused that title, which neither belonged to her right, nor was safe for her person to undertake. Her body was buried at Wilton, in the Monastery and Church of Saint Denisse, which her selfe had caused to bee built.

MEN, HIS RAIGNE AND DEATH.

Monarch 31.

CHAPTER. XLIII.

An. Dom. 975. Simon Dun. Roger. Aruen.

GReat were the troubles and sidings that presently ensued the death of King Edgar, about the election of one of his sonnes to succeed; Queene Elfrida with Alferus Duke of Mercia, and many other Nobles combined for young Ethelred, disavowing Prince Edward as illegitimate, and therefore not reputable for succession: against them and Ethelred stood Dunstan and the Monks, holding their states dangerous, and their new-gotten footing unsure, if in the nonage of the King, these their opposites should rule all, under him; whereas Edward was altogether wrought in their mould; whose title they abetted, as being lawfully borne, and begot in the nuptiall bed of Queene Ethelfleda. Their claims thus banded amongst these Statesmen, began to be diversly affected among the Commons, and had put the game to the hazard, if the wisedome of Dunstan had not seene the chase; for a Councell being assembled to argue their rights, the Arch-bishop came in with his Banner and Crosse, and not staying for further debating de jure, did de facto, present Prince Edward for their lawfull King; and the assembly consisting most of Clergy men, perswading peace, drew the approbation of the rest, and so was the Prince admitted and proclaimed their Soveraigne.

Edward the son of Ethelfleda.

An. Dom. 975.

(2) He beganne his raigne at twelve yeares of age in the yeare of salvation 975. and was soone after by Archbishop Dunstan crowned King at Kingstone upon Thames: being the thirty one Monarch (since Hengist) of the Englishmen. His beginning was miserably afflicted with barrennesse of the ground, famine amongst his people, murraine of Cattle, and to their further terrour, a feared Comet appeared; which men thought to be signes from heaven, as sent from God, for the sinnes committed against the married Clergy, whose cause was much pitied, especially of the Nobles, & whose complaints of wrongs they instantly urged, that without deserts they were expulsed from their ancient possessions; a thing which neither God nor good men ever allowed, and was contrary to the prescript rule of Christ, that wils us to doe as we would be done unto; whereto the Monks answered, that Christ respected neither the person nor the place, but onely them that took up the Crosse of Penance and followed him, as themselves in their single life pretended to doe. But they good men little knew the incumbrances of wiving; for otherwise they would have felt, that the condition of the married, was more truly a suffering of the Crosse and enduring of Penance.

Will. Malmsb. Fox.

(3) These Church-men thus divided and rent, were diversly sided as affection did move, and that not onely of the meaner sort, but even of the Nobles and great ones; for the Mercian Duke Alferus favouring the just cause of married Priests, destroyed the Monasteries in his Province, cast out the Monkes and restored againe the ancient revenewes to them and their wives: contrariwise, in East-Anglia the Priests went to wracke, where the Monks were maintained by the authority of Edelwin their Duke, who in their quarrell, with the assistance of his brother Alfred, and of Brigtnoth Earle of Essex, raised a mighty Army, and stood with that power for their defence.

(4) The fire thus blowne from a sparke to a flame, was feared to mount higher, if not quenched in time, and therefore by mediation, Armes laid aside, the cause was referred to be heard in Councell, & at Winchester first the assembly was held, where after long dispute, and much against the Monkes, it was greatly suspected their side had gone down, but that the matter was referred from them to the Roode, placed upon on the refectory Wall, where the Councell sate. To this great Oracle Saint Dunstan desired them devoutly to pray, and to give diligent eare for an answer: who, with as great bounty, as they in devotion, made it not squemish to give them this advice; God forbid it should be so, God forbid it should be so (said he,) you judged well once, and to change that againe is not good.

This was authority sufficient to suppresse the Priests, who now with their wives went downe the wind; and indeed too blame they were to suspect his their Iudge, who never was heard to give wrong sentence before; but they unsatisfied men, thought once more to blow the coales, though therewith they were likely to burne their owne lips; for perswading the people, that this was but a subtile practice of the Monkes, in placing behind the wall a man of their owne, who through a truncke uttered those words in the mouth of the Roode; it was therefore instantly desired, that the cause might once more come to scanning.

(5) This lastly was granted, and a great assembly congregated at Cleve in Wilshire, whither repaired the Prelates with most of the States of the land, besides Gentlemen and Commons an innumerable fort.

A heavy mischance.

This Synode being set; and the controversie propounded, a hot and sharpe disputation ensued, and a while was maintained with many bitter invectives; ill beseeming such persons. But whether through the weakeneſſe of the foundation, or the over-presse of weight, or both, the joysts of this upper-loft, wherein the Councell was held, suddainely brake, and downe fell the floore with all the people thereon, whereof many were hurt, and some slaine outright, onely Archbishop Dunstan then president, and mouth for the Monks, remained unhurt: for the Post whereon his chaire was set (and not without miracle) stood wholly untouched.

Polych. lib. 6. cap. 21.

Priests welcome one, but not without care.

Thus by this fall, fell the cause of the secular Priests and the Monkish foundations under propped with more surer pillars, Dunstan unburdened of many imputations, the peoples affections drawne to the Monkes, and the Priests at liberty now to accompany their wives without any cure, though not without care; and all this was wrought by the providence of Dunstan, and his strange preservation on the post; no lesse wonderfull then that which with the like truth is related of him, how when a huge beame of a house was sunke out of the frame, and like to ruinate the whole building, with onely making of the signe of the Crosse thereon with his fingers, hee made it returne to his former place: so wonderfully potent was he in such wooddea miracles. To which, why should wee not give credit, since the very Harpe which hee had touched, could worke miracles? as when of it selfe it founded melodiously that Hymne, Gaudent in cœlis animæ Sanctorum, &c. Yea sith the blessed Virgin Mary her selfe, is said to have come to solace him with her songs, Cantemus Domino Socia, &c. For, as for Angels singing familiarly unto him, and Divels in shape of Dogs, Foxes and Beares, whipped by him, that was but ordinary; as likewise his making the thee divell to roare, when comming to tempt him to dalliance in shape of a beautifull lasse, hee caught her by the nose with hot burning pincers, and so spoild a good face. His body found, was first buried at Warham without all funerall pompe, but after three yeeres by Duke Alferus removed, and with great celebrity enterred in the Minster of Shaftesbury: and for this untimely death, hee gained the surname of Martyr.

Ethelred.

ETHELRED COMMONLY CALLED THE VNREADY, THE TWO AND THIRTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS WARRES, RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 32.

CHAPTER. XLIIII.

An. Dom. 979. Vrst. Mcleod. Speed. Histor.

ETHELRED the sonne of King Edgar, and brother to King Edward the Martyr, at the age of twelve yeeres entred his goverment over the Englishmen, the yeere of mans salvation, nine hundred seventy nine, and was the two and thirtieth Monarch since King Hengist: he was crowned King at Kingston upon Thames the fourteenth of Aprill, being Easter day, by the hands of Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, who did it much against his will.

Ethelreds life, malitiously reported.

(2) Hee was a man neither forward inaction, nor fortunate in proceedings, and therefore commonly called the Vnready: his youth was spent in idlenesse, feeding his senses with all voluptuous baites; his middle yeares with careleese government, maintaining civill dissentions; and his latter end deservingly in continuall resistance of the bloud-thirsty Danes. With these imputations by Writers hee is taxed, though wee find no such just cause in recording his life; but to such extreames are even great Monarchs themselves brought, that their breath and dignity once left and laid downe, they are subject to the censures of every affectionate and malignant reporter. And that this King lay lyable to such mens humors, the working of Dunstan ever against him, is a sufficient witnesse, who not onely did refuse to act his Coronation, but would have preferred Lady Edgith a bastard before him to the Crowne, as wee have said. And besides the generall quarrell of the Monkes and married Priests, to which latter himselfe and his Abetters were better inclined; his just indignation conceived against the Bishop of Rochester, and that not pacified without the Bishops submission and payment of money, was cause inough for those Monkish Writers to brand the Lords Annointed with their markes of infamy, unto whom they impute the miseries of those times, and the destruction of the English by the intruding Danes.

Edgith.

Bishop of Rochester.

(3) These Danes had kept quiet ever since the disliked raigne of King Edwy, without any notable attempts, for the space of twenty two yeeres: but now perceiving the hearts of the subjects to bee drawne from their Soveraigne, they thought it a sufficient occasion to forward their intendments; and omitting no time, in the second of his raigne with seven ships they arrived upon the coast of Kent, spoiling the Country; but most especially the Iland Thanat, from whence they did great hurt likewise to the Towne of Southampton. The English led in the dislike of young Ethelreds government, were the rather drawne to impute these and other adversities to this unfortunate Prince, by reason of a prediction of Dunstan, who had prophesied, That they should not bee free from bloud and sword, till there came a people of an unknowne tongue, that should bring them to thraldome: and that opinion was skrewed deeper into their fearefull conceit, by a cloud appearing of bloud and fire, immediately after his unaffected Coronation.

Polydor. lib. 8 cap. 13.

(4) The next yeere, those roving Danes entred the British Seas; and coasting to Cornwall destroyed there the Abbey of Saint Patricke, Porland in Devonshire, and many other places upon those shores; the like was done unto Cheshire by the Norway-Pirates, which broke into those parts in the same yeare.

(5) And these calamities were seconded with others as fearefull; for in the yeare 982. the City London was miserably destroyed and defaced by fire; whose beauty then chiefely extended from Ludgate Westward: for, that within the wals, and where the heart heart of the City is now, was then neither beautifull, nor orderly built; what time also raged a sicknesse till then unknowne in England, which was a strong burning fever, and bloody fluxe, as also searsitie of victuals, and murraine among cattell. This hand of God thus correcting the sinnes of all, was received as sent for the offences of some few, and wholly imputed to the King and his Raisers; Dunstan still prophesying further woes to the land, when himselfe should be dead.

(6) The Danes hereupon more boldly assaulted each shore, and in so many places at once, that the English were to seeke, where first to withstand. In the West they were encountred by Gods Earle of Devonshire, as saith Simon Dunelmensis, by whom they were overthrowne, though with the losse of his life, as also of Sternwold a man of great esteeme and valour in those parts, who served there under him.

An. Dom. 991.

(7) In the East their Leaders Iustine and Guthmond warred with better successe; for at Malden in Essex they gave Brightnod the Earle, a great and bloody battell, wherein himselfe with most of his people were slaine. The Danes thus prospering, more boldly went forward, and where they set their talons, there they held fast, and lay on the land like unto Grashoppers. These evils King Ethelred could not redresse, his strengths being small, and his subjects affections lesse; therefore calling to Counsell his Statesmen and Peeres, demanded their advice what was best to be done. Some few of these proffered the King their assistance, but more of them perswaded unto a composition, whereof Siricius Archbishop of Canterbury was chiefe; and in fine, ten thousand pounds paid to the Danes for their departure.

(8) This golden Mine once entred, was more eagerly digged into, by these still-thirsting Danes, who finding the branch so beneficiall at first, hoped the veine in following, would proove farre more bountifull, and therefore regardlesse of promise, the next yeere prepared themselves againe for England, and with a great Fleete dispatched to Sea: the newes whereof strucke such terror into the English hearts, that despairing of hope, they accounted themselves the bond-slaves of misery: The King therefore with much adoe prepared a Navie, whereof hee made Elfrick Earle of Mercia Admirall; who setting from London unto the Seas, had power sufficient to put backe the enemy: but hee once a traitor could never proove true; for, having beene banished, forgiven, and now taken into favour, found meanes to bee false, and to betray his charge; and sending the enemy intelligence of his power and intents, gave the way to their escape; an another Fleet of Danes encountring with the Kings, at first hee faindly and faintly fought against; and lastly, turned to their side; through which treason many Englishmen died, and the Kings Fleete and power was greatly weakened; but hee escaping due punishment himselfe, lest his sonne to answer the fault, whose eyes King Ethelred caused to be put out.

(9) About which time also another Danish Fleet entring Humber, wasted the Countries of Yorkshire and Lyndsey: against these King Ethelred sent his power, under the charge of three valiant but treacherous Captaines, namely, Frena, Cadwin and Fredegist; for the battell but begun, these with their followers fled away, which was the occasion of a great overthrow of the English; notwithstanding the countrey people not able to digest their intollerable dealings, fell upon the Danes, slew some, and chased the rest. At what time also other of the Danes with ninetie foure ships sailed up the River Thamesis, and laid their siege against London, giving it a great assault; but the Citizens thereof so manfully defended themselves, that they chased the Danes thence to their shame and great losse: yet fell they so foule upon Essex, Kent, Suffex, and Hampshire, that the King was enforced to compound a peace, with the payment of sixteene thousand pounds: for confirmation whereof, Ethelred sent to Southampton for Anlafe these Norwegians King, and honourably entertained him at Andever, where the same time hee received Baptisme, King Ethelred taking him at the Font for his God-sonne, and with great gifts returned into Denmarke without any further harme done to the English.

(10) But God and destinie suffering it, (that would have the Saxons to fall before the Danes, as formerly the Britaines had done before them) no covenant could be so surely made, but was as slackly in them performed; for albeit this Anlafe honourably kept both faith and promise, yet others of his Country continued their invasions, and as another Hydra shewed their still reviving heads.

An. Dom. 997.

(11) For the nineteenth yeere of King Ethelreds most troublesome raigne, and of our salvation 997. the Danes with a great Fleete failed about Cornwall, and came into the mouth of Severn, robbing, as they went, Devonshire, Cornwall, and South Wales: and marching further into the Continent, consumed Lydford, and the Abbey of Saint Ordulfes at Efenstocke: thence passing thorow Dorsetshire with fire and sword, found not a man in the way to resist them, and wintering in the Wight lived by spoiles gotten in Hampshire and Suffex.

An. Dom. 998.

An. Dom. 999.

(12) The next spring they put into the mouth of Thamesis, and so by the river Medway arrived at Rochester: thither the Kentish with their strengths repaired, but unfortunately fought, and left the field to the Danes, who shortly after hoisted their sailes, and with a merry gale arrived in Normandy.

An. Dom. 1000.

(13) King Ethelred thus rid of these his unlooked for guests, fought to remove those leigers that lay in Cumberland, whither hee repaired, and with fore warre wasted the County, before whose sword the Danes were not able to stand; which somewhat encouraged the spirits of his people, and bettered their conceits towards him: but farre this sunne past not without a cloud, nor was his successe entailde to be fortunate.

Roger Houed. Annal. pars prim.

(14) For the next yeere, those Danes that departed from Kent, came now from Normandy with their full sailes, and landing in Exmouth, their first and greatest fury was against the City of Exceter, which when they fiercely besieged, they were so valiantly beaten by the Citizens, as that enraged above measure with the ignominy of that repulse, they thence as a sodaine cloud bare downe all that stood in their way; and then plainely beganne to appeare the ruse of the Danes, which every where lorded it, where they had to doe; and the fall of the Saxons, whose overtopped Monarchy, and weake walles now wanted props to hold up the weight; for the Captains of the English (saith Higden) wanting lore in deeds of Armes their direction never prospered; if ships were made, they never sped well, but were either chased of the enemy, or destroyed by tempest; if the Nobles ever assembled to consult of the State, that time was rather spent in whetting the spleene each against other, then jointly agreeing how to redresse their Present danger, or to represse the common enemy: for most of the Nobles were allianced into the Danish bloud, whereby not onely the secrets of those consultations were revealed, but being imployed in service, many of them revolted to the enemy. The Clergy as backward as any, denyed the King their assistance, pleading their exemptions from warre, and priviledge of the Church, when the land lay bleeding and deploring for helpe, and scandalized all his other proceedings for demanding their aide: to these were joined scarcity, hunger and robberies. These miseries caused the summes of their compositions to bee augmented, whose last was sixteene thousand, now twenty thousand, immediately twenty four, then thirty, and lastly, forty thousand pound untill the land was emptied of all the coine; the Kingdome of her glory; the Nobles of courage; the

(15) The Danes thus prevailing, did not a little glory in their fortunes; and grieved the poore English, whose service they employed to care and till the ground, whilest themselves sate idle, and ate the fruit of their paines, abusing the wives and daughters of their hosts where they lay, and yet in every place for feare and reverence were called the Lord-Danes (which afterwards became a word of derision to such sturdy and lazy lozels) so that the like daies of misery the land never felt. To redresse which, the carefull King Ethelred was farre too weake, and therefore intending to doe that by policy, which he could not by strength, he devised a desperate straragem that proov'ed the destruction of the Saxons royall blood, and conquest of the land to another nation.

Hoveden. Matthias.

Ethelred bad policy.

(16) For seeking to disburden the Realme of these devouring Danes, which by open force hee could no wayes doe, hee attempted in a bloody massacre to destroy them, giving a secret commission unto every City within his dominions, that at an appointed time they should set upon, and kill all the Danes; the day was the thirteenth of November, being the festivall of S. Briccius, the yeere of Christ Iesus 1002, and presently after his marriage with Emma, the flower of Normandy; in confidence of which amitie, he presumed to doe what he did. His command was accordingly performed, and with such rigour, that in Oxford the fearefull Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of Saint Frideswide, as into a Sanctuary of venerable antiquitie and priviledge among ancients Kings: but they in fury regarding neither place nor person, set the Church on fire, wherein were burned a great sort of those Danes with many rich ornaments, and the Library thereof utterly defaced. At which time (if Malmsbury say true) King Ethelred himselfe was in that Citie, and had summoned a Parliament both of Danes and English, with which even the King was much grieved: and therefore at his very great cost beautifully repaired the Church, and all the losses accreing by the fire, endowing it with large priviledges and donations, as appeareth by his owne Charter, mentioning the tenour of that Danish slaughter.

(17) Newes brought into Denmarke of this sudd aine stratagem, no need there was to urge them to revenge, or to adde more fuell unto that over kindled fire; for preparation being made, the yeere ensuing Swain with a great Navy landed in the West, spoiled the Country, and gave assault to the City of Exceter, which by the trechery of one Hugh a Norman (whom in the favour of the Queene, King Ethelred had made Governour of that City) he razed and levelled with the ground, all along from the Eastgate to the West.

This treason and stirres, great of themselves, but made much more rufull in the relating, caused Ethelred presently to muster his men; over whom hee made Earle Edrik (for his covetousnes surnamed Streon) his Generall, who bare a brave shew till it came to the push, and day of battle: but then to cover his treason, he fained himselfe sicke, and left his souldiers to shift as they could. The Danes hereupon rifled Wilton, & pasing forward tooke Salisbury in their way, to which they were as welcome as water into ships; but hearing that the King himselfe in person was preparing to give them battell, they left the land, and tooke againe to Sea.

From the North hee sought to spread his wings further into the South, and leaving his sonne Canute to take charge of his Ships, and new conquered Countries, sped himselfe through Mercia to Oxford and Winchester, bringing all under the power of his command; with which gales of his fortunes, hee was so puffed up, that thinking nothing unpossible for him and his Danes to doe, in the heat of his courage hee came unto London, and presently begirt the Wals with a strait siege.

(28) In the City lay unfortunate King Ethelred, who (as Simon Monke of Durham reporteth) had with him, and under his pay Turkillus the Danish Prince before spoken of, and forty five Danish ships to defend the coasts. King Swaine at his first comming fiercely assaulted the City, hoping his fortunes would have proved as before; but the prefence of the King, and London the eye of the land, made the Citizens above measure couragious, who beat the Danes from their Wals, and sallying forth of the Gates, slew them on heapes, so that Swaine himselfe was in great danger, had hee not desperately runne through the midst of his enemies, and by flight escaped their swords; marching both day and night in great feare untill hee had entred Bath, where Ethelmere Earle of Devonshire with his westerne people subsisted themselves unto him. But this saft overthrow, and want of victuals, caused him after hee had received a certaine summe of money, to haste into Denmarke, minding with more power, and better advantage to prosecute the quarrell.

A battell between Danes and English.

(29) Not long it was ere hee returned, and immediately was met by the English, where betwixt them was strucke a fierce battaile, which had beene with good successe, had not the treasons of some hindred it, in turning to the Danes. King Ethelred therefore seeing himselfe, and land betrayed in this manner, to those few true English, that were left, hee used this speech as follow.

Ethelreds Oration.

" (30) If there wanted in me a fatherly care, either for the defence of the Kingdome, or administration of justice in the common wealth, or in you " the courage of Souldiers for the defence of your " native Countrey; then truely silent would I bee " for ever, and beare these calamities with a more " dejected mind: but as the case stands (be it as it " is) I for my part am resolved to rush into the " midst of the enemy, and to lose my life for my " Kingdome and Crowne. And you (I am sure) " hold it a worthy death that is purchased for the " liberties of your selves and kindred; and therein I " pray you let us all dye, for I see both God and destiny against us, and the ruine of the English nation " brought almost to the last period; for wee are o- " vercome not by weapons and hoftile warre, but by " treason and domestike falsehood; our Navy be- " trayed into the Danes hands, our battaile weakened " by the revolt of our Captaines, our designes be- " wrayed to them by our owne Counsellors, and they " also inforcing compositions of dishonourable " peace; I my selfe disesteemed, and in scorne tear- " med Ethelred the unready: your valour and loyal- " ties betrayed by your owne leaders, and all our " poverty yeerely augmented by the payment of " their Dane-gilt, which how to redresse God one- " lie knoweth, and wee are to seeke: for if wee pay " money for peace, yea, and that confirmed by oath, " these enemies foone breake it, as a people that nei- " ther regard God nor man, contrary to equity and " the lawes of Warre, or of Nations: and so farre " off is all hope of better successe, as wee have cause

" to

Paines taking for safety.

"to feare the losse of our Kingdome, and you the "extinct of the English nations renowne; therefore "seeing the enemies are at hand, and their hands at "our throats; let us by foresight and counsell save "our owne lives, or else by courage sheath our "swords in their bowels: either of which I am wil- "ling to enter into, to secure our estate and nation "from an irrecoverable ruine.

(31) This lamentable Oration delivered from the passions of a justly-pensive King, touched the hearers to the heartes, and a smuch distracted their afflicted minds. To abide battle they saw it; was bootlesse, the treason of their leaders so many times defeating their victories; to yeeld themselves to the enemy, would but begin their servitude and misery; and to flee before them, their eternall ignominy and reproach.

Thus their opinions were canvased, but nothing put in practise, whereas meane whiles the Danes, went forward with victories, and had got the most part of the land, yea and London also by submission; wherewithall unfortunate Ethelred more and more dejected, sent his wife Emma with his two sonnes by her, unto her brother Richard Duke of Normandy, and for his owne safest refuge commitred himselfe unto Turkill the Dane, in whose ships he remained a while at Greenewich, and from thence went into the Isle of Wight, where he abode most part of the winter, and thence sailed into Normandy to his wife and brother, leaving the Danes lording it in his realme.

(32) These were the dayes of Englands mourning, she being unable to maintaine her defenders, and yet enforced to nourish and cherish her devourers: for the Danes in two factions most cruelly afflicted the land like two Mil-stones crushing and grinding the graine. Swayn as an absolute King, extorted of the English, both victuals and pay for his Souldiers; and Turkill on the other side, in defence of the English, commanded the like for his ships and men, so that the Danes had all, and the English maintained all. Neither were churches free from their spoils, (whom other Conquerours have held most impious to violate,) but either suffered the flames of their consuming fire, or were forced to purchase their standings with great summes of money. Such composition King Swayne demanded for the preservation of Saint Edmunds Monastery in Suffolke: which becausse the Inhabitants refused to pay, he threatned spoile both to the place, and to the Martyrs bones there enterred: in the midst of which jollity (saith Hoveden) he suddainely cryed out that he was strucke by S. Edmund with a sword, being then in the middest of his Nobles, and no man seeing from whose hand it came, and so with great horrour and torment, three dayes after upon the third of February ended his life at Thetford (others say at Gainesborough:) but with his death dyed not the title of the Danes, who immediately advanced Canutus his sonne for their King.

(33) The English that liked nothing lesse then bondage, especially under such tyrannizing intruders, thought now or never the time to shake off the yoake; and therefore with great joy and haste sent into Normandy for their native King. Ethelred now not unready for the recovering of his right, fore-slowed no meanes either to hasten or strengthen the enterprize, and having the assistance of his brother of Normandy, in the Lent following landed in England, unto whom resorted the people from all parts, accounting it their greatest joy to see the face of their King.

Canutus wisnes love of the English.

(34) Canutus then at Gainesborough, Souldier-like mustered and managed his men, and holding it good policy to keepe that by bounty, which his Father had got by tyranny, made no spare to purchase the hearts of the English, by which meanes those of Lyndsey became his Creatures, with an agreement to find him both horse and men against their owne King and Country.

Ethelred therefore now raging for revenge, with a mighty hoast entred Lyndsey, where he burnt all the Country, and put the inhabitants to the (word. Canute not able to resist this puissant Army, held the Sea more safe for him then the land, and entring Humber, failed to Sandwich, where being sore grieved at the miseries of these his confederates, requited King Ethelreds friends with the like, and commanded that those pledges which had beene delivered by the Nobles unto his Father, should have their Noses slit, and their hands cut off: which cruelty acted, he failed to Denmarke, as hopelesse of any good issue in England.

He is chased by Ethelred.

(35) But Turkill the Dane, retained (as wee said) into King Ethelreds pay, seeing successe so sudainely altered, sore repented him of his revolt from the Danes, and knowing now the time to recover his reputation, with nine of his ships failed into Denmarke, instantly importuning Canute to addresse againe for England; alleadging the feares and weakenesse of the people, the beauty and fertility of the land, an Eden, in respect of their owne barren feat, and (which did most moove) himselfe would assist, when the English least thought it. With these and the like he spurred him on, who of himselfe was forward in a full curriere.

Canutus therefore with the ayde of his brother Harrold rigged forth a Navy of two hundred saile, all furnished with souldiers and abiliments of warre, whose terrour landed in England before him, and his power by report made greater then it was; and to encrease the terrour of this fearefull enemy, the Sea with a Spring-tide brake into this land, and destroyed both Townes and many inhabitants; a signe foreshewing (as was thought) the successe of that fleete, borne hitherward upon those waves; and to increase the English miseries, thirty thousand pound was then collected by way of Tribute to pay the Danish auxiliary Navy lying before Greenewich. The States also convening in a grand Councell at Oxford to determine upon the great affaires of the Kingdome, were divided into factions, and two Noblemen of the Danes there murthered by practise of Edricke the Traitour. These (I say) were accounted ominous amongst the English, that made each mole-hill to seeme a mountaine, and every shadow the shew of an enemy.

Ethelred dieth.

(38) At which time King Ethelred, either falne into relapse of his last sicknesse, or tired with the many troubles, and daily renued treasons against him, gave up his ghost, and found rest by death, which never hee could attaine by life, the twentie third of April, and of our Salvation 1016, when hee had most unfortunately raigned thirty seven yeeres, and nine dayes: his body was there buried in the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul, and bones as yet remaine in the North-wall of the Chancell in a cheft of Grey-Marble, reared upon foure small pillars, covered with a copped stone of the same, adjoyning to another of the like forme, wherein Sebbey King of the East-Saxons lieth intombed.

The time of his raigning.

(39) Of Personage he was very seemely, and of countenance gracious, affable and courteous to his Subjects, and a maintainer of justice among them, as by his excellent Lawes which himselfe made, and by his sharpe, but godly and wise censures against unlearned, bribing, delaying, partiall Iudges and Lawyers, and their purloining officers (at large set downe by M. Foxe) is very apparant. Very loving and render affectioned he was to his brother King Edward; for whose death hee made such lamentation, that his mother beate him with a taper of waxe that stood before her, yea and so fore that he could never after well endure the sight of a taper. Favourable he was to the married Priests, and least esteemed the opulent and idle lives of the Monks, whose pennes therefore (as in such cases we ever find them partiall) have been very lavish in his dispraise, accusing him with sloath and unreadinesse of Armes, of voluptuousnesse and lechery, covetousnesse, pride, and cruelty: whereas in following the records of his life, laying aside the Danish malfacre, we finde no such sinnes, neither any mention of Concubine that ever he kept, or name of childe unlawfully begot, having had many by his wives, which were as followeth,

His Wives.

(40) Elgiva, the first wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of an English Duke named Thored, who is reported in the History of that time, to have done great service against the Danes. Shee was married unto him when he was seventeene yeeres of age, in the first of his raigne, being the yeere of grace nine hundred eighty foure, and was his wife seventeene yeeres, who deceased in the twentie foure of his raigne, and of Christ Iesus, one thousand and three.

Elgiva the first wife, by some called Elfleda.

Emme the second wife.

(41) Emme, the second wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Richard the second Duke of Normandy, and sister of Duke Richard, and Duke Robert father to William the Conqueror; her mother was sister to Herfast the Dane, Grandfather of William Fitz-Osbert afterward Earle of Hereford. Shee was a Lady of passing beauty, and therefore commonly called the flower of Normandy, married unto him in the twentie and fifth yeere of his raigne, and yeere of Salvation, 1003. with whom shee lived thirteene yeeres, and surviving him was remarried to King Canute the Dane.

His Issue.

Ethelstan the eldest sonne.

(42) Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne about the eight yeere of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of Christ, 986. he lived unto the age almoft of twentie five yeeres, being then (by great likelihood) cut off by untimely death in the warres of the Danes, raging then most extremely, which was the thirtie third of his Fathers raigne, and of Christs Nativitie, 1011.

Egbert the second sonne.

(43) Egbert, the second sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, seemeth to have beene borne two yeeres after his brother Ethelstan, in the tenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of our Lord, 688. and to have deceased in the very prime of his youth before the death of his father, or of his elder brother, and before hee had done any thing in his life worthy of remembrance after his death.

Edmund the third sonne.

(44) Edmund, the third sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne in the eleventh yeere, of his fathers raigne, and of Grace 989. and of all his fathers Children prooved to be the only man that set his helping hand to the redresse of the estate of his Country, distressed by the miserable oppressions of the Danes: which hee pursued with such exceeding toile, and restlesse hazards of his body, as he was therefore surnamed Iron-side; and when hee had followed those warres with great courage the space of seventeene yeeres under his Father, being come to twentie seven of his owne age, he succeeded him in his kingdome, and troubles, as presently shall be shewed.

Edred the fourth sonne.

(45) Edred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was borne about the fourteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of Grace 992. His name is continually set downe, as a witnesse in the Testees of his fathers Charters, untill the thirtie fift yeere of his raigne, by which it appeareth that hee lived unto the two and twentieth yeere of his owne age, although I finde no mention of him, nor of any thing done by him in any of our histories; and it seemeth hee dyed at that time, becaufe his name is left out of the Charters after that yeere.

Edwy the fifth sonne.

(46) Edwy, the fifth sonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgiva his first wife, survived his father and all his brethren, and lived in the raigne of Canute the Dane, who being jealous of his new gotten estate, and fearefull of the dangers that might accrew unto him by this Edwy, and such others of the English blood royall, practised to have him murthered, and was accordingly done by them, whom hee most favoured, and least suspected, the yeere of our salvation, 1017.

Edgar the fixth sonne.

(47) Edgar, the fixt sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva, his first wife, was borne about the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord God nine hundred ninety and eight. He seemeth by the Testees of his fathers Charters, to have beene living in the one and twentieth of his raigne, but being no more found in any of them after, may be supposed by all conjectures, to have died in, or about the same yeere, being but the eleventh after his owne birth, and the seventh before his fathers death.

The eldest daughter.

(48) The eldest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiva his first wife, although her name be not to be found in any writer of those times, appeareth notwithstanding, to be married to one Ethelstan, a Noble man of England, who was the principall Commander of Cambridge-shire-men at the great battell fought betweene them and the Danes, wherein the English-men had the overthrow; and this sonne in law of King Ethelred, with the reft of the chiefe Leaders, were slaine in the yeere of Christs Nativitie 1010, being the two and thirtieth of his father in Lawes raigne.

Edgith the second daughter.

(49) Edgith, the second daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiva his first wife, was married to Edrik Duke of Mercia, who for his covetousnesse in getting ing was surnamed Streatone: This Edrike was the sonne of one Egelrik surnamed Leofwin, an elder brother to Egelmere the grandfather of Godwin Duke of the West-Saxons; and beeing but meanely borne, was thus highly advanced by this King; notwithstanding he was ever a traitor to his Country, and a favourer of the Danes, betraying both him, and King Edmund his sonne to King Canute, that he thereby might get new preferments by him, who worthily rewarded him as a traitor and put him to death.

Elfgiue the third daughter.

(50) Elfgine, the third daughter of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiva his first wife, was the second Wife of Vtred surnamed the Bold, sonne of Earle Waldefe the elder, Earle of Northumberland, by whom shee had one onely childe, a daughter named Aldgith, married to a Noble man called Maldred, the sonne of Crinan; shee was mother of Cospatricke, who was Earle of Northumberland in the time of William the Conquerour, and forced by his displeasure to flie into Scotland, where hee abode, and was ancestor to the Earles of Dunbar and of March in that Country.

Gode the fourth daughter.

(51) Gode, the fourth and youngest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiva his first wife, was first married to one Walter de Maigne a Noble man of Normandie, greatly favoured by King Edward her brother; who lived not long after the marriage, and left issue by her a sonne named Rodulfe, whom King Edward his uncle created Earle of Hereford. This Earle Rodulfe, died the one and twentieth of December, in the thirteenth yeere of his uncles raigne, and was buried at Peterborough; leaving issue a young sonne named Harrald, created afterwards by King William the Conqueror, Baron of Sudeley in the Countie of Gloucester, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chaudois of Sudeley now being. This Ladie Gode, after the decease of the said Walter de Maigne, was married to Eustace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne in Picardy, a man of great valour in those parts of France, and a most faithfull friend to King Edward her brother; which Earle was grandfather to Godfrey of Bulloigne, King of Ierusalem, albeit it seemeth he had no issue by this Lady.

Edmund the seventh sonne.

(52) Edward, the seventh sonne of King Ethelred, and his first by Queene Emme his second wife, was borne at Islipe in the County of Oxford, and brought up in France all the time of his youth, with his uncle Richard the third of that name, Duke of Normandy, mistrusting his safetie in England under King Canute the Dane, although hee had married his mother; but hee found the time more dangerous by the usage of his brother Elfred, at his being heere in the raigne of king Harrald sonne of the Dane. Notwithstanding he returned home, when Hardiknut the other sonne (being his halfe brother) was King, and was honourably received and entertained by him, and after his death succeeded him in the Kingdome of England.

Elfred the eight sonne.

(53) Elfred, the eight sonne of King Ethelred and his second by Queene Emme his second wife, was conveied into Normandie for feare of King Canute, with his eldest brother Edward, and with him returned into England to see his mother, then beeing at Winchester, in the second yeere of King Harrald surnamed Harefoote; by whose practice hee was trained towards London, apprehended by the way at Guildford in Surrey, deprived of his eye-sight, and committed prisoner to the Monastery of Elie: his Normans that came with him most cruelly murthered, and hee himselfe soone after deceasing, was buried in the Church of the said Monasterie.

CHAPTER XLV.

An. Dom. 1016.

EDmund, the third sonne of King Ethelred, and the eldest living at his Fathers death, succeeded him both in his Dominions, and in his troubled estate against the Danes; entring his government in the moneth April, and Crowned at Kingston upon Thamise, by Livingus Archbishop of Canterbury, the yeare of mans salvation 1016. Notwithstanding, a great part of the English, considering the puissance of the Danes, both feared and favoured Canute, especially a great part of the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, swearing to him the fealty of true subjection; but the Londoners stood most firme to Prince Edmund, and were principall Actors for his Election.

But the Citizens manfully stood in resistance, whereto the comming of their new King for their succour, did not a little encourage them, and daunted the Danes, who now thought it best to breake up their siege and bee gone: and the rather (saith the Author of Encomium Emmæ) for that King Edmund sent Canute a peremptory challenge of single combat, which he neither accepted, nor yet stalled the siege to trie his chance; but waying his anchors sailed along the Coast to the ile of Sheepie, where hee wintred with his Navie and men.

will Malmesb. Edrike treason.

(6) But their bloud not cold, the next day they buckled together againe with no lesse courage then before, till at length the Danes were going downe, and the English in great forwardnes of victory: which when the Traitour Edrik perceived, he cut off the head of a souldier, whose name was Osmearus, like head unto king Edmund both in haire and countenance, and shaking his bloudy sword with the halfe-gasping head, cried unto the hoast of the English: Flie yee wretches, flie, and get away, for your King is slaine, behold here is his head, therefore seeke now to save your owne lives.

(7) But Edmund having present notice of this treacherous stratageme, and seeing his men ready to give over the fight, hasted himselfe where he might be best seene, encouraging his Army to stand to it like true Englishmen, and posting from ranke to ranke both performed the parts of a wise Generall, and underwent the dangers of the meanest souldier: his men seeing his presence, and the apparent treachery of Duke Edrick, bent their bowes against the traitour, and had shot him to death, had hee not presently avoided to the enemy: but the night approching, parted againe the battaile of this second day: Duke Edricke excusing his fact, as being meerely mistaken in the countenance of the man, and thirsting to save the blood of the English, was taken againe into favour, and bare himselfe outwardly faire for his Country.

Edrike excuseth.

(8) The third day appearing, both the Armies prepared for battaile, but yet stood still without any attempt, onely refreshing their wearied, and almost tired bodies, and burying the dead slaine in the two dayes fights before.

Canut marcheth to London.

(9) The night following, Canutus in great silence brake up his campe, and marched very fast towards London, against whose Citizens he carried great spleene, and most earnestly desired the conquest of the City, which ina sort was still besieged by the Danish ships.

Dislodged by Edmund.

(10) The Sentinels the next morning certified King Edmund (who was addressing himselfe for the battaile) of the suddaine departure of his enemies, whereupon hee as ready to prevent their designes, followed them by tract even unto London: where with small adoe, hee removed their siege, and entred the City in manner of triumph. The Danes thus discomfited, great hope was conceived, that these faire proceedings would have a prosperous end.

(11) Edmund, therefore following the advantage of their discouragements, two dayes after at Brentford bad them battaile, and that with their great overthrow; notwithstanding, in passing the Thames at the same place, he lost many of his men, who were drowned before they could recover the shore: upon which losse the Traitour Edrike plaied, who earst had much feared the downfall of the Danes. For hereupon hee perswaded his Brother in law King Edmund to come to truce with Canute, which as hee confidently affirmed, should bee to the great benefite and contentment of Edmund: Canute himselfe so plotting it, that by his meanes hee might continue his hopes, and bring his enemy into his danger.

(12) The affaires thus standing, King Edmund returned into the West, and Canute with spoiles unto his shippes that were in Medway, not farre from Rochester, where hee a while lay still to learne what Edmund meant to doe; who contrariewise loving nothing lesse then to linger his businesses, made preparation against those truce-breakers that had wasted the Country in their returne, and with a great Army entred Kent, where he pitched down his tents neere unto Otesford.

Edmund prepareth.

Canute, who had prepared himselfe in most warlike array to meete his approach, beganne the battaile in a furious manner, which continued very bloudy for foure houres space, untill the foote of his vaward beganne to shrinke, which when hee perceived, he drew his horesmen for their aide; but whileste the one gave hastily back, and the other made as slowly forward, the array of the whole Army was broken, and the Danes slaine on all hands: for it is reported that Canute lost foure thousand five hundred men, and King Edmund onely six hundred; the rest of these Danes trusting to their legs: whom if Edmund had pursued in chase, it is thought, that day had ended the warres betwixt those two Nations for ever. But Destiny, that would have the Saxons downe, who had raised themselves by the fals of the Britaines; made Edrike her instrument, and maull of the English, who kept King Edmunds hasty foot from following his enemies, by guilefull urging the danger of ambush, and the over-wearied bodies of his souldiers, so that Canute thereby had leasure in safety to passe over into Essex.

(13) Where beginning againe, with the increase of his power to despoile all the Country before him, brought feare to the Inhabitants, and to himselfe submission of many English. King Edmund therefore made preparation thitherward, and at Ashdone three miles from Saffron-Walden, gave battaile to Canute, wherein a bloody slaughter ensued, though a while with equall chance of foile or of victory, untill lastly the Danes beganne to give backe; which when the ever-traiterous Edrick perceived, he went with his strength, unto their side, and maintained their battaile, which otherwise was at point to bee lost, whereby the Danes regained the day, and the betraied English, the overthrow. There dyed of Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Goodwin, Duke Athelward, Duke Athelwin, and Earle Prchell, with Cadnoth, bishop of Lincolne, and Wolsey Abbot of Ramsey, besides other of the Clergy that were come thither to pray for the preservation of the King and his Army. The remembrance of which field is retained unto this day, by certaine small hils there remaining, whence have been digged the bones of men, Armour, and the water-chaines of horses bridles.

(14) King Edmund thus traiterously forced to retire from the field, on foot marched unto Glocester with a very small Armie, leaving Canute overswollen in conceit for this his great Victory, unto whom then the Londoners submitted, and so did many other great Townes of Name; after which hee followed Edmund into the West, who now like a Tyger robbed of her Whelpes, seeking the revenge of this lost day, gathered a most puissant Army, meaning to try the uttermost chance of Fate, or battaile. the others downefall; and now being ready to joyne, a certaine Captaine of uncertaine name, stept forth (as is reported) betwixt the two Armies, and uttered in effect this speech.

The advice of a Captaine for single combat.

"(15) Many Battels have beene fought, and "too much blood already spilt for the Soveraignty "of this Land, betwixt these two fierce Nations, "and the valours of the Generals, Captaines and "Souldiers sufficiently tried; wherein even fortune "her self seemeth to have beene conquered; for "if one battaile were wonne, it was not long kept, "neither the loser so weakened, but that hee had "both courage and power to winne the next. What "is the marke then that you aime at? is it honour "and fame? Titles indeed which accompany warre; "but neither long enjoyed, nor much attained un"to by the common Souldiers, by whose valours "and blood it is for the most parr wonne. Let "him therefore that would weare the Diademe, "beare the hazard himselfe, without the confusi"on of many men, and either trie the fortune "of a single combat, who shall command, and "who obey; or divide betwixt them the Kingdome, "which may suffice two, that hath maintained "seven.

Edrike wicked counsell.

(16) Some affirme that this speech was Duke Edricks; But I hardly beleeve so good a motion should proceed from so bad a man. By whom so ever uttered, it was acceptably received by Edmund and Canute, who thereupon in sight of their Armies, entred into a small Iland, embraced about with the armes of Severn, called Alney, adjoyning unto the City Glocester, where those Princes in complete Armour at first assailed each other most dangerously on horseback, and after as valiantly on foot. The Iron-side was strong, and fought for his Kingdome; the Dane not so tall, but every way as stout, fought for his honour, and so the combate continued with an absolute resolution, till at length Canute having received a dangerous wound and seeing himselfe overmatched in strength, wished a comprimise, and thus spake to Edmund with a loud voyce.

Edmund and Canute at single fight.

"What necessity should thus move us, most valiant "Prince, that for the obtaining of a Title, wee should thus "endanger our lives? Better it were to lay malice and ar""mour aside, and to condescend to a loving agreement: "let us therefore now become sworne brothers, and divide "the Kingdome betwixt us, and in such league of amity, "that each of us may use the others part as his owne; so "shall this land be peaceably governed, and wee joyntly "assist each others necessitie.

Matth. West.

Whereupon they both cast downe their swords, imbracing as friends with the great joy and shouting of both their Armies, who stood before doubtfully wavering betwixt hope and feare, and looking for their owne fortunes, according to the successe of their Champions.

Canute to Edmund.

Thus was the Kingdome divided betwixt those two Princes; Edmund enjoying that part that lay coasted upon France, and Canute entring upon the rest.

The kingdome parted betwixt them.

(17) Thus then the Saxon Monarchy spent to the last period, and their tottering Crowne fast grasped with a hard Danish hand, was suddenly torne from the Ironsides helmet, by his complotted and hastened death. For Duke Edricke a very compound of treasons, glutted with the favours of both these Kings, to scrue himselfe deeper into Canute his conceit, contrived the end of renowned Edmund: who being retired to a place for Natures necessity, was thrust from under the draught into his body with a sharpe speare; which done, the treacherous Edricke cutting off his Soveraignes head, presented it to Canute with these fawning salutations: All haile, thou now sole Monarch of England; for, here beholdthe head of thy Copartner, which for thy sake I have adventured to cut off.

With him fell the glory of the English, and the aged body of their sore bruised Monarchy seemed to be buried with him in the same Sepulchre.

His Wife.

(20) Algith, the wife of King Edmund, was the widow of Segeferth, the sonne of Engrin a Danish Nobleman of Northumberland, which Segeferth, with his brother Morcar, was murthered at Oxford by the treason of the never-faithfull Edrick: and this Lady being of great beauty, and noble parentage, after the death of her husband, and the seisure of his lands, was by King Ethelred commited in charge to the Monastery at Malmesbury, where Edmund seeing her, grew in great love, and there married her against the liking of his father, in Anno 1015.

Algith.

His Issue.

(21) Edward the eldest son of King Edmund, and Queene Algith his wife, was surnamed the Outlaw, because he lived out of England in Hungary, as a banished man, through the raigne of Canute, and of his sonnes the Danes. But when his Vncle King Edward the Confessor, had obtained the English Crowne, hee was by him recalled, and most honourably in his Court entertained, till lastly, hee was taken away by death in the City of London, the yeare of Christ, one thousand fifty seven. He married Agatha sister to Queene Sophia, wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and daughter to the Emperour Henry the second; by whom he had Edgar, surnamed Etheling, confirmed heire apparant by Edward Confessor, his great Vncle; which title notwithstanding, proceeded no further, for that he was deprived thereof by Harold his Prorector.

Edward the Outlaw.

His Wife.

The daughters of this Edward, as after shall be said, were Margaret and Christian, the younger of which became a vailed Nun at Ramsey in Hampshire, where shee in that devotion spent her life, and was there interred.

His daughters.

Margaret the elder, and afterward sole heire unto the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third of that name, King of Scotland, and commonly called Canmore: from which Princely bed in a li-neall descent, our high and mighty Monarch, King IAMES the first, doth in his most roiall person unite the Britaines, Saxons, English, Normans, and Scottish imperiall Crownes in one.

Edmund. (22) Edmund, the second and yongest sonne of King Edmund, and of Queene Algith his wife, after his fathers decease being a Child, was with his brother Edward sent by Canute to Olave King of Sweden his halfe brother, to the intent, that hee by murther should make them both away: but this King taking pity on the innocent Childrens estate, sent them to Salomon King of Hungarie, to the intent to have them saved, where they were received with great favour and honour: and Mathew of Westminster reporteth that this Prince married the daughter of the same King; and other Writers of these times, that he died in the same Country without any issue of his body.

(23) These two sonnes of the Iron-side thus posted away, and the Crowne already set upon the Danes head, had not the meanes of themselves to displace it, nor the English, hearts to assist them to their right: so that they rather secured themselves from violent deaths in this their exile, then made claime to that which was unrecoverable; and left the Danes quietly to possesse the land, which so long they had molested with their sturdy Armes.

CHAPTER. I.

THE Spirit of God, in his sacred writings, to shew his all-commanding power over Kingdomes and Nations, compareth the transmigrations of people from Country to Country, unto the transfusion of Wine from vessell to vessell: and those that are at rest with sinne, to bee setled upon their lees, as Moab was, against whom hee cursed that hand that negligently did his worke of revenge, and the sword that was not sheathed in their blood. Even so the sinnes of the Saxons growne now to the full, and their dregs as it were suncke unto the bottome, they were emptied by the Danes from their owne vessels, and their bottles broken that had vented their red and bloody wines: in lieu whereof, the Lord then gave them the Cup of his wrath, whose dregs hee had formerly (by their owne hands) wrung out upon other nations.

Iere. 48.11.

(2) For these Saxons that had enlarged their Kingdomes by the bloud of the Britaines, and built their Nests high upon the Cedars of others, (as the Prophet speaketh) committed an evill covetousnesse unto their owne habitations, and were stricken by the same measure that they had measured unto others. When as the Danes often attempting the lands invasion, and the subversion of the English estate, made way with their swords through all the Provinces in the realme; and lastly advanced the Crowne upon their owne helmets; which whiles it so stood, was worne with great honour, especially of Canutus the first and their greatest.

Habac. 2.

(3) As touching this Nations originall, and first place of residing, seeing themselves know nothing at all, wee cannot determine, but supposing them, with Franciscus Irenicus, to be a branch of the ancient Germans, and knowing them by the testimonies of all others, to inhabite in the same Country among them; we need not to doubt, but that their conditions and customes were much alike. Of the former, what we have observed, is already set downe, where wee spake of our Saxons; and now of these latter, what is supposed for truth shall be produced.

(4) These Danes so often mentioned by our historians, for the great afflicters of the English state and peace, were a people descended from the Scythians, as Andrew Velley a learned Danish Writer reporteth: but Dudo of Saint Quintin (an ancient Author) will have them to come from Scandia, an Iland situated North-ward, not farre from the continent of Denmarke: which his opinion seemeth unto some to bee strengthned by Ptolemy the Alexandrian, who in his Geography placeth the people Dauciones (the supposed Ancestors of those Danes) in this Iland Scandia, at such time as himselfe wrote, which was in the raigne of Hadrian the Emperour, and about the yeere of Christs Nativity one hundred thirty three. But whersoever the roote had beginning, the branches did farre spread themselves into the upper Germany, and parts of Norway, and Sweyden, whose faire fruit more particularly filled that promontory, which tongue-like lyeth into the Ocean on the North, being anciently called of the learned, Cimbrica Chersonesus, where, (as Tacitus saith) was the uttermost end of Nature, and of the world; a strange conceit indeed; and yet more strange was their opinion, who were perswaded that the sound and noise of the Sunne was there heard at his daily rising and setting in those Seas. But from more warrantable witnesses it is reported, that this was the very place which the Iutes and Angles abandoned, when they removed their Colonies for Britaine.

(5) In this place then the Danes laid first the foundation of their Kingdome; which, from the word Marc (signifying not a limit, but a region,) was named Den-marc. But touching the former part of that compounded name, the truth and originall occasion is not so soone found out: for the searching eye of Truth hath long since seene into the received fable of Danus their first King, and Giant-like sonne of Humblus; though Verstegan, of late, holds it more certaine in the search of originals, to follow the grounded opinion that ancient Tradition hath held, then at random to seeke them else-where: as these Danes (saith hee) from Dan, and the Britaines from Brute which truely for truth I hold much alike, and will heerein make doubt, as many more of riper judgement before me have done.

Tonas Iacob.

Ethelward our English historian will have them named from the faire City Dania. And Tonas Iacobus Pontanus, a diligent searcher of Antiquities, out of Pomponius Mela, findeth the names of certaine Bays, opening into those parts, which now the Danes inhabite, to have beene anciently written CDAN and CDANONVM, which Orthography and Pronunciation to the Latines was both harsh and hard, and therefore they added a vowell, and wrote it CODANVM and CODANONIA, whereof (it may bee thought) these people given much to piracies, were knowne and called by that name, as breaking out of those Gothanian Seas. Some others, from Ptolemy, have thought, that from his Dauciones placed in Scandia, and corruptly so written for Danciones; the name of these Danes hath beene derived; whereto the neerenesse of the place induceth much.

(7) For Nations Originals may well be compared unto a Spring, whose current surcharged with continuall supply of more, first filleth the neere Chanels; which done, they passe further, and at length are (oftentimes) divided into many and great streames: and even so these Danes, (saith Dudo of S. Quintins) "after they had in heat, and lascivious lust ingendred "an innumerable off-spring, swarmed out of Scandia, like Bees out of their Hives, and that both on "divers occasions, and in very barbarous manner; "for growne to ripenesse of yeeres, and falling at "strife with their Fathers and Grand-fires, yea, and "most commonly among themselves for lands and "lively-hood, necessity compelled them to disburden "the land thus overflowed, for the better maintenance of the residue, and to banish by lot (after "their ancient custome) a multitude of their youth, "that might conquer by their swords, in forraine "Realmes, places to live in.

Dudo.

These then thrust out of their owne, fell upon other lands with no lesse danger then the falling of a sword out of the sheath, or rather, as the breaking in of a tempestuous Sea upon the neighboring grounds, fore distressing their neighbour Nations, and among them England not the least, as shall be said.

(8) And yet their name was not much notified to the world before the raigne of Iustinian the Emperor, about the yeere of mans salvation, five hundred and seventy, but then roving upon the coasts of England, and France; in exercising Piracies, were noted by writers by the name Wiccingi, for that Wiccing in the Saxon tongue, as Alfricus witnesseth, doth signifie a Pirate; they were also called Pagani, for that they were not Christians; but by the English Denisean, and also Heathon-mon, as being Ethnickes.

The Religion of the Danes.

(9) The manner of their Religion, or rather superstition and Idolatry, was much like unto the other Germans and Saxons, whose principall God and Nationall reputed-Patron, was THVR, unto whom the fourth day of the weeke, for his service, was assigned, whereof as yet it beareth his name Thurſday; who in his robes was set upon a sumptuous bed, the Canopy whereof was bespangled with starres of gold; unto him they performed their chiefe devotions, and ascribed all their fortunes in their affaires; as the foresaid Dudo doth more particularly relate. They (saith hee) sacrificed unto Thur, whom they worshipped in old time as their Lord, for whom they killed not many Sheepe, Oxen, or other cattell, but offered unto him mens blood, thinking that to be the most precious oblation of all others; whom, when the Priest by casting of lots had destinated to death, they were all at once deadly smitten upon the head with oxe yokes; and every one thus chosen by lot, having at one stroke his braines dashed out, was laid along on the ground, and there with a narrow prying was sought out the Fibra, or veine of the heart on the left side, whence drawing the blood, as their custome was, and therewith besmearing the heads of their dearest friends, forthwith they hoise sailes, thinking their Gods well pleased with such sacrifices, and fore-deeming happy successe to their intended voyage

(10) Dimarus the Bishop (somewhat ancienter then Dudo) recordeth another detestable superstition used by the Danes, to purchase the favour of their Gods. Because (saith he) I have heard wonderfull reports of the ancient sacrifices which the Danes and Normans vse, I will not let them passe untouched. In those parts there is a place, and the chiefe it is of that Kingdome, called Lederum, in a Province named Selon, where every ninth yeare, in the moneth of Ianuary, after the time in which we celebrate the Nativity of our LORD, they all assemble together, and there they kill and sacrifice unto their Gods ninety and nine Men, and as many Horses, with Dogs, and also Cockes, in stead of Hawkes, assuring themselves that hereby their Gods are fully pleased and pacified. And thus much may serve for a taste and view of their Customes, Names and Originals.

THE DANES FIRST ATTEMPTS AGAINST ENGLAND.

CHAPTER. II.

An. Dom. 787.

THough many were the Piracies of the Danes on the coasts of France and this our Iland in former times; yet their arrivall heere, which gave first breath to their ensuing conquests, was not till the wane of the Saxon Monarchy, about the yeere of Christs Incarnation seven hundred eighty seven, in the raigne of Brightricke King of the West-Saxons: in whose dominions (after some proffer at Portland) they first came to land at Teigne-mouth in Devonshire; being sent then with three Ships onely, to espye the wealth of this Country, the forces of the Inhabitants, the commodities of the Havens, and advantage of arrivall for a greater power, which was to follow them. The Kings Lieutenant and Prefect for that place, understanding of their landing, went himselfe to demand the reason thereof; and attempting to lay hands on some to carry them to the Kings presence, he was there slaine; which they tooke as a fortunate presage of the victories wherewith they afterward over-ranne this Kingdome; though for the present the inhabitants inraged with the losse of their Chiefetaine addressing them in great numbers to revenge, forced some to lose their lives by the sword, the rest to save themselves by flight to their ships.

Camden in Dorsetsh. Polydor. Virgil. Lambert in Perambul. Kent. mentioneth their landing at Tyrmouth in the North, the easternesse of Germany (as Bieres) deceiveth him.

An. Dom. 800. In the seventh booke, Chap. 3.

(2) Nothwithstanding their former preparations, they were contented to deferre their returne till the dayes of King Egbert; whose raigne (as elsewhere wee have touched) they disquieted with three severall invasions; the first in the North, the second in Wales, the last in Kent; in all which, the King though with many losses, and hazards of his owne person, yet with great resolutions persisted, till hee had disburdened his land of so dangerous guests. But those Flesh-flyes having once tasted the sweet, though often beaten off, would not long be kept away, but could easily take, or make occasions of fresh attempts; insomuch that after their first footing they continued heere their cruelties, rapine, and spoile, the space of two hundred and eighteene yeeres, never intermitting, till they had got the Garland upon their owne heads. The Vice-roy already ensnared with her beauty, accepted her courteous offer, nor so much to taste her meates, as to surfeit his eyes with her rare beauty, and lasciviously to dote in his owne affections. The dinner ended, and all ready to depart, (as though some weighty matters were to be handled) hee commanded an avoydance from the Presence, and taking the Lady into a withdrawing Chamber, under pretence of secret conference, greatly tending to the advancement of her Lord and selfe, most unnobly, being not able to prevaile by smooth perswasions, did by force violate her constant chastity. Which dishonour thus received, and her minde distracted like to Thamars, at her husbands returne, all ashamed to behold his face whose bed had so beene wronged, with flouds of teares she thus set open the sluces of her passions. 2 Sam. 13. 19.

It may be for his place thou owest "him respect; but what? therewith the losse of ho-"nour? thine affection, but not thy bed; thy Love "but not thy beloved, yet hast thou lost at once all "these, and he thy onely bereaver: thou wast my stay "whilest I stayed by thee; and now being downe,

"revenge my fall: the instinct of Nature doth pitty "our weakenesse; the law of Nations doth maintaine "our honour; and the sword of Knighthood is "sworne-by, to be unsheathed for our just defence; "much more the lincke of wedlocke claimes it, which "hath locket two hearts in one; but alas, that ward "is broken, and I am thy shame, who might have "been thine honour. Revenge thy selfe therefore both "on him and me, else shall this hand let out the "Ghoft that shall still attend thee with acclamations, "till thou revenge my stained blood.

(5) Beorn unwonted thus to bee welcommed, much amazed at his wives maladies, with gentle words drew from her the particulars of her inward griefe, who revealed (as well as shame, teares, and sobs, would suffer) the manner of the deed, still urging revenge for the wrong. Beorn touched thus to the quicke (to pacifie his distressed wife) did not a little dissemble his wrath, and excusing the fact, with the power of a Prince, that might command, and her owne weaknesse, unable to resist the strength of a man, commended much her love and constancy; and alleaging his wrongs to be equall with hers (if not greater) in regard of their sexe, willed her to set her string to his tune, till fit opportunity would serve to strike: But shee disdaining that sweet consort, wrested her passion into so high a straine, that nothing could be heard but revenge and blood.

(6) Beorn thus instigated by the continuall cryes of his wife, whose rape already of it selfe had given sufficient cause of wrath: first consulting with his neereft friends, was offered their assistance against that wicked and libidinous Prince, and then repayring to his Court, in presence of them all, made knowne his unsufferable wrongs, and with utter defiance departed, threatning his death.

This Nobleman in his youth had beene brought up in Denmarke, and is reported to have beene allianced into the Danish royall bloud: Hee therefore accounted this Nation the surest unto himselfe, and the fittest in will and power to enter his quarrell. So comming to Godericke King of that Country, made his case knowne, instantly desiring his ayde against the villany of Osbright.

Godericke glad to have some quarrell to enter Britaine, levyed an Army with all speed, and preparation made for all things necessary, sendeth forth Inguar and Hubba two brethren, to command in chiefe, over an innumerable multitude of his Danes: which two hee thought at this time the fittest for the attempt, not onely for their well approoved resolution and valour, but also for that hee knew them to bee, on particular motives (which usually more affect then doth a common cause) implacably enraged against the English, on an occasion unfortunately happing, but most lamentably pursued, which it will not beamisse here to annexe.

(7) A certaine Danish Nobleman of the Royall lineage, named * Lothbroke, Father to this Inguar and Hubba, being upon the shoare, his Hawke in flying the game, fell into the Sea, which to recover, hee entred a little Schiffe or Cocke-boat, nothing foreseeing the danger that immediately did ensue: for a sodaine tempest arising, carried the boat into the deepe, and drove him upon the coast of Norfolke, where hee came to land at the Port called Rodham, and no sooner was seene, but was taken for a Spye; and presently sent to Edmund, King then of that Province; But in his answers hee sufficiently cleared that suspition, and also declaring his Birth and misfortune, was honourably entertained in the Court of that East-Angles King; whom King Edmund much esteemed for his other good parts; but for his dexterity and expertnesse in hawking, held him in a speciall regard; insomuch that his Falconer named Bericke, conceived such secret envy and deadly hatred thereat, as having him alone in a Wood, hee cowardly murthered him, and hid his dead body in a Bush.

* That is, Leathebricke.

(8) Lothbroke, in the Kings presence and Court, was soone mist, and diligent inquisition made, could not be found; untill his Spaniell, which would not forsake his dead Masters corps, came fawningly unto the King, as seeming to begge revenge on so bloody an act; which hee did more then once, and at length being observed, and followed by the trace, the dead body was found; and Bericke convicted for the murther; his judgement was to bee put into Lothbrokes boat, and that without either tackle or Oare, as hee therein arrived, and so left to the Seas mercy to bee saved by destiny, or swallowed up by just desert.

Murther will out.

But behold the event; the boate returned to the same place; and upon the same coast arrived, from whence it had beene driven, even in Denmarke, where Bericke being knowne, and hands laid on him, to free himselfe from the punishment of his butcherly fact, he added Treason to Murther, laying it to the charge of innocent King Edmund.

(9) In revenge whereof, and likewise in Godericks quarrell, Inguar and Hubba, sonnes to the murthered Prince, being now made Generals of the Army of the Danes; first arriving at Holdernesse, burnt up the Country, and without mercy massacred all before them, sparing neither sexe, nor calling, nor age; and surprizing Torke, which Osbright had taken for his refuge, there slew that lustfull Prince, with all his forces, and possessed that City, and afterwards bursting into Norfolke, sent this message unto King Edmund: That Inguar, the most victorious Prince, dread both by Sea and Land, having subdued divers Countries unto his subjection, and now arrived in those parts, where hee meant to Winter, charged Edmund to divide with him his riches and to become his vassaile and servant.

The King astonyed at this strange and unexpected Ambassage, consulted with his Councell, where one of his Bishops (then his Secretary, and a principall man) used perswasions to him to yeeld, for preventing greater mischiefe; who notwithstanding returned this Answer: Goe tell thy Lord, that Edmund the Christian King, for the love of this temporall life, will not subject himselfe to a Heathen and Pagan Duke. Whereupon Inguar and Hubba, with the furious troupes of their Danes, pursued the King to Thetford, and (as Fabian saith) to Framingham, others to Halesdone; where hee pittying the terrible slaughter of his people, yeelded himselfe to their persecutions; and for that hee would not deny CHRIST, and his Christian faith, was bound to a Tree or Stake, and with their Arrowes so shotte to death: whose body was afterward there buried, and thereupon tooke the name of Saint Edmunds-bury, as wee have formerly touched in his Raigne, Liber. 7. Cap. 11.

(10) Whether these were the very true causes, or some other, which drew these Danes hither, most certaine it is, and too lamentable experience shewed, that hither they came (by Writers account) about the yeere of Christ eight hundred, and in the dayes of King Brightricke. Neither want there Authors who ascribe certaine predictions to have forerunne the yeere eight hundred, made unfortunate by their first attempts, fore-shewed seven yeares before, by showers of bloud falling from heaven, and bloudy Crosses markt therewith upon the Garments of men, reported by the learned Alcuinus, who was instructor to Charles the Great, and borne in the County of Torke, where this wonder happened: which himselfe saw and testified unto Ethelbert King of that Province, as Malmesbury hath written, and was thought by Hoveden, Higden, Fabian and others, to have beene sent for signes before their bloudy assaults, which began at the day-spring of the Saxons Monarchy, when it promised a most faire ascent to their heires succeeding; but mounted to the highest, againe declined as the setting Sunne, and fell under the cloudes of their owne ruines, so carried by the just revenging hand of God: For those Saxons having by bloud and warre unseated the Britaines

Britaines of their land and right, by bloud and warre, were by these Pagan Danes so unceasantly molested, that no place was freed from their tyranny, nor any state sure, long to hold that which they enioyed, nor their lives secured from a daily expectation of their savage swords.

Blood revenged with blood.

(11) Whose many invasions and cruell proceedings against this land and nation, are already shewed in theraignes of these Saxon Kings, who then felt their heavy strokes inwarre, having nothing almost memorable otherwise, to enlarge their fames and stories with, besides these their valours in resisting so mighty and almost unrepugnable an enemie. Therefore omitting to repeat such things as in their successions are handled, we will fall neerer the time of the wished harvest of their full Conquests; somewhat remembring the Reader here, of those bloodie affaires, which the English at severall times felt and endured.

(12) Such was the murther of holy Edmund, King of the East-Angles, with Danish arrowes martyred to death as hee stood bound unto a stake, ever calling on the name of IESVS: Of Ella and Osbright Governours of Northumberland by them slaine, and that Province for a long time after by them enjoyed, and made subject to their furies: Of Burdred King of Mercia, by them expulsed, who with his QVEENE Ethelswith, were forced to abandon their Kingdome, leaving it to the possession of these Pagan intruders, and to seeke their securities in forreine Countries, where at Rome in Italy hee dyed, and at Padua his Wife, as hath beene said: Of Ethelred King of the West-Saxons, that in one yeeres continuance fought nine bloody battels against them, in the last whereof at Merton, hee received his deaths wound, and this Kingdome an uncurable blow: Of Elfred that most famous and learned King of the West-Saxons also, driven by them to such distresse, that hee was forced to leave his Princely Court, and to remaine secret in a poore Cow-heards house unknowne and disguised, in the Isle of Ethlingsey in the County of Sommerset, and thence to adventure himselfe among the Danish hoft, as a base Minstrell and contemptible Make-sport, till he had perfectly learned their secrets, and after with his sword, thorow the thicke st of those Enemies, made a way to his owne most glorious Monarchy.

(13) To speake nothing of the desolations left in every Province, Towne, and Place, where they came, laying all levell with the ground, as prints of their foote-steps where they had troden: Their cruell and mercilesse dealings towards holy and religious persons, with the ruination of Churches, and other places for Oratorie, is most lamentable to bee rehearsed or remembred: and among many others, the faire and beautifull Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Coldingham, were made subject to their desolations: In the last whereof, Lady Ebbe with her chast Nunnes, to avoid their savage and filthy pollutions, cut off their owne noses and upper-lips, least the baite of their beauties should proove the bane of their honours and honestie.

The most grievous Tribute and exactions layed upon the poore Inhabitants in generall, and great summes of money, payed in such afflicted and unseasonable times, imposed by the name of Dane-gylt, did from ten thousand, arise to forty thousand pounds, yeerely gathered for them in England. Their sturdy behaviour, and Lord-like carriage against the English, in all places where ever they sojourned, was with such subjection of the poore Owners, that they abused both Wife, Daughter, and Maide, and were of all called the Lord-Dane, till lastly they were Lords indeede of the Land, and swayed the Scepter at their owne pleasures, which how it was attained unto, wee have before declared, and how it was worne and continued, wee are now presently to speake.

CANVTVS THE FIRST DANISH KING RAIGNING IN ENGLAND AND THE THIRTIE FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER III.

An. Dom. 1017.

THe Sailes of the Danes thus overfilled with the gales of their swelling fortunes, and themselves arrived at the Port of their long sought soveraigntie, cast anker as it were at the Haven of their wished desire, and prepared themselves to a settled rest: for Canutus posseſt of halfe the Kingdome by compoſition with Edmund, now after his death seazed upon the whole; and that all things (as was pretended) might proceed with justice, and concord, hee called a Councell of the English Nobilitie at London; wherein was propounded, whether, in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of title to the Crowne had beene referred for King Edmunds brethren or sonnes. The English, that had paid a very deere rate for their overbold resistance before, not daring now to buy, with too late repentance, the wrath of this Dane, absolutely answered, No; and having learned to appeaſe Princes with flattery, offered their swords against any such claimes, and tooke themselves the Oath of alleagiance unto Canutus; who being a very wise and politike Prince, thought never the better of them for such their doings; whose truths thus failing towards their naturall Princes, could never (he well knew) stand firme for him or his forreine posteritie.

(2) But being thus cleered of all opposites, he prepared with great royaltie for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Lyvingus surnamed Elſtane, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 1017. being the second King of Denmarke of that Name, the first of England, and the thirtie fourth Monarch of this Land. His first deſignes for the eſtabliſhment of the Crowne to himselfe and Daniſh issue, was a care to prevent others neere unto the claime, and therefore, taking counsell with Edrike, baniſhed Edwin, who for his melancholy and regardleſse deportment, was commonly called, the King of Churles, sonne of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund; notwithſtanding, he was guilefully recalled, and treacherously murthered by his owne men, whoſe body they buried at Tavesſtocke in Devonſhire.

Canutus his care and policies to ſettle his Crowne.

(3) One cloud thus overblowne, two others appeared, far more dangerous in Canutus ſight; namely Edward and Edmund the sonnes of the Iron-ſide, whom albeit their young yeeres might have freed from ſuſpition of conſpiracies, and their gentle diſpoſitions from envying his glory, yet the bright rayes of a Diadem so dazled his jealous eye, that ever he saw (to his owne seeming) the reflection thereof shine from their faces: but aſhamed (faith Higden) to lay hand on them himſelfe, ſent them to his halfe brother of Sweden, to be made away, as we have said. In the doubtfull times betweene Edmund and Canute, when the scale of warre was held of either hands alike, Queene Emma had ſent Edward, and Alfred (her sonnes by King Ethelred) unto her brother Duke Richard of Normandy; whereby (we see) the Land was emptied of the Engliſh blood Royall, and the Crown left for the Dane without competition.

(4) Who now seeking to hold faſt the Scepter thus graſped, ſought the alliance of the Norman Duke by the eſpouſing of his ſiſter, faire Emma; a suite sounding but harſhly in the eares of the Engliſh, yea and moſt of all unto her ſelfe, as deeming the linke of love very ſlender, that might be broken by the same hand, which was the death of her Husband: Notwithſtanding, after good deliberation knowing him childleſſe of any lawfull ſucceſſor, upon covenants agreed, that the iſſue of her body by him, ſhould inherite the Engliſh Crowne, the suit was granted hoping alſo, if that failed betwixt them, to eſtabliſh her other sonnes by King Ethelred.

Canutus marrieth Queene Emma.

Emma a very prudent Lady.

This provident reſpect ſo pleaſed the ſubjects, that it both drew the hearts of the Engliſh unto Canutus, and their love unto Emma in a ſurpaſſing measure, as the booke penned to her praiſe, and written in that age, intituled Encomium Emmæ, ſufficiently doth shew.

Matth. weſtm.

(5) Neither was her loving care limitted onely to her ſonnes, but further extended towards the Common-wealth, being much peſtred then with his Danes, that lay lazie and idle, as drones in the hive, who at her inſtigations were ſent into Denmarke; and leſt they ſhould through diſcontents make any ſtirres either here or there, had a largeſſe (to buy their contentment) of foureſcore and two thouſand pounds.

(6) Canutus his next care for the maintenance of his owne safety, and the continuance of his new got Empire, was the eſtabliſhment of good lawes (which if duly executed, are the very ſinewes and ſtrongeſt guards of all States) to bee adminiſtred and practiſed both on the Engliſh and Dane alike: wherefore he calling a Parliament of his Peeres unto Oxford, there eſtabliſhed many wholſome Acts both for the Clergy and Laitie to obſerve: ſome of which were divulged by the praiſe-worthy care of a ſtudious Antiquarie, and a few, as touching Religion, as a reliſh of the reſt, we thinke it nor amiſſe to give the Reader a taſte of.

That upon the Lords Sabbath, publike Faires, Markets, Synods, Conventicles, Huntings, and all ſecular actions ſhould not bee exerciſed, unleſſe ſome weightie and urgent neceſſitie required it.

Canutus his godly Lawes.

That every Chriſtian ſhould thrice in the yeere addreſſe himſelfe to the receiving of the bleſſed Sacrament of the Lords Supper.

That if a Miniſter of the Altar killed a man, or elſe committed any notorious crime, hee ſhould be depriued both from his order and dignitie.

That the married woman convicted for adulterie ſhould have her noſe and eares cut off.

That a widow marrying within the ſpace of twelve moneths after her husbands deceaſe ſhould loſe her joynter.

(8) Theſe and many other were made, whereby ſinne was much reſtrained, and this realme peaceably and juſtly governed. As likewiſe ſundry other countries were by his godly and royall care; as in eſpeciall is recorded of a young Gentleman of the Daniſh royall bloud, named Odin, whom King Canute brought over with him into England, to be here trayned up in learning, where he profited ſo well, as alſo by his travell thorow France (whereby hee much encreaſed both his knowledge and experience) that he attained the ſurname of SAPIENT, and the Philoſopher, and therefore was called Odin-chur, for the deere eſteeme wherein all men held him. This man by preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia, and Sweyland, converted great multitudes to the Faith of CHRIST.

(9) But in Denmarke things proceeded not ſo well; for in the abſence of Canutus, and yeere of Chriſts humanitie 1019. the Vandals ſore annoyed his ſubjects: He therefore, in the third of his raigne, with a great Hoſt of the Engliſh, paſſed over the Seas, and bad his enemies battell, which, as Matthew of Weſtminſter writeth, went ſore againſt him the firſt day; and preparing againe for the next, Earle Goodwine, who was Generall of the Engliſh, attempted a great enterprize: for in the dead of the night, he with his ſouldiers, ſet upon the Campe of the Vandals and with a great ſlaughter of their ſouldiers, made the two Princes Vlfus and Anlafe to flie the Field.

Earle Goodwine good ſervice to Canutus.

Canute ignorant of this acted enterpriſe, had notice in the morning that the Engliſh were fled, for that their ſtation was left, and not a man found: wherefore following the track, even to the enemies Campe, by ſtreames of bloud, and dead bodies of the Vandals; he ſaw the great overthrow that the Engliſh had given them, for which he ever after held them in great eſtimation.

(10) Albertus Krantius, the Daniſh hiſtorian, reporteth that Olanus King of Sweyden, having aſſiſted Canute againſt Edmund the Ironſide, and ſeeing himſelfe to bee neglected in the compoſition betwixt them, mooved ſuch ſtirres in Denmarke, that Canutus was forced thither againe; where by the proweſſe of his Engliſh hee repulſed Olanus, who laſtly was ſlaine by his owne ſubjects.

(11) William of Malmesbury and Matthew of Weſtminſter record, that in the yeere 1032. hee undertooke an expedition into Scotland, with proſperous ſucceſſe againſt Malcolme the King thereof, with two other Princes called Melbeath and Iechmare. But being at length overburdened as it were with his owne greatneſſe, and ſurfeited with glory, which ſometimes he had ſo greedily deſired (as even the greateſt earthly delights have their fulneſſe) hee reſolved on a more placable courſe of life, and to affect a higher and heavenly glory, which hath never ſatietie or end. And therefore his devotion being great unto Godward, on a zealous intent, (ſuch as S. Paul commended in the devout Iſraelites) hee tooke a journey to Rome, to viſite the ſepulchers of Saint Peter and Paul in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne; and thence ſent his letters to his Engliſh Biſhops and Nobilitie, beginning thus.

His Munificence.

(14) In Essex hee built the Church of Alsdon, where he had the victory against King Edmund. In Norfolke the Abbey of S. Benets, which Saint he greatly reverenced; and in Suffolke, with an especiall devotion, built and endowed the Monastery of S. Edmund, which Saint hee most dreadly feared: for it is reported, that the seeming-ghost of Edmund often affrighted him; for which cause, as also to expiate the sinnes of his Father, who had done great damage to his possession, hee inverged the same with a deepe ditch, and offered up his Crowne upon the Martyrs Tombe. Most rich and royall Iewels hee gave the Church of Winchester, whereof one is recorded to bee a Crosse, worth as much as the whole revenew of England amounted to in one yeare: unto Coventry hee gave the Arme of S. Augustine the great Doctor, which he bought at Papia in his returne from Rome, and for which hee paid an hundred talents of silver, and one of gold.

(15) The magnificent greatnes of this glorious King so overflowed in the mouthes of his flatterers, that they extolled him, with Alexander, Cyrus, and Cæsar, and to be possessed with power more then humane: To convict these his fawning overprizers, being then at Southampton, he commanded (saith Henry of Huntington) that his chaire shomld be set on the shore, when the sea beganne to flow, and then in the presence of his many attendants; spake thus to that Element. "Thou art part of my dominion, and the "ground whereon I sit is mine, neither was there "ever any that durst disobey my commaund, or "breaking it, escaped unpunished; I charge thee "therefore presume not into my land, neither wet "thou these robes of thy Lord: but the Sea (which obeyeth onely one Lord) giving no heede to his threats, kept on the usuall course of tide, first wetting his skirts, and after his thighes; when suddenly rising to give way for the still-approaching waves, hee thus spake in the hearing of all: Let the worlds inhabitants know, that vaine and weake is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy the name of King, but hee that keepes both heaven, earth, and sea in obedience, and bindeth them in the everlasting law of subjection. After which time he would never suffer the Crowne to bee set upon his head, but presently crowned therewith the picture of our Saviour on the Crosse at Winchester: unto such strong illusions were those godly Princes led, by the guides that ever made gaine of their devotions.

His humility.

(16) From the Example of this Canutus (saith Peter Pictauiensis Chancellor of Paris) arose the custom to hang up the Armor of worthy men in Churches, as offerings confecrated unto Him in whose battailes they had purchased renowne, either by victory and life, or in their Countries service attained to an honourable death. And surely, howsoever this King is taxed of ambition, pride and vaine glory, for which some have not stucke to say, that hee made his journey to Rome, rather to shew his pompe and riches, then for any humble devotion or religious intent, yet by many his intercurrent actions and lawes of piety enacted, he may justly be cleared of that imputation; as also by the testimony of Simon Monk of Durham, who reporteth his humility to bee such that with his owne hands hee did helpe to remove the body of S. Aelphegue at the translation of it from London unto Canterbury, whom the Danes (notwithstanding his Archiepiscopall and sacred calling) before had martyred at Greenwich: and by the testimony of Guido, Polidore, Lanquet, and others, he was a Prince of such temperance and justice, that no other in this West of the World was so highly renowned or might be compared unto him in heroicall vertues, or true humility.

(17) Saxo Grammaticus, and Albertus Krantius, the Writers of the Danish historics, deduce Canutus by a lineall succession through the line of their Kings in this manner: Hee was (say they) the sonne of King Swaine, (surnamed Tiugf-keg) by Sigret his wife, the widow of Erick, by whom she had Olafe Scottonning, King of Sweyden: unto which Swaine shee bare also Ostrida daughter, the mother of Thira, the mother of King Swaine the yonger. The elder Swaine was the sonne of King Harold, surnamed Blaatand, by Gonhild his Queene, who bare him also Iring King of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. The father of Harold was King Gormond, whose Queene was Thira the daughter of King Ethelred, the twentie third Monarch of England, who bare unto him the said Harold, and another Canute, both most valiant Princes; which two Gallants invading this land, were (for their brave resolutions) by their Grand-father proclaimed heires apparant to all his dominions: the credite of which relations I leave to my forenamed Authors; but Canute (the elder brother) died very soone after, being deadly wounded in the siege of Dublin in Ireland; where perceiving death at hand, he gave strict charge to his attendants, to keepe the same very secret till the Citie were taken, that so neither his owne Army should bee daunted, nor the enemy encouraged by the losse of the Generall. Gurmo, his aged Father, (to digresse but in a word) so incredibly loved him, that hee had vowed to kill with his owne hands any person whosoever that should tell him the newes of his sonnes death: which when Thira his mother now heard of, shee used this policie to make it knowne to the King her husband. Shee prepared mourning apparell for him, and all other things fitting for funerall exequies, laying aside all Regall robes, and ceremonies of Princely State, without intimating any cause of this sad solemnitie; which the old King no sooner perceived, but he lamentably cryed out, woe is me, I know my sonne is dead; and with excessive griefe hee presently died. But to returne from that Canutus, to close up the raigne of this our Monarch in hand.

(19) Alfgive, by most Writers, a Concubine to King Canutus, was the daughter of a Mercian Duke named Elfhelme, who is said to have beene Earle of Northampton; and her Mothers name was Ulfrune, Inheritrix of the Towne Hampton in Staffordshire, from her called Ulfrun-Hampton, now Woller-Hampton: This Lady Alfgive to make Canutus more firme to her love, her selfe being barren, is reported to have fained Child-birth, and to have laid in her bed the sonne of a Priest, whom Canute tooke to bee his owne, and named him Swaine; him afterwards hee created King of Norway, which lately hee had conquered from Olasse called the Martyr. The like policie, saith Higden and others, others, shee used in bringing forth Harold her second Sonne, who was (say they) the sonne of a Sowter; notwithstanding I thinke the condition of the Mother, who lived in disdaine, and dyed in disgrace, rather caused this report to be blazed, then any such basenesse of birth in the sonnes.

(20) Emma, the second wife of King Canute, was the widow of King Ethelred the Unready; and from the time of her first marriage was called in England, Alfgive, after the name of most of the former Queens which had succeeded Saint Alfgive. She was married unto him in the moneth of July, and yeare of Christ Iesus one thousand and seventeene, being the first yeare of his raigne: whose wife she was eighteene yeares, and surviving, kept still at Winchester, unto which Church she gave nine Manors, according to the number of those fiery Plow-shares that she was forced to goe upon, for her purgation, in the raigne of Edward her sonne, as shall be said. This Church she adorned with many goodly vestures, and very rich Iewels: and deceasing in this City the first of March, the yeare of Grace one thousand fifty and two, and ninth of her sonne King Edwards raigne, was buried in the Church of S. Swithine neere unto Canutus her husband.

(21) Sweyn, the eldest sonne of Canute by Lady Alfgive, was borne before his father was King of England, and before his fathers death, was constituted King of Norway, lately conquered from King Olasse the Martyr; where hee began his raigne in the yeare of mans salvation one thousand thirty and five, being the eighteenth of his fathers Raigne in England; and after he had with dislikes ruled that Realme, the space of five yeares, hee was rejected of the Norwegians his subjects, and deceasing without heire of his body, left the Kingdome to the native heire, Magnus, the sonne of Olasse, who had beene wrongfully dispossessed by Canute.

(22) Harold the second sonne of King Canute and of Lady Alfgive, was also borne before his father obtained the English Crowne, and for his exceeding swiftnesse was surnamed Hare-foote: Hee remained with his father in England, after he had dispossed of Denmarke to Hardi-canute, and Norway to Sweyn, his brethren, expecting something in reversion. But perceiving at his fathers death, that England was also appointed to his brother Hardi-Canute, he tooke the advantage of his absence, and assumed the Soveraignty of this Kingdome to himselfe.

(23) Hardi-Canute, the third sonne of King Canute, and his first by Queene Emma his wife, was borne about the beginning of his fathers raigne, and towards the end of the same, was constituted King of the Danes, and designed to succeed him after his death in the Kingdome of England: But being absent then in Denmarke, was dissappointed by his brother Harold, who succeeded his father, after whose death he also succeeded him.

(24) Gunhilda, the daughter of King Canute, and of Emma his Queene, was the first wife of Henry the Third Romane Emperour, sonne of the Emperour Conrad, the second of that name, surnamed Salike: Shee was a Lady of a surpassing beauty, which either mooved her husbands minde unto jealousie, or the over-lavish report thereof to breed surmize of incontinency; for accused she was of adultery, and to defend her cause by combat, none could be found, till lastly her Page, brought with her from England, seeing no other would adventure for her innocency, entred the list, himselfe but a youth, in regard of the other Combatant being a Giant-like man: yet in fight at one blow, cutting the sinewes of his enemies legge, with another he feld him to the ground, where presently with his sword, he rooke his head from the shoulders, and so redeemed his Ladies life. After which hard usage, the Empresse Cunhilda forsooke her husbands bed, and by no meanes could bee brought againe unto the same, but tooke the holy vaile of a Nunne in the Towne of Burges in Flanders; where shee spent the rest of her life, and after her death was buried in the Collegiate Church of Saint Donation, being the principall of that Towne, where her Monument remaineth besides the North doore of the same Church unto this day.

(25) Another Lady of the like sanctity, is reported to be the daughter of king Canute, and the second wife of Godescalke Prince of the Vandals, by whom he had Henry King of that Nation. They both are said to have suffered Martyrdome for the faith of Christ, he first at the City of Lenzim, and she after at Michelenburg, being most cruelly tortured to death with whips. This Lady upon sundry strong inducements cannot be reputed legitimate, which mooved Andrew Velley a Danish writer in our time, to be therein of a divers opinion from Adam of Breme, and Helmoldus, who lived five hundred yeares before him.

HAROLD THE SECOND DANISH KING RAIGNING IN ENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE FIFTH MONARCH OF THE LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND ACTS.

CHAPTER. IIII.

An. Dom. 1036.

Canutus being dead, and Hardi-Canute his sonne by Queene Emma, then in Denmarke; Harold his elder(but base-brother) foreslowed not the opportunity offered; for seeing himselfe in his fathers life time neglected, and by Will at his death, England with that of Denmarke heaped upon Hardi-Canute: as quicke in apprehension,as he was of footmanship (whereof arose the surname Harefoot,) made strong his side by the Londoners,and Danes, Mercians and Northumbrians very many, yea, and some great Personages amongst them, affecting his claime: but Goodwin of Kent,who had the Queen and her treasure in keeping, stood in his way, pretending himselfe Guardian of her Children,and the Will of Canutus, who appointed his sonne by her to succeed.

Matth. West. Will. Malmsb. Peter de Iohan.

(2) The opposition grew strong, and the factions ripened, even ready to seede, onely the lingering of Hardi-Canute gave leave unto Harold to better his side by daily supplies, and the feares of civill sedition moved the Nobility to argue with words and not weapons, the title depending betwixt these two brethren. At Oxford they met, where the presence of the one,downe-pieced the absence of the other, so that their voyces went onely with Harold, and presently proclaimed and consecrated him King.

Henry Hunt.

(3) Hee began his raigne the yeare of Christs humanity,1036. and was very solemnely crowned at Oxford by Elnothus, Archbishop of Canterbury, though for a time hee was very unwilling to performe that service; for it is reported, that he having the regall Scepter and Crowne in his custody, with an oath refused to consecrate any other for King, so long as the Queenes children were living; For (said he) Canutus committed them to my trust and assurance, and to them will I give my faith and allegiance. This Scepter and Crowne therefore I heere lay downe upon this Altar; neither doe I denie,nor deliver them to you; but I require by the Apostolicke Authoritie, all Bishops,that none of them presume to take the same away,neither therewith that they consecrate you for King: as for your selfe if you dare, you may usurpe that which I have committed to God on this his Table.

Florilegus.

Notwithstanding,that great thunderclap was allayed with the showres of golden promises, of his just and religious government intended, though present experience manifested the contrary.

Encom. Emm.

(4) For saith the ancient Writer of the Booke called Encomium Emmæ: Harold no sooner was established King,but that he sought meanes how to rid Queen Emma out of the way, and that secretly, for openly hee durst not attempt any thing against her: Shee in silence kept her selfe quiet,looking for the issue of his designes. But Harold maliciously purposing, tooke counsell how hee might traine into his Haye the sonnes of Queene Emma, that so all occasion of dangers against him might at once for all be cut off. Many projects propounded, this lastly tooke effect; that a letter should be counterfeited in Queen Emma's name, unto her sonnes Edward and Alfred, to instigate them to attempt the crowne usurped by Harold against their right, the tenure whereof wee have thought good here to insert.

"(5) Emma, Queene onely in name, to Edward "and Alfred her sonnes, sendeth motherly gree- "tings. Whilest severally we bewaile the death "of our Soveraigne,my Lord and your Father, and "your selves (deare sonnes) still more and more dis- "possessed from the Kingdome, your lawfull inhe- "ritance; I greatly marvaile what you determine to doe,

"doe, sith you know, that the delay of attempts "gives the usurper more leasure to lay his foun- "dation, and more safely to set thereon his in- "tended buildings; for incessantly hee posteth "from Towne to Towne, and from City to City, "to make the Lords and Rulers thereof his, either "by threates, prayers, or present rewards. But "this in private they signifie, that they had rather "one of you their Natives should raigne over them; "then this Usurper and Danish stranger. Where- "fore my desireis, that either of you secretly, and "with all speed come unto mee, whereby wee may "advise together what is to be done in this so great "an enterprise: then whose good successe, I desire "nothing more. Faile not therefore to send word by "this my messenger, how you meane to proceed: "and so fare ye well, my deerest bowels,and very in- "wards of my heart.

Ex Emma.

(6) These letters thus carried and cunningly delivered, were digested as favouring of no falshood; and by the bringers, others returned, that Alfred should come shortly over to attend his mothers designes: these newes brought unto Harold, the coasts were fore-laid, and longing expectation attended the prey. Alfred as forward to set on his voyage, made Baldwin Earle of Flanders his; and some few Bullogners increasing his Fleet, hee tooke the seas for England: where comming to shore, Earle Goodwin met him, and binding his assurance with his corporall oath, became his liege-man, and guide to Queene Emma; but being wrought firme for Harold, trecherously led these strangers a contrary way, and at Guilford lodged them in severall companies, making known to the King what hee had done: who forthwith apprehended them, even in their beds, and in the morning as chained prisoners, committing them to slaughter, (contrary to the wonted manner of military decimation,) did spare and exempt onely every tenth man for service or sale: Prince Alfred himselfe was sent prisoner to the Isle of Ely, where having his eyes inhumanely put out, lived not long after in torment and griefe.

Ran Higd. lib. Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 11.

(7) Some adde unto the former, an other, much more horrible kinde of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawne out, and fastned to a stake, his body pricked with sharpe needles, or poinards, was forced about till all his entrails were extracted, to which most savage torture hee ended his innocent life.

Will. Canten.

Henry. Hunt.

(8) Harold thus freed from one, the other hee thought would no further attempt; and therefore the more boldly see himselfe against their mother Queene Emma, whose goods he confiscated, and banished her out of the Realme: who thus distressed, was honourably received, and for three yeeres space maintained by Baldwin Earle of Flanders.

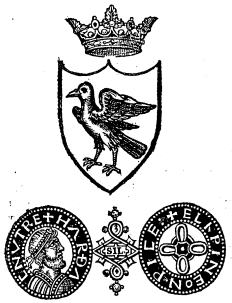
(9) The Dane then seeing his hazards thus prevented, sought so to secure himselfe, and with sixeteene shippes of the Danish Fleete kept the seas, which continued ever in a readinesse, and wasted from Port to Port; to the maintenance whereof, hee charged the English with great payments, to their no little grudge and repining; whereby he lost the love of his subjects before it had well taken roor in their hearts.



Malmsbur. Hen. Huntting. Stow.

(10) Neither yet held hee on long in these disroyall courses, for that his speedy death did cut off the infirmy of a longer life; and is said to have died at Oxford in the moneth of April, the yeere of Christ Iesus 1040. after hee had raigned foure yeeres and some moneths: whose body was at first interred at Westminster, having beene neither in warres so hardy, nor in government so prosperous, as his Father Canute, before him had beene, nor left behind him either wife or children, to survive his person, or revive his name.

CHAPTER. V.

An. Dom. 1040.

Simon Dun. Matth. Weſt.

THE States of the Land, as well Engliſh as Danes, that had ſtood for Harold, both in obtaining and keeping the Crowne, now ſeeing him fallen, thought it beſt to make way for their peace, before Hardi-Canute by his ſword ſhould purchaſe their ſubjection; therefore with all haſte they ſent into Denmarke, with proffers of the Scepter, and their forward allegiance only unto him. Thoſe parts beyond ſeas, were not then ſo ſubjective, as to build his hopes there, upon any ſure ground; for the Norwegians had thruſt out his halfe-brother Sweyne, and had elected Magnus the ſon of Olaffe for their King; ſo that ſmall aſſurance could he perceive of any quiet Common-weale among them: and therefore fore-flowing not the offer, immediately imbarked his men of warre, and with ſo favourable a wind tooke Seas, that he arrived upon the Coaſt of Kent, the ſixth day after he had ſet ſaile out of Denmarke; and with great pompe conveyed to London, was there proclaimed Englands King.

(2) He began his raigne in the yeare of grace one thouſand and forty, and was crowned in London by Elnothus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, being the thirty ſixth Monarch of the Engliſhmen: his raigne was ſpent in doing nothing, vnleſſe you will ſay, in doing evill, he did ſomething.

(3) For no ſooner had he a power to command, but he forthwith commanded the body of his halfe-brother the deceaſed King, to be digged up, & with ſpitefull diſgrace to be throwne into Thamiſis, where it remained untill a Fiſherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of S. Clement without Temple-Bar, commonly called S. Clement-Danes: for that (ſaith Stow) it was the burying place of the Danes: this cruelty ſhewed, was pretended for the hard uſage of Queene Emma his mother, though partly ſpiced with revenge for his uſurpation of the Crown againſt him.

John Stowis his Survey of London.

(4) Yet worthily is he to be commended, for the reverent regard hee bare to his Mother, and loving affection to his brother; for no ſooner was he riſen out of the throne of his Coronation, but that hee ſent honorable Embaſſage unto Earle Baldwine, with many thankes to him for her princely uſage, and for her to returne into England to her former eſtate, and place of Queene. His brother Prince Edward comming over to viſite them both, was moſt honourably received, retained, and diſmiſſed; and theſe are the vertues regardable in this King.

Henry Hunt.

(5) But his vices were more, and concerned more perſons; for a great Epicure hee was, and given much unto Cuppes, whereby hee trained the body to belly-cheere, and ſenſe to be ſubject to ſloath and drunkenneſſe; foure times every day were his tables ſpred, and plenteouſly with all Cates furniſhed, ever commanding that his Courtiers, gueſts, and ſervants, ſhould rather leave, for ſuperfluity, then call, for lack: which howſoever it was in him accounted for Royall bounty, yet it cauſed in the people (who uſe to praiſe the Soveraignes vertues, but imitate his vices) a riotous looſeneſſe, and the Common-weale to lie ſicke of Conſumptions, bred by ſuch exceſſe of thoſe groſſe humours in her body.

Will. Malmesb.

(6) This wrought in him a careleſſe neglect of government in State, ſo that the whole managing thereof was committed to his mother Queene Emma, a woman extreamely coverous, and to Goodwin, the rich and politicke Earle of Kent; who ſeeing the preſent ſtate carried wholly away with preſent pleaſures ſures, thought that a fitte ſubject for him to worke upon; for the King not married (unleſſe it were to his lewd will) and Edward likely to ſucceede, of an over-ſoft temperature; he thought theſe both might prove advantageous to his ambition, and therefore bethought him, how the Crowne might be worne by him or his.

Conſpiracies & Engliſh policy.

Hunt. Hunt. will. Malmesb. Matth. weſt. Simon Dun.

(7) Therefore, to ſeparate the hearts of the ſubjects from the Prince (then which, there can be no greater a wound unto both,) hee cauſed the King to impoſe heavy tributes upon the Engliſh, onely to pay the Danes in his Fleete, appointing every common Souldier and Mariner, to receive eight markes in mony, and every officer and Maſter twelve; which amounted to the ſumme of thirty two thouſand, one hundred forty ſeaven-pounds: for the payment whereof, there was ſo great a grudge, that two of the Collectors, Thurſtane and Feader were ſlaine by the Citizens of Worceſter; which cauſed their City to be burnt, and part of the country ſpoiled by the Kings command, and their Biſhop Alfred expulſed the See, till with money he had purchaſed his peace. This Biſhops hands (as was ſaid) were deep in the murther of Prince Alfred, the Kings halfe brother, whom wee ſpake of; yea, and Goodwin himſelfe was put to his purgation by oath, for the clearing of his ſuſpitions in that treacherous and brutiſh fact: which oath was the lighter urged, and the eaſier received for his rich and bounteous gifts, immediately before preſented to the King, and that was a Shippe, whoſe ſterne was of gold, with fourefcore Souldiers therein placed, all vniformely and richly ſuited: On their heads they all wore guilt Burgeners, and on their bodies a triple gilt habergion, a Sword with gilt hilts girded to their waſtes, a Battaile-axe (after the manner of the Danes) on their left ſhoulders, a Target with guilt boſſes borne in their left hands, a Dart in the right, their armes bound about with two bracelets of gold containing ſixteene ounces in weight.

(8) Aimundus Bremenſis writing the Stories of thoſe times; ſheweth, that the three ſonnes of Canute were poſſeſſed of the three Kingdomes, England, Denmarke, and Norway, though the father by Will, had diſpoſed of the firſt otherwiſe; which moved Hardi-Canute much to maligne the roialty of Harold, whoſe Crowne by birth and covenant belonged to him; and therefore with great preparation, intending to recover his right, hee entred the Sea, and came into Flanders, where having notice of the uſurpers death, his rage was ſtaied, and hee peaceably came in, and received the Crowne.

Ibm. cap. 109.

(9) And that Sweine (called the Younger) King of Denmarke, to aſſiſt his Vncle Hardi-Canute againſt Harold the uſurper of Englands Crowne, with a great Armie prepared thitherward; and taking the Seas, were by tempeſts driven upon the coaſts of Hadeloe, where his Armie doing ſome hurt, was ſet upon and diſcomfited by the ſouldiers of the Arch-biſhoppe: himſelfe amongſt them being taken priſoner, and brought into the preſence of the Arch-biſhop, was by him moſt honourably received, and conveied unto Breme, who there entered a league with him, and with gifts and other complements, after a few dayes' ſuffered him to depart; who likewiſe hearing of the death of King Harold, returned backe to his owne Country, where ſhortly after he was much moleſted by Magnus, the ſonne of Olaf, then raigning King over the Norwegians.

Idem. M. S. c. 122.

(10) Hardi-Canute in England, hearing of thoſe ſtirres, thought it his part to aid his Nephew King Sweyn, againſt the invaſions of Magnus: and therefore hee ſent one Sueno his kinſeman, with an Armie of the Engliſh, to re-eſtabliſh King Sweyn in his Throne. Theſe entred Norway, and the Field againſt the Norwegians, but by them were ſo over-laid, that hee left Magnus the vanquiſher, and returned againe for England; but before he could arrive at the Shore, King Hardi-Canute was dead, with whom dyed the iſſue of that warre; whoſe death was ſuddaine, and after this manner.

Simon Dunel. Matth. weſt.

(11) At the celebration of a great marriage, contracted betwixt a Daniſh Lord, called Canut-Prudan, and Lady Githa, the daughter of a Noble-man, whoſe name was Oſgot Clappa, in a ſolemne aſſembly, and banquet at Lambeth the eighth of June, revelling and carouſing amidſt his cups, he ſodainly fell downe without ſpeech or breath: whoſe loſſe was the leſſe lamented for his exceſſe, riotouſneſſe, and unwonted exactions: but chiefly becauſe a much better was then to ſucceede him; having himſelfe had neither wife nor childe that is read of. Yea, ſo farre were all ſorts from bewailing him, that in regard of the freedome from the Daniſh yoke, which they attained by his deceaſe, ever ſince among the common people; the day of his death is annually celebrated with open paſtimes in the ſtreetes (as the old Romanes kept their fugalia, for chaſing out of their Kings,) which time is now called Hoctide or Hucxtide, ſignifying a time of ſcorning or contempt; which fell upon the Danes by his death.

His body with all due obſequies was interred at Wincheſter by his fathers, after hee had voluptuouſly raigned two yeeres lacking ten dayes, and departed his life and kingdome the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 1042.

(12) With the death of this King died all rule of the Danes in this land, and the ſacred ſparke of the Saxons fire (through three of their ſucceſſions) buried in their owne aſhes, beganne now to take flame and to burne moſt bright, which was Prince Edward (now commonly called the Confeſſor) the ſonne of King Ethelred; and albeit there were others betwixt him and the Crowne, as namely, Edward and Edmund the ſonnes of the Iron-ſide, yet the one dying in Hungarie without iſſue of body, the other there living as a baniſhed man (by ſurname the Out-law) was neither ſo well regarded, nor thought ſo worthy of government, as this other Edward was, whom therefore they ſent for, and with ſo great applauſe and acclamations proclaimed, that the preſent joy ſeemed to prognoſticate a perpetuall happineſſe to the Engliſh, who had beene moſt miſerably afflicted by the Danes, for the ſpace of two hundred forty two yeeres; though this line againe failed, before it was well begunne.

EDVVARD THE CONFESSOR,
SONNE OF KING ETHELRED, THE THIRTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN; HIS RAIGNE, VERTVES, AND MARRIAGE.

CHAPTER VI.

An. Dom. 1042. Hen. Hunting.

EDward, the third of that Name before the Conquest, halfe-brother to the deceased Hardi-Canute, and sonne to King Ethelred by Queene Emma his Wife, was by the provident care of a Mothers affection, (when the variable succesſe of Warre, doubtfully depended betwixt Edmund the Engliſh, and Canutus the Dane) ſent into Normandy to Duke Richard her Brother, there to be ſecured from all domeſticall ſtirres: and now, before the dead Corpes could be interred, with a generall Conſent of the Nobles was elected their King.

Legend. Aur. in vit. S. Edward.

(2) I know well that in the Legend of this holy mans life, more things are recorded, then with ſafety of truth may be either beleeved, or delivered; as that he was choſen King by conſent of Parliament, when as yet he was in his mothers wombe, Ethelred his Father at the ſame time having many other ſons alive; as alſo when the deſtroying Danes had extinguiſhed by their warres almoſt the whole Royall iſſue of the Engliſh, the holy Monk Brightwold of Glaſtenbury deploring their loſſe, and the lands miſerable eſtate, had in viſion this Edward, then an Exile, preſented unto him by the Apoſtle S. Peter himſelfe, who then annointing him King in his ſight, telling him that his Raigne ſhould be peaceable, and twenty three yeares for continuance; Brightwold yet unſatisfied who ſhould next ſucceed, demanded the reſolution, and was anſwered by Peter, that the kingdome of England was Gods owne Kingdome; for whoſe ſucceſſors himſelfe would provide. With ſuch vaine predictions our otherwiſe true Stories are over-charged; which moved Comineus the worthy French Hiſtorian, to taxe the Engliſh with over-much credulity that way.

will. Malmesb. Henry Hunt. Higden. Polyd. lib. 6.

(3) But

(3) But moſt true it is, that the Engliſh Nobility diſclaiming all Daniſh ſubjection, preſently upon the death of King Harold, enacted, That none of their blood ſhould any more raigne over them: putting this their Decree in execution by caſhiering all Danes from the Caſtles, Forts, and Garriſon Townes throughout all the Land, whence ſome even of their Blood Royall were forced to depart. Then ſending ſecuritie into Normandy, with proffer of the Crowne unto Prince Edward had his conſent, and aſſiſtance of Duke William his Coſen German.

(4) This Edward (as elſewhere hath been ſaid) was borne at Iſlip neere unto Oxford, and tenderly educated by Queene Emma his Mother; and after his Fathers death, for ſafety ſent into France; where by his ſweet converſation he gained the love of all, and as much himſelfe affected thoſe ſtrangers, which was ſome blemiſh of policy in the face of his government, when he hadgot the Diademe, as being of diſpoſition over-ſoft, & ever too pliant (an imperfection in a Soveraigne) to take the impreſſe of any ſtampe. In which mould, the aſpiring Goodwin, Earle of Kent, did caſt the fabricke of his owne deſignes; who had made away Alfred, his younger, but of a more reſolute ſpirit, that ſo the baſis of his owne piller (whoſe top in time he hoped to crowne) might be ſet, if not upon, yet with the neereſt to the Throne.

Ran. Higden. Ingulf. Stratus.

(5) Hee therefore, the formoſt both in will and power, uſed both to eſtabliſh Prince Edward in his right, being ſeconded by Leofricke Earle of Cheſter, and Livinus Biſhop of Worceſter, and indeed with the generall aſſiſtance of all the Engliſh; who now were ſo jealous of all forraine powers, that they forbad an over-great traine of Normans, (though comming for his aid) to attend their new-choſen King.

Alfred Beverel. Hen. Hunt.

(6) His Coronation was at Winchester, with great concourſe of people, and the celebration performed by Eſtſine, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, upon the very day of Chriſt his reſurrection, being alſo a new-riſing day to the Engliſh Nation) the yeare of grace 1042. himſelfe being aged then towards fourty, and was in number the thirty ſeventh Monarch of England, where he raigned with ſuch Juſtice and Piety, that he obtained the venerable name of Saint, and unto poſterities is diſtinguiſhed from the other Edwards, by the adjunct Confeſſor.

Ran. Higd. in Polyc. lib. 6. cap. 24.

(7) In the entrance of his government to witneſſe his love to his people, he fought every way the furtherance of their wealth, and afterwards remitted the moſt heavy tribute of fourty thouſand pounds yearly, gathered by the name of Dane-gile, which had bin impoſed by his Father, and payed for fourty yeeres continuance, out of the lands of all, except onely the Clergie, becauſe (ſay our ancient lawes) the King repoſed more confidence in the prayers of holy Church, then in the power of Armies. Then, from the divers Lawes of the Mercians, VVeſt-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he ſelected the beſt, and made of them one body certaine, and written in Latine, (that all men of any learning might know whereon to relye, to be the touch of his Common-wealths Pleas, and the ſquire by which he would have every right to be meaſured, being (in a ſort) the fountaine of thoſe, which at this day wee terme the Common-Lawes, though the formes of pleading and proceſſe therein, were afterward brought in by the Conqueſt.

(8) The raigne of this King, by moſt writers records, was more ſpent in peace and works of true Piety, then in wars and blood, though ſome diſſentions hapned both domeſticall and forreine: for about the yeere one thouſand forty five, and third of his raigne, a royall Navie was rigged in Sandwich haven, againſt Magnus King of Norway, who then intended to invade England, and indeed had ſo done, if the wars of Sweyn king of Denmark had not diverted his purpoſe.

(9) This Sweyn was the ſonne of Duke Wolfe, by Olryd his Ducheſſe, ſiſter to Hardi-Canute, who as I find written in the Manuſcript of Aimundus Bremenſis, being in poſſeſſion of two kingdomes, prepared his Navie for the conqueſt of England alſo: But, (ſaith he) King Edward governing that kingdome with great Juſtice and love, choſe rather his peace with proffers of Tribute, and promiſes that after his death the Crowne ſhould be his, yea, though himſelfe ſhould have children: howbeit this ſeemeth not to found for truth; for Sweyn ſending his Ambaſſadours unto Edward to crave aide againſt Magnus (his grievous and mortall enemy) could obtaine none, and Harold Harfagar, the ſucceſſor of Magnus, and enemy to Sweyn, preſently thereupon ſent unto Edward for a league of amity, which was ratified firmely betwixt them.

Polidor. Virgil. lib. 11.

(10) Neither may we think that ever he meant his Crowne that way; for that beſides the decree enacted againſt all Daniſh claimes, his deſire to eſtabliſh it in the Engliſh blood is moſt manifeſt, by ſending for Edward his Nephew, the ſonne of Edmund Ironſide, remaining in Hungary, and that ſo long out of England, that he was called the Outlaw; who coming over, brought with him his wife Agatha, and children, Edgar a ſonne, and Margaret and Chriſtian his daughters; him Edward meant to have made heire to the Crowne, had he not beene prevented by haſty death, whereupon the King deſigned young Edgar, his ſonne, the heire apparent, and gave him the ſurname of Adeling, a name of great honour appropriated to the Princes of the blood, and men capable of the Crowne.

Matth. Weſt.

King Edward deſigneth the Crowne to an Engliſhman.

(11) Beſides theſe former attempts, certaine Daniſh Pirates entred the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-coaſts of Eſſex they ſpoiled, and in Flanders made Merchandize of their prey. The Iriſh likewiſe with thirty ſixe ſhips entred Severn, and with the aſſiſtance of Griffith King of South-Wales burnt or ſlew all that they found; againſt whom Alfred Biſhop of Worceſter went and fought, but with ſuch ſucceſſe, that many of his Souldiers were ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight; which made the Welſhmen far more bold, and Reſe the brother of Griffith, make many incurſions to fetch preyes out of England, till at length he was ſlaine at Bulenden, and his head preſented to King Edward at Glouceſter.

(12) His domeſticall moleſtations, were chiefly by Earle Goodwin and his ſonnes; and thoſe firſt ſpringing upon this following occaſion. Euſtace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne, who had married Goda, ſiſter by the fathers ſide to King Edward, came into England to viſite him then lying at Glouceſter, and returning homeward, at Canterbury his Herbinger dealing roughly with a Burgeſſe for lodgings, cauſed his owne death; which when his Lord heard of, thirſting for reuenge, he ſlew eighteene Citizens in the heat of his furie: The Canterburians in as great rage got them to armour, and ſlew twenty of his retinew, wounding many more, and made the Earle to recoile; whoſe grievous complaint comming to the King, hee commanded Goodwin to ſee execution done upon the offenders. Earle Goodwin not haſty to follow his commiſſion, adviſed the King to examine the cauſe before he maſſacred his true ſubjects at the inſtigation of Strangers; whereat King Edward was highly offended, and Goodwin thereby gained great love of the Commons. This occaſioned Robert Gemeticenſis a Norman, firſt made Biſhop of London, and after Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to ſpread the Curtain of diſfavour betwixt Goodwin and the King, urging his refuſall as an Act of Contempt, wherein more dangers might lie hid then were to be ſuffered; whereupon Edward called an aſſembly of Eſtates, appointing a day of meeting at Glouceſter.

(13) The Commons (whoſe common guiſe is, deadly to hate all ſtrangers, though many times well deſerving) now ſeeing Earle Goodwin in danger for their good, were eaſily drawne to aſſiſt him and his cauſe, and in warlike manner guarded his perſon, at Beverſtane not farre from the King. The Eſtates aſſembled, and Goodwin ſent for, hee refuſed to come, pretending ſervice againſt the Welſh; then ready to make inroades, and that his preſence was more needfull full there, then at Court; albeit the Welsh-men cleared themselves by sending their Ambassadors unto the King. The suspicions increasing, great preparation on both sides was made; to assist the King came Leofricke the worthy Earle of Chester, Sinard the stout Earle of Northumberland, and Rodulfe Earle of Hereford his sister Godas sonne, by her first husband Walter de Maigne.

Ran. Higd. Matth. Westm. Simon Dunel.

(14) To Goodwin repaired his people of Southerrie and Kent, and to him were brought by Swaine his sonne, the men of Oxford, Sommerset, Hereford, Gloucester, and Berkshires; unto whom, Harold his other sonne, joyned those of Essex, Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntingdonshires, so that his host was exceedingly great, and his minde thereby so inflated, that from Langton, where hee lay, hee sent a bold and Traiterous demand to the King, to have Earle Eustace of Bulloigne with all his French and Normans (that kept then in the Castle of Dover) to be delivered unto him, and his sonnes: which beeing (as good reason was) refused, the Battaile was prepared, and brought to the very point of hazard and ruine of all: For in that quarrell were assembled the greatest Peeres, and Lords of the Land; the Kings love swaying very much with many, but yet the hatred towards Strangers possessing the hearts of more. The beginning thus doubtfull, and the end like to prove dangerous; the matter both with great foresight and providence was referred unto Parliament, to be holden at London with all convenient hast, whereunto pledges were both given and received on either parts.

(15) King Edward strongly guarded with an Army of the Mercians and Northumbrians, entred London, and Goodwin with his sonnes in war-like manner came into Southmarke to his owne house. But his Army wavering, and (as bad causes & consciences make men doe) suspecting the worst, by little and little shrunke away from him; which knowne to the King, he presently pronounced sentence of banishment unto Goodwin and his five sonnes, without further proceeding by way of Parliament, as was determined. Goodwin therefore with great riches and his three sonnes, Swaine, Tostie, and Girth, sailed into Flanders, and Harold with his brother Leofwine, from Bristow passed into Ireland; who were no sooner gone, but the King proclaimed them Out-lawes, and gave the Earldome of Harold unto Algar, the son of Leofricke, Earle of Chester. This Leofricke is he, which at his Countesses request freed the Citie Coventrie of their importable tribute imposed, as we have elsewhere said.

Book 1. chap. 27. Henry Hunt.

(16) In the second yeere of Goodwins banishment, both himselfe and those his sonnes with him, having gotten ships convenient for warre, in manner of Pirats came upon the coasts of Kent and Sussex, doing much harme, and returning with spoiles the like did Harold and Leofwin from Scotland, upon the westerne coasts of Sommerset, and Devonshires, who thence coasting about the point of Cornwall, joyned their Fleet with their Fathers, in the Ile of Wight.

Simon Dun.

(17) Against them King Edward prepared, & himselfe, though aged, with a Navie of sixtie ships well furnished for warre, meant to have made an end of that businesse, by the destruction of his adversaries: but the Navies ready to joyne battell, God tooke the cause into his owne hand, and with a thicke fogge so over-spread the seas, that one Fleet could not thereby see another; in which, Goodwin and his complices by contrary windes were driven to the place from whence they came. King Edward still in iealousie of Goodwins returne, rigged forth forty tall shippes, to secure the seas, which kept not so strong a watch, but that Goodwin got by them, solliciting the people of Kent, Sussex, and Surrey unto his aid, and entring Thames, did the like unto them in London, who accepted of his arrivage, though king Edward lay there: so that without disturbance his Navie fell up with the tide, through the fouth Arch of the Bridge, & a mighty army to his aid mustred upon the same side of the river.

(18) The Nobilitie then seeing side against side, and all of them meere English, ready to hazard their bloud in the quarrels of strangers, wrought so with Edward and Goodwin, that they came unto peace, and pledges were againe delivered for the performance, whereof Wilmot the sonne of Earle Goodwin, and Hacun the sonne of Swaine his eldest, were sent to Duke William of Normandy, so greate a truste he ever reposed in strangers. This Swaine, upon a remorse of conscience for the bloud he had spilt, and especially for the slaughter of Beorne his cosen & interressor, who sued to the King for his peace, undertooke a pilgrimage to Ierusalem, and in his returne died in Licia, whether through an extremity of cold, or by the hands of Saracens, that spoiled all they met, it is uncertaine.

will. Malmsb. Rand. Higd. Otot. vell. Simon Dunel.

(19) Goodwin now restored, and in great credit with the king, cast the eye of disdain upon the Archbishop Robert (as commonly Favorites emulate each others) and himselfe being a man eloquent and politicke, so possessed the King both against him and his Normans, that he requited his owne banishment, with all theirs out of England, some few excepted, that were favoured by the English: and now promising himselfe much honour and authority, was sodainly cut off by the stroake of death, surprizing him as he sate at Table with the King upon Munday in the Easter weeke, but died not till the Thursday following, which happened at Winchester, where he was buried.

Polyd. l. 6. c. 24. Stad. chron.

(20) Besides these former forraine and civill molestations, other calamities happened to the land; for in the yeare of Grace 1047. and moneth of Ianuary, there fell so great a Snow, which covered the ground unto the middle of March, that Cattell and Fowles perished abundantly: and on the first of that month the yeare following, a strange and terrible Earthquake happened, which seemed to rent the ground asunder, and withall such Lightnings, as burnt up the Corne growing in the fields; whereby an excessive Dearth followed: so that his raigne was neither so peaceable nor prosperous, as Brightwold the Monke dreamed it should be. But as all these were scourges sent from God upon the land for sin, so both Prince, Pastors, and people, had all severally their part thereof, as being joyntly the causers of the same.

(21) For the King in case of these strangers, put the Land more then once in danger to be lost: and himselfe refraining the bed of his vertuous wife, committed thereby the offence forbidden by the Apostle, and caused her his Queene, either to commit or be accused to have committed adultery. The Clergie likewise altogether unlearned, wanton and vicious: for the Prelates neglecting the offices of Episcopall function, which was to tender the affaires of the Church, and to feed the flocke of Christ, lived themselves idle and covetous, addicted wholly to the pomp of the world, and voluptuous life, little caring for the Churches and soules committed to their charge: and if any told them (saith Higden) that their lives ought to be holy, and their conversation without covetousnesse, according to the sacred prescripe, and vertuous examples of their Elders, they would scoffingly put them off with, Nunc aliud tempus, alii pro tempore mores; Times have mutations, so must mens fashions: and thus (saith he) they plained the roughnes of their doings with smoothnesse of their answers. Briefly, the whole people were so loose and riotous, that as Gervasius Dorobornensis recordeth, they fell so fast to commit wickednesse, as to be ignorant of sinfull crimes, was then held to be a great crime it selfe. And by the testimony of Malmsbury, the sinnes of those times evidently foreshewed a generall destruction: for the Englishmen (saith he) transformed themselves into the strange maners of the French, and that not onely in speech and behaviour, but in their deeds and Charters: their use was then to go fantastically appointed, their garments reaching but to the mid knee, their heads shorne, and their beards shaven all but the upper lip, which grew with long mustaches; continually wearing massie bracelets of gold about about their armes, carrying markes upon their skin pounced in of sundry colours; and the Clergy contenting themselves with triviall literature, could scarcely backe and bow out the words of the Sacrament. These then were Englands dolorous times both of blindnesse and lewdnes, drawing downe Gods wrath for their destruction.

(22) But howsoever this King is reported to bee loving and facile towards strangers, (which in it selfe is a princely vertue if it bee opportunely and warily used:) yet to his owne Mother, and Wife, unnaturally over-rigorous, imprisoning and bereaving them both of all Prince-like honour. Against Queene Emma, his Mother, were instigators Robert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and Earle Goodwin of Kent, the two greatest favorites of the King. The causes objected were, her marriage with Canute the Capitall enemy of England; her regardlessnesse of succouring himselfe and his brother in their exiles, whom (as was alleaged) she contrived to have made away; and that under colour of private devotions, shee had used the company of Alwine Bishop of Winchester over-familiarly, to her great dishonour and the Kings disgrace: for these and the like, hee tooke away all her Jewels, and other substance, and committed her to safe custody in the Abbey of Werwell.

will. Malmsb.

(23) Indeed Malmesbury doth taxe her to have beene infinitely covetous, and that shee was more tenderly affectionate to her Danish, then English children, whereby her love was measured to their fathers. But for the imputation of her incontinency, she washed it off with as sharpe a tryall as any that is recorded for truth, by undergoing that over-hard law Ordalium, when in presence of the King her Sonne, and many of his Peeres, shee passed over betweene nine plough-shares glowing red hot, barefooted and blind folded, without any hurt; using this speech to her leaders, as not knowing shee was past all danger, O Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation? but having her eyes uncovered, and seeing her selfe cleerely escaped, fell upon her knees, and with teares gave thankes to her deliverer, whereby she recovered, both the love and her former estate of the King, with the good esteeme and applause of the people: in memory whereof she gave nine Mannors (according to the number of plough-shares) to the Minster of Winchester, (wherein she had that tryall,) and adorned the same, with many rich ornaments; as likewise the King repenting the wrong hee did her, bestowed on the same place the Iland (so then it was) called Portland in Dorsetshire, being about seven miles in compasse: for so the chance, in those dayes was set, that whosoever lost, the monkes ever wanne.

Ordalium, a tryall of offendors by fire.

(24) Neither were this Kings proceedings better with his owne Wife, how soever some have cloaked that Fraud, (so the Apostle termes it) under the faire robe of Chastity. For he marrying Editha, a Lady incomparable both for beauty and vertues, in whose breft (saith Malmesbury) there was a Schoole of all Liberall Sciences, refused her bed: but whether it were for his debility, or hatred to Goodwin her father, or love of Virginity, I determine not; but am fully perswaded, that the accusation of Adultery wherewith Robert the Arch-bishop did charge her, was more upon envy to her father, then truth of so foule a fact in her, whose vertues were so many, and so memorable, by report of Authors, that were eye-witnesses themselves; for Ingulphus that had oftentimes conference with her, doth thus of her relate.

There was given (saith he) unto King Edward, for his Queene and Wife, the daughter of Goodwine, a most beautifull Damosell, EDITHA by name, excellent well learned in her demeanure, and whole course of life a Virgin most chast, humble, and unfainedly holy, no way favouring of her Fathers or Brethrens barbarousnesse, but mild, modest, faithfull, and innocent, nor ever hurtfull to any: insomuch, that this verse was applyed to her:

Stirps Spitha Regum, genuit Godwinus Egitham;
From prickled stalke as sweetest Rose:
So Egith faire, from Goodwin growes.

All these notwithstanding, the King expulsed her his Court and Bed, and that with no little disgrace; for taking all her goods from her, even to the uttermost farthing, committed her prisoner to the Monastery of Wilton, attended onely with one maid, where she, for a whole yeeres space almost, in teares and prayers expected the day of her release and comfort: All which unprincely, and un-Spouslike usage, as the King pretended, and said, was, because she onely should not live in comfort, when as her Parents and Brethren were banished the Realme: an unjust sentence surely, and unbefitting a Saint, thus to punish the sinnes of the fathers upon their children, contrary to the prescript rule of God, who by his Prophet complaineth against such injustice, and regulateth it with this just verdict, That soule that sinneth shall dye: and for her pure and unviolated chastity, himselfe on his death-bed spake, saying, That openly she was his wife, but in secret imbracings as his owne sister.

(25) Yet behold the blindnesse, and partiality of those times, wherein for this his onely refusall of nuptiall duties, the pencils of those that should have shewed his true face to posterities, have so embellished his portraiture and lineaments, that unto the beholder hee seemeth now no mortall creature; his miracles and fore-sayings answerable to most of the Prophets; which here to insert, in so worthy a subject and holy Kings life, were both to fill up with a needlesse surcharge, whole leaves of Times waste abuses, and to breed a suspition of those other things in him, which we know for found truth; as was his gift from God, through his holy invocations, and touch of the place affected, to cure the disease called Strume, now the Kings-Evill, which unto this day in his successors, hath been experienced upon many such healings, by the touch of those gracious hands who have held the Scepter, as Gods Vicegerents of this most blessed and happy Kingdome. That he had the spirit of Prophecie, many have thought, as also the notice of his owne death, some constantly affirme; by a Ring sent him from Ierusalem, the same that he long time before had given to a Pilgrime: but these with his other miraculous cures, his fight of the Danes destruction, and the Seven-Sleepers in the Mount Cellion besides Ephesus, with infinite others, I leave to his Legend-writers, and Aluredus Rivallensis to relate, who have written his many miracles with no sparing pen. Most true it is that of a little Monastery dedicated to Saint Peter in the West of London, by the river of Thames, hee made a most beautifull and faire Church, where he likewise provided for his owne Sepulcher, and another dedicated to S. Margaret, standing without the Abbey: This of Westminster he endowed with very rich revenewes, and confirmed their Charters under his Broad Seale, being the first of the Kings of England, who used that large and stately impression in their Royall Charters and Parents: the very true forme whereof, according to the rude sculpture of those elder times, we have portrayted in the front of this Chapter, as we intend likewise to doe in the rest succeeding; whereof this use at least, (if no other) may be made, that by benefit of those paterns, men may know from what Princes they first received the Charters of their ancient possessions, and Patents of their honours, which the Princes stile (many being of one name) cannot sufficiently make knowne.

King Edward the Confessor founded the Abbey Church and Colledge of Westminster.

The said Church of Westminster he built for the discharge of his vowed pilgrimage to Ierusalem, and that in such sumptuous manner, that it was in those dayes the paterne of all other stately buildings. He founded also the Colledge of S. Mary Otery in the County of Devon, and gave unto it the Village of Otereg, and removed the Bishops See from Cridington to Excester, as a place of farre more dignity; where the King taking the right hand, and the Queene the left, led Leofricke from the high Altar, and installed him the first Bishop of that See: Finally, when he had raigned the space of twenty yeeres, five moneths, and twenty seven dayes; hee dyed the fourth of Ianuary, the yeere of Christ Iesus one thousand sixty sixe, and was with great lamentations and solemnity buried in his Church at Westminster, the morrow after the feast of the Epiphany.

Hee was of person well proportioned, of Countenance sober, and of complexion faire; naturally courteous and gentle to all (and thereby too prone and credulous to suggestions) loving to his subjects, and over-loving unto Strangers. A Prince of much vertue and integrity of life, notwithstanding which, had it not beene vailed under the faire shew of Chastity, he had not so easily beene canonized for a Saint; wherein yet the seeming wisest taxed his wisdome, whilest under a godly pretext of Religion and vowed Virginity, hee cast off all care of having issue, and exposed the Kingdome for a prey to the greedy desires of ambitious humours.

His Wife.

Editha, the wife of King Edward, was the daughter of Goodwin, Duke of the West-Saxons, and Earle of Kent: her mother was Gith the sister of Sweyne the younger, King of Denmarke; she was married unto him the yeere of Christs humanity, 1045. and fourth of his raigne. Shee was his wife eighteene yeeres and surviving him lived a widdow eight more, and in the eight yeere of King William the Conquerours raigne, dyed in December, the yeere of Christs birth, 1074. and was buried by her husband in Saint Peters Church at Westminster.

Chapter VII.

THe people sorrowing for the death of their King, and the Stated-men perplexed for choise of a new; Edgar Athelings title was worthy of more unpartiall respect then it found: for him they held too young for governement: besides, a stranger borne, scarce speaking English: and withall, the prophecies of Edward touching the alienation of the Crowne; the Interest of the Danes; and the claime that Duke William made, (both by gift and consanguinity,) bred great distraction of desires, and opinions; but nothing concluded for setling the State; no man either assuming or proffering the Diademe, because none had the power, or right, to adorne therewith his owne head. In this Calme conference a sodaine gale arose, which blew all the sailes spread for that winde into one Port. And that was Harold Sonne to Earle Goodwine, a man (duly prizing his many worthy parts) not unmeete for a Kingdome: who who first succeeding his father in his Dukedome; and next Edward (his brother in Law) in his Kingdome, in patience, clemencie, and affabilitie bare himselfe most approovedly towards the vertuous, but with a Lyons courage, and fierce countenance chastised the disordered, and indeed became another Maccabeus unto the distressed Land. Whose kingly state before wee touch, it shall not bee amisse to lengthen his short raigne with his Acts and Life, as he was a Subject, both with, and against his Lord and Predecessor.

(2) That hee tooke part with his Father against Eustace of Bulloigne, and King Edwards hasty Commission, we have shewed; himselfe then enjoying the Earledome of Oxford, and so affected by those of Essex, Suffolke, and Norfolke, Cambridge and Huntingtonshires, that they sided in his cause against the King; But these designes failing, (as commonly it is seene all attempts of Subjects against their Soveraigns doe) hee learned by banishment, what was the losse of true honour, and by forbearance of battaile (when halfe the Kingdome stood for him) his duety obliged unto the Common-wealth. And growne againe into favour with the King, carried himselfe answerably unto both.

An. Dom. 1055. Matth. Weſt. Simeo Dun.

(3) Some jealousie conceived; Edward without any cause, banished Algar the son of Leofrike Earle of Chester, who with the help of the Irish and Welshmen, under the conduct of Gruffith ap Llewelyn Prince of North-Wales (who had married his daughter,) did much hurt to the English, putting Radulph Earle of Hereford to flight, with the slaughter of five hundred men, spoiled the Citie, burnt the Minster and became Masters of mis-rule in those parts. Against these was Harold sent, and with such manhood pursued his flying enemies, that passing thorow North-Wales, upon the Snow-downes hee pitched his Field: The Earle, and Prince Gruffith, not daring to abide his presence, fled thence unto South-Wales, and againe tooke into Hereford; whereof Harold having intelligence hasted thither-ward (leaving sufficient in the Snow-downes to mate the Welsh,) and recovering the Citie, with a deepe trench and high rampire fortified it about, where for the saving of more bloud (and not ungratefull to Algar, who without grudge had resigned to him his Earldome, and whole Revenewes at his returne from exile) a Peace was concluded, and at Harolds request, Earle Algar and Prince Gruffith were pardoned.

An. Dom. 1058. Simeo Dun.

(4) But Algar being againe accused, and again aided by his old associate Gruffith, recovered his Earledome by force, whereat King Edward was highly displeased, but most against Gruffith, who ever was ready to assist any against him: whereupon Harold, the second time appointed Generall, with a great host entered North-Wales, without sight of enemy, where he onely burnt downe the stately Palace of Prince Gruffith, and so returned to the King. But long the Welsh were not quiet, nor the Prince pleased of the harmes to him done. Wherefore making his forces very strong hee againe molested the English.

An. Dom. 1063. Matth. Weſtm.

(5) To restraine whom once more was Harold sent forth, who with such terrour burst into Wales, that Prince Gruffith, in secret stole from his Campe, leaving his Souldiers, (if they would) to fight for themselves, whereupon his whole army yeelded themselves to Harolds mercy, and having Prince Gruffith in their hands, cut off his head, and sent it to Harold, giving him pledges for assurance of peace, and the payment of the ancient tribute which for a time had beene retained: yet ever after he carryed so heavy a hand on the Welsh, that as Iohn of Salisbury in his Prolicraticon writeth, he ordained a law, that what Welsh-man soever, should with weapon passe over Offaes ditch, should have his right hand cut off by the Kings officer.

(6) All now in quiet, and Harold withdrawne to his Mannor of Bosham, upon the rivage of the Sea in the confines of Sussex; there for his recreation, one day hee tooke into a Fishers boate with small attendants, neither those very Skilfull Mariners; when no sooner were they lanched into the deepe, but a contrary winde came about, and drove the boat upon the coast of Ponthieu in France, where hee was taken by the Country people, and presented to Guido their Earle, who a while retained him his prisoner, in hope of gaine by his ransom, but Duke William requiring it hee was conveyed into Normandy, where he cunningly perswaded the Duke, that his secret coming our of England, was purposely to enter a league of amity with him. The Duke then having present wars with the Britaines in France, tooke this his new friend and guest with him for his companion at Armes; whose ready polices followed with forward practise, wan him great estimation with the Duke; whereupon betwixt them a covenant was made for the reservation of the English Crowne to the Norman, if it chanced King Edward to dye without children; and the same ratified by Harolds corporall oath, with the affiancing of Lady Adeliza, the Dukes fift daughter, then a childe, and Harold a widdower; which afterwards fell to his owne destruction, and the lands subversion, as shall bee said.

(7) His last imploiment by holy King Edward, was against the tumultuous Northumbrians, which had expulsed Tosto their Earle, and Harolds owne brother, where a peace was concluded without shedding blood, but with condition that Tosto should lose his Earledome: whereupon in great displeasure, he with his wife and children fled into Flanders, and ever after hated the person, and emulated the glory of Harold. The originall of these two brethrens quarrels beganne at Windsor, where in the presence of the King they fell from words unto blowes, and that in such manner, as if refcue had not come, Tosto had died; for which disgrace; hee secretly hyed him into the Marches of wales, and neere the City Hereford at Portaſlyth, where Harold had a house then in preparing to entertaine the King; he slew all his brothers servants, and them cutting peece-meale into gobbets, salted some of their limmes, and cast the rest into vessels of the meath and wines, sending his brother word, that hee had furnished him with poudred meats against the Kings comming thither; which barbarous act caused deservedly his name to bee odious unto his Northumbrians, and was lastly repayed with his owne death.

(8) Now albeit some Heralds make Harold by birth but a Gentleman of one, and the first descent, which, were it so, should no whitblemish him who was more truely enobled with princely vertues; yet therein also it may seeme hee is mis-esteemed, seeing his Father was Goodwin a Duke by degree, the son of Wolnoth, and hee the sonne of Egelmar, who was the sonne of Egelricke, surnamed Leofwine, and brother of Edricke Duke of Mercia, that married the daughter of King Ethelred of England, of whom wee have spoken.

Master Thomas Milles in Herald.

The mother of Harold was Githa the daughter of Duke Wolfe, and sister to Sweyne the yonger, King of Denmarke, by Estrich his Wife, who was sister to Canute the great King of England; and himselfe the second sonne of her borne; whose elder brother was Sweyne, that dyed on pilgrimage in his returne from Ierusalem, and his younger were Tosto, Wilnod, Girth, and Leofricke.

(9) A former wife Earle Goodwin had, whose name was Thira, the sister of Canute, a woman solde unto wickednesse, for making merchandize of Englands beauteous virgins into Denmarke; thee solde them there at deere rates, to satisfie her owne unsatiate avarice, and the lusts of the lascivious Dane, till a just reward of Gods wrath fell on her by a thunderbolt falling from heaven, wherewith thee was slaine, to the great terrour of the beholders. Asser Rerum.

(10) Edwards life ended, and nothing determined touching his successour, Harold the second day after, beeing the day of his buriall, made himselfe King, none of the Nobilitie disliking what he had done; for courteous hee was of speech and behaviour, and in Martiall prowesse the onely man, as Wales well witnessed more then once; friended by affinitie with many of the Nobles, and by his new marriage with Edgitha the daughter of Algar (sister of the Earles Morcar and Edwin, and late Wife to Gruffith ap Llewelyn Prince of Wales) he expected to be both sided and assisted, if his cause came either to triall or voyce.

Ran. Higden. Polyc. l. 6. c. 29.

(11) And the time hee well saw, fitted his entrance; for Sweyne King of Denmarke (most dread by the English,) was intangled with the Swedeu wars; and William the Norman (that made claime from King Edward) at variance with Philip the French King; the friends of Edgar in Hungary, and himselfe a stranger, over-young for rule: all which concurrents made Harold without deliberation, or order from the State, to set the Crowne on his owne head, regardlesse of all ceremony and solemne celebration; for which his act, as a violator of holy rites, he too too much offended the Clergy.

Matth. Weſt.

(12) The day of his Coronation was upon Friday, the fifth of Ianuary, being the feast of the Epiphany, and yeere of Salvation 1066. none either greatly applauding, or disapprooving his presumption, except onely for the omission of manner and forme; to redeeme which, and to re-gaine the good will of all; no sooner attained he the seate royall, but he remitted or diminished the grievous customes and tributes which his predecessours had raised, a course ever powerfull to winne the hearts of the Commons; to Church-men hee was very munificent and carefull of their advancements; and to grow more deepely into their venerable esteeme, hee repaired their Monasteries; but most especially that at Waltham in Essex, which hee most sumptuously new built, and richly endowed, giving it the name of Holy Crosse; upon occasion that such a Crosse found farre Westward, was brought thither by miracle, ut tradunt: and therefore hee chose out this place to poure forth his supplications, before hee marched to meet Duke William in the Field. Moreover, to satisfie such Nobles as affected young Edgars juster title, hee created him Earle of Oxford, and held him in speciall favour: in briefe, unto the poore, his hand was ever open, unto the oppressed he ministred justice, and unto all men was affable, and meeke: and all to hold that upright which on his head he had set with an uneven hand; and deprived him of, unto whom hee was Protector.

(13) Three severall reports are affirmed of Edwards disposse of the Crowne: the first was to the Norman Duke, who made that the anker-hold of his claime; the second was to young Edgar, unto whom hee was great Vncle; and the last unto this Harold himselfe: for so saith Edmerus, and also Marianus, who lived at the very same time, and writeth that Harold thereupon was sacred and crowned by Aldredus Archbishop of Yorke; so that hereby hee is freed by some from the imputation of intrusion and wrong.

(14) His State thus standing, and his subjects contentment daily increasing, presently it was somewhat perplexed by an Ambassage sent from the Norman, putting him in minde of his covenant, and oath, as well for the custody of the Crowne to his behoofe, as for the solemnization of the marriage contracted betwixt his daughter and him.

(15) Harold, who thought himselfe now surely seated in the hearts of his Subjects, and therefore also sure in his Kingdome, answered the Ambassadors, that hee held their Masters demaund unjuſt, for that an oath extorted in time of extremity, cannot binde the maker in conſcience to performe it, for that were to ioyne one ſinne with another; and, that this oath was taken for feare of death or impriſonment, the Duke himſelfe well knew: but admit it was voluntarily, and without feare; could I (ſaid he) then a ſubject, without the allowance of the King and the whole State, give away the Crownes ſucceſſion, to the prejudice of both? ſurely a Kingdome is of abetter account then to bee ſo determined in private onely betwixt two. With which kinde of answeres hee sent the messengers away.

Subjects love the Soveraigns ſtrength.

(16) The Norman, who till then thought England sure to bee his, and had devoted his hopes from a Duke to a King, stormed to see himselfe thus frustrated on the sodaine, and in stead of a Crowne to have scornes heaped on his head; therefore nothing contented with this sleight answere, returned his Ambassadors againe unto Harold, by whom hee laid his claime more at large; as that King Edward in the Court of France had faithfully promiſed the ſucceſſion unto him, and againe afterwards ratified the ſame to him at his being in England, and that not done without conſent of the State, but confirmed by Stigandus Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, the Earles Goodwin and Syward, yea, and by Harold himſelfe, and ſo firmely aſſured that his Brother and Nephew were delivered for pledges, and to that end ſent unto him into Normandy; that hee had no way beene conſtrayned, hee appealed to Harolds owne conſcience, who deſides his voluntary offer to ſweare, contracted himſelfe to Adeliza his daughter (then but young, and now departed life) upon which foundation the oath was willingly taken.

(17) But Harold who thought his owne head as fit for a crowne as any others, meant nothing lesse then to lay it downe upon parley; and therefore told them flatly, that howſoever Edward and hee had tampered for the Kingdome, yet Edward himſelfe coming in by election, and not by any title of inheritance, his promiſe was of no validitie; for how could hee give that whereof hee was not intereſſed, nor in the Danes time was ever like to be? And tell your Duke (ſaid he) that our Kingdome is now brought to a ſetled eſtate, and with ſuch love and liking of the Engliſh, as that they will never admit any more a ſtranger to rule over them. And as touching the contract with his younger daughter, he well ſeeth, that God hath taken away that occaſion of alienating the Crowne; and ſurely his Law hath likewiſe provided remedy againſt ſuch raſh vowes; whoſe precepts I meane to follow: and therefore (ſaid he) will your Duke to weigh my eſtate with his owne, both his and mine now in quiet, and ſufficient for two, and either of them employment enough for one mans Government, and therefore both of them too much to be well governed by one, ſeeing that God himſelfe had ſet a Sea betwixt them. With these and the like speeches hee shifted off the Dukes Ambassadors; without all princely entertainments, or courteous regard.

(18) The Messengers returned, and Harolds answeres declared, William Lion-like enraged, casteth his thoughts about plotting revenge, and making some oddes eeven that might impeach his desiignes, prepared all things for open warre. Harold likewise not sleeping his businesse, made ready his Fleete, mustered his souldiers, and planted his Garrisons along the Sea-coast. But in these his proceedings, behold a great and fearefull Comete appeared (seldome a signe to Princes of fortunate successe) upon the twentie fourth of Aprill, and lasted onely seven dayes, which drew the minds of the Engliſh, into great suspense, now ready to enter into a double warre.

(19) For as William the Norman for his part claymed England by gift; so Harfager the Dane did by succession; the rumors of both which, greatly terrified the hearts of the inhabitants: and yet behold, a third terrour unexpected, contrary to nature, and most mens opinions, suddenly arose: for Toſto

Toſto the cruell Earle of Northumberland, and brother to Harold, expulsed by his people, and prescribed by King Edward, fled into France, where by the instigations of William, whose wives sister he had married (both of them the daughters of Balwine Earle of Flanders,) hee got for his revenge a Fleet furnished with men at Armes; and thus prepared, his first fury was shewed in spoiling the Ile of Wight; then coasting the shoare, shrewdly endammaged Kent, whence hoysing saile, fell foule upon Lincolneſhire; where Morcar and Edwine Earles of Chester and Yorkeſhire, ayded with the Kings Navy, drove him from thence, though with some losse of their men.

Matth. Weſt.

Rand. Hig.

Will. Malmes.

(20) Toſto for more succour fled into Scotland, where of King Malcolme he had but cold comfort, himselfe being busied with civill broiles; but howsoever his expectation there failed, yet his purposes were continued with the affisstance of Harold Harfager (that is, the Faire-lockes) King of Denmarke, who with three hundred ships had entred the River Tyne for Englands invasion, after his conquest of the Iles of Orknes. Toſto therefore joyning his Fleete to these Danes, in warlike bravery, both of them enter the mouth of Humber, and drawing up the river Ouſe, at Rich-hall landed their men, making spoile of the Country whereſoever they came. To meet with these, the foresaid Earles Edwin and Morcar, in a tumultuous haste raised their powers, but were so overlaid by the Norwegians, that many were slaine, and more drowned, in passing over that river.

Matth. weſt. Simeo Dunel.

(21) The enemy growne proud by this late victory, hasted towards Yorke, the chiefe City of the North; where planting his siege, it was presently yeelded up, and hostages delivered upon both parts for the performance of covenants. The Danes thus prospering, had most strongly encamped themselves; for backed they were with the Germane Ocean, flanked on the left hand with the river Humber, wherein also their Fleet rid at Anker, and had on their right hand and afront the river Derwent; so that it seemed impossible to raise this siege.

(22) But Harold thinking the coasts cleere from all danger, the Equinoctiall at hand, and Navigation now past, the victuals in his Fleet spent, and notice from Earle Balwin of Flanders, that Duke William meant not his voyage that yeare, was about to disband his Army. When this sodaine newes from the North pierced his eare, no need it was then to bid him make haste thither, the case standing so neere him as it did. Therefore recalling his Army, posted to Yorke, and from thence marched against the Norwegians, who lay secured with such advantage, as wee have said. Notwithstanding Harold couragiously ordered his battell, and assayed to passe the Bridge called Stamford, built over Derwent, which one onely Dane made good for a time against his whole host, and with his Axe slew forty of his men, till lastly this Dane was slaine with a dart.

Will. Malmesb. Hunt. Matth. weſt.

(23) The Bridge gotten, and the English reduced into their rankes, Harold most boldly set upon his enemies even in their Campe; where the Battaile with equall valour and fortune, was maintained a time, till lastly the Norwegians disarrayed and scattered, were slaine out-right; and among them the two Chiefetaines, Harfager and Toſto, with many others of worth and account, lost their lives. Olave the sonne of this Harfager, and Paul Earle of Orkeney, who kept their Fleet and Seas, whilest his Father and followers fought upon land, were brought to King Harold, who to have their lives spared, abjured the Land, thenceforth to attempt no hostility against the English peace; and with twenty small vessels to carry away their slaine and hurt, were suffered to depart, bringing heavy newes into Denmarke of the losse of their King, and overthrow of his Army.

(24) By this victory thus happily obtained, fell unto Harold an exceeding rich booty, both of gold and silver, besides the great Armado of Toſto and Harfager; whereby his mind was soone set aloft, and hee began to grow both proud, and odious unto his Army, the rather, for that he divided not the spoiles unto them that had deserved it; a wrong that the common Souldier doth continually murmure at, and commonly endure.

(25) Now in this current of King Harolds fortunes, William the Norman had the more leisure to strengthen his owne, and often conferring with his Captaines about Englands invasions, found them ever resolute and cheerefull that way; the difficulty onely rested, how to provide money enough, the very sinewes whereby the vast body of an Army must bee knit, and strengthened: for a subsidy being propounded unto the assembly of the Norman States, it was answered; that a former Warre against the French had empoverished much of their wealth, that if new Warres were now raised, and therein their substance spent to gaine other parts, it would bee thereby so wasted, as that hardly it would be sufficient to defend their owne; that they thought it more safety to hold what he had, then on hazard of their owne to invade the territories of others; and that this warre intended, just though it were, yet seemed not necessary, but exceeding dangerous; besides (say they) the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to Military services in forreine parts, and therefore such payments could not be assessed upon them. And although William Fitz-Osborne, a man in high favour with the Duke, and as gratious among the people, endeavoured by all meanes to effect it, yea, and (to draw on others by his example) proffered to set out forty tall Ships upon his owne charges towards this warre; yet would it not be: therefore Duke William bethought him on another way.

Camd. Brit.

(26) The wealthiest men among all his People he sent for, and severally one by one conferred with, shewing them his right and hopes of England, wherein preferment lay even to the meaneſt amongst them, onely money was the want, which they might spare; neither should that be given, nor lent without a plentifull increase: with such faire words he drew them so on, that they strove who should give most, and by this policy he gathered such a masse of money, as was sufficient to defray the warre. Then went hee to his neighbour Princes, namely to the Earles of Anjou, Poictou, Mayne, and Bullogne, promising them faire possessions in England; yea and unto Philip the French King, in case he would ayde him, he voluntarily offered to become his vassall and Leige-man, and to hold England by oath and fealty under him. But it being thought nothing good for the State of France, that the Duke of Normandy, who already was not so pliable to the French King as was wished, should bee bettered in his estate by the addition of so mighty a Kingdome (the power of Neighbour Potentates being ever suspected of princes) so far was the King from yeelding any help, that he secretly maligned, & openly disswaded this his attempt of invading England. This French jealousie, the Norman soone perceived, which made him to cast about yet another way.

(27) For making his claime knowne unto Alexander the second, then Pope of Rome, with the wrongs done unto Robert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, by Harold and his Father, (a text that might not bee read without a glosse,) he was so favoured of his holinesse (whose See was ever glad to interest it selfe in disposing of Crownes) that hee both allowed well of his enterprize, and sent him a consecrated Banner, (Saint Peter himselfe had none such in his Boate) to be borne in the Ship, wherein himselfe in that expedition should take saile for England: an Agnus Dei, and one of the haires of Saint Peter, that blessed Apostle, in whose vertue was no little trust and accursed all them that should oppose themselves against him: for even then the Popes had began to usurpe authority over Princes, and with their leaden blades to hacke into the steely swords of Emperours.

Suetonius in vita Ceſar.

(30) From Pevenſey Duke William departed towards Haſting, where raiſing another fortification, divulged to all, the cauſes of his comming, as pretending to revenge both the death of his Normans, ſlaine by the treachery of Goodwin and Harold, and the wrongs and baniſhment of Robert Cemeticus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, pretences very ſlender, and enforced out of ſeaſon: but ſurely had not a third fate neerer his heart, the two former would have paſſed without the ſpleene of revenge; namely, the donation of King Edward deceaſed, whereon hee built his claime to the Engliſh Crowne. And there alſo by his Edict, he ſtraitly charged his ſouldiers not in hoſtile manner, to wrong any of their perſons, who ſhortly were to become his Subjects.

(31) Harold in the North hearing of theſe newes, haſted with his Armie (whoſe Armour yet reaked with the bloud of the Norwegians) towards the South and with ſuch power as poſſibly he could make, entreth London, where immediately a meſſenger from Duke William was preſented unto him, demanding no leſſe then the Kingdome, and Harolds vaſſallage; urging the ſame with ſuch inſtant boldneſſe, that Harolds furious indignation could hardly forbeare, againſt the law of Armes, to lay violent hands upon the Ambaſſadour; ſo great a pride and confident hope had entred the heart of this late Victor: to ſhew both, with very great boldneſſe, hee diſpatcheth his Ambaſſadors to William, and by way of ireſull checkes menaceth him, unleſſe forthwith hee departed backe into Normandy, when preſently muſtering his men at London, hee found them much leſſened by his battaile againſt the Norwegians: notwithſtanding, many Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the love of their native Country inflamed, did ingage themſelves for the field, againſt his common and dangerous enemy. He therefore with an undaunted courage, led forth his Army into Suſſex (againſt the importunate ſuite of his mother, who ſought by all meanes to ſtay him) where, on a large and faire plaine, ſcarce ſeven miles from the enemy, he pitched downe his battailes, and ſent forth his Eſpials to deſcry his power.

(32) Theſe comming into danger, were caught by the Normans, and preſented to their Duke, who commanded them forthwith to bee led from Tent to Tent, to be feaſted, and diſmiſſed, without any harme or diſhonour done. Theſe returning to Harold told what they had ſeene, commending the Duke in his Martiall Proviſions, and his clemency to themward, onely ſaid they, his ſoldiers ſeeme to be Prieſts, for their faces were all ſhaven, whereas the uſe of the Engliſh was then to reſerve onely the upper lip uncut, retaining or renewing the old manner of the ancient Britaines, ſo deſcribed by Ceſar: but King Harold, who had beene in that Country, well knowing their errour, replyed that they were men of great valour and ſtout Souldiers in fight. Vpon which ſpeech, Gyrth, his younger brother, a man much renowned for martiall exploits, tooke occaſion to adviſe the King from being preſent at the danger of the field: for (ſaid he) it ſtands not with the rule of policy, to hazard "all in the tryall of one battell, nor to depend upon "the event of warre, which ever is doubtfull, victory "being as often gotten by fortune, as valour, mature "deliberation doth often produce the ſafeſt iſſues, "and a provident delay is held to be the greateſt fur- "therer of martiall projects; neither will any thing "ſtrike greater terrour into the Normans, then thou "to be levying, and enrolling a new Army, whereby "they may ever expect, and feare ſucceeding battailes. "Againe (ſaid he) thou beſt knoweſt what oath thine "owne mouth hath made unto William; if lawfull, "and willingly, then withdraw thy ſelfe from field, "leſt for that thy ſinne the whole Hoſt periſh; for "there can be no power againſt God. I am free from "ſuch guilt, and therefore may the bolder fight, and "either defeate this dangerous enemy, or more "cheerefully dye in the defence of my Country; and "if thou wilt commit the fortune of Battaile into my "Governance, aſſure thy ſelfe I will performe to "thee the part of a loving Brother, and to my Coun- "trymen of a valiant Captaine.

Caeſar in Comment.

(33) This wiſe advice notwithſtanding, deſtiny ſo driving him, he gaine-ſtood, imputing it a part of diſhonour, and not befitting a Souldier, (as he alwayes had beene,) to leave the field Coward-like, when greateſt glory was to be won, or in caſe of fortunate ſucceſſe, to be deprived of a part, and therefore reprooved his brother for making this motion, and with diſdainefull ſpeeches, under-valued and embaſed the worth of the Normans.

(34) Duke William now entred the field, and both the hoſts ſtanding ready for fight, the Norman, to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, upon a pious affection, ſent a Monke as a Mediator for peace, with offers to Harold of theſe conditions, either wholly to reſigne the Kingdome unto him, and from thence forth to acknowledge the Duke for his Soveraigne: or elſe in ſingle combate to try the quarrell with him, in ſight of the Armies; or laſtly, to ſtand to the arbitriment of the Pope, touching the poſſeſſion and wearing of the Engliſh Crowne. But Harold, as one whom the heavens would depreſſe, accepting neither domeſticke counſell, nor the Normans offers, referred the deciding of the matter unto the Tribunall of God, and anſwered, that it ſhould bee tryed the next day with more ſwords then one.

(35) The next day was the foureteenth of October, which upon a credulous errour, hee held ever to bee fortunate, becauſe it was the day of his Nativity, and with hopefull aſſurance, deſired greatly the approach of the ſame: His Souldiers likewiſe as men whoſe heads were to be crowned with the Laurels of victory, gave themſelves to licentious revels, and in riotous banquets, with clamour, and noiſes, ſpent the night; whereas contrariwiſe, the Normans, more wiſely, and ſeriouſly weighing the buſineſſe in hand, beſtowed the time in Prayers and Vowes, for the ſafety of their Army, and victorious ſucceſſe: neither had the morning ſooner ſpread it ſelfe but their battell was ordered, and prepared for fight.

W. Malmſb. Henr. Hunt.

(38) The Normans without any confuſed, or diſorderly ſhout, ſounded the battell, and advanced forward, diſcharging a fierce valley of arrowes like a tempeſtuous haile, a kinde of fight both ſtrange, and terrible unto the Engliſh, who ſuppoſed their enemy had beene already even in the middeſt amongſt them; when preſently a furious charge was given to the Va-ward of the Engliſh, who reſolutely had determined to cover the place with their bodies rather then to give one foot of ground, and bending all their forces, kept themſelves cloſe together, wherby they valiantly, and with the ſlaughter of many, put backe the enemy: which was ſo farre from daunting the Normans, that by it they were more wherted to re-enforce themſelves upon them: when with an horrible noiſe, the battailes of both ſides gave the ſtroke; and now come foote to foote, and man to man, coped together in a moſt cruell fight. The Engliſh ſtanding thicke, and cloſe, as if they had beene ſtucke one to another, abode the brunt and charge of the Normans, and with ſuch welcomes, that after many a bloody wound received, they were at point to recoile, had not Duke William, whoſe crowne lay now at ſtake, both bravely performed the part of a Leader, and with his preſence, and authoritie reſtrained them. The fight thus continuing, the Normans ſomehow brake into the troupes of the Engliſh and ſore diſtreſſed the Souldiers on foote, yet notwithſtanding they ſtill held out, and kept their Array unbroken: for Harold (no leſſe carefull to keepe, then the other to gaine a Diadem,) as a moſt valiant Captaine bare himſelfe worthily every where. The Duke well perceiving that with fine force, and true valour, no good end could be got, betooke himſelfe to a ſtratageme, and commanded his men to ſound the retreat, but kept them ſtill in ſuch order of array, that they gave backe in as good diſciplineas they came on.

(39) The Engliſh ſuppoſing the Normans to have fled, and themſelves the Maſters of the Field, began in eager purſuit carelеſly to unewſit, and diſplay their rancks; when on the ſudden, the Normans having their wiſhed opportunity, and winding about, charged the enemy a freſh; who now being ſcatteringly diſranked, and out of all order, were ſlaine down on all ſides not able to recover their battaile: many thus borne downe, and ſlaine, none by flight fought to eſcape the field, but rather to maintaine their honour in Armes, caſt themſelves into a round, chooſing there to die in the cauſe of their Country, then cowardly to forſake the Standard of their King: and therefore with bold reſolutions encouraging one another, they turne head and reſiſt a long time: but ſhowers of arrowes like a ſtormy tempeſt falling thicke among them, one, moſt fatall, and unlucky for the Engliſh, wounded Harold into the braines thorow the left eye; ſo that falling from his horſe to the ground, was under his owne ſtandard ſlaine.

Iohn Rouſe.

(40) And yet Giraldus Cambrenſis (I know not by what inducement,) relates the iſſue of this Battaile ſomewhat otherwiſe, affirming, that Harold with loſſe of his Eye, but not of his life, from the field fled to the City of Weſtcheſter; and there long after led a holy life, and made a godly end, as an Anchoret in the Cell of Saint Iames, ſaſt by the church of S. Iohn. With Harold dyed his Brethren Gwirth, and Leofwine, with moſt of the Engliſh Nobility, beſides the ſlaughter of ſixty ſeaven thouſand, nine hundred ſeventy foure of their Souldiers: Bremenſis faith an hundred thouſand.

Matth. Paris.

(41) Duke William in this Battell had three horſes ſlain vnder him; God (ſaith Marianus) ſo defending his perſon, that though multitude of darts were throwne againſt him, yet not a drop of his bloud was ſpilt by the Enemy, and this Battaile wonne with the loſſe onely of ſixe thouſand, and thirteene of his men. Whoſe wodden bowes (as Iohn Rouſe is of opinion) gained the Normans that great victory; for the Arrowes ſhot levell, or directly forward, wounded the Engliſh that ſtood in the front, and upright; the other ſhot on high, galled at the fall, thoſe that were more remote, and the backes of ſuch as ſtooped to ſhunne the danger.

Matth. Weſtm. Rond. Higden.

(42) This battaile was fought in Suſſex, 7. miles from Haſtinges, upon Saturday the fourteenth of October, and yeere of Grace 1066. Wherein the dolefull deſtruction of the Engliſh fell, and the glorious Sun of the Normans, even in the ſhutting of the day did ariſe; when periſhed the Royall blood of the Saxons, whoſe Kings firſt had made this Kingdome into Seven, and afterward of them ſo glorious a Monarchy that it was not inferiour to any in Europe, and her Monarchs ſo renowned for princely magnanimity, as that many of them were ranked with the beſt in the world: But now the all-ordering hand of God (unto whoſe becke not onely this Ball of the Earth, and the Rulers thereof, but even the Heavens themſelves, and all the powers thereof muſt bow) either for the ſinnes of the Engliſh, which were many, and great, or to graffe one more faire and longer-continuing bud upon this dryed, and decayed ſtock, brought that forreine of-ſprings into this his nurſery of Britain; whoſe branches, as the vine, have ſpread both fruitfull and farre; and whoſe rootes are faſtened as the trees of Libanon: the Kings therof, even from the loynes of this Great Conqueror, holding on a roiall ſucceſſion for the ſpace of theſe five hundred forty five yeares, their iſſues topped with the higheſt Cedars of the world, and their branches ſpread thorowout all Chriſtendome; which wee pray may ſtill proceede and continue, whileſt the Sun and Moone have their being.

Hoſ. 14.6.

(43) This victory thus obtained, Duke William wholly aſcribed unto God, and by way of a ſolemne ſupplication or proceſſion gave him the thankes: and pitching for that night his Pavilion among the bodyes of the dead, the next day returned to Haſtings, there to conſult upon his great, and moſt proſperouſly begun enterpriſe, giving firſt commandement for the buriall of his ſlaine Souldiers.

(44) But Morcar, and Edwin, the unfortunate Queenes Brethren, by night eſcaping the battell, came unto London, where with the reſt of the Peeres, they began to lay the foundation of ſome freſh hopes, poſting thence their meſſengers to raiſe a new ſupply, & to comfort the Engliſh (who through all the Land were ſtricken into a fearefull aſtoniſhment with this unexpected newes) from a deſpairing feare, ſhewing the chance of warre to be mutable, their number many, and Captaines ſufficient to trye another Field. Alfred, Arch-biſhop of Yorke, there preſent, and Preſident of the Aſſembly, ſtoutly, and prudently gave his counſell forthwith to conſecrate, and crowne young Edgar Atheling (the true heire) for their King; to whom conſented likewiſe both the Sea-Captaines, and the Londoners. But the Earles of Yorkeſhire and Cheſhire Edwin and Morcar whom this fearefull ſtate of their conntry could not diſſwade from diſloyaltie and ambition) plotting ſecretly to get the Crowne to themſelves, hindred that wiſe and noble deſigne. In which while, the forrowfull Queene their ſiſter was conveyed to Weſtcheſter. Where, without ſtate or title of a Queene, ſhee led a ſolitary and quiet life.

Matth. Paris.

(45) The Mother of the ſlaine King did not ſo well moderate her womanly paſſions, as to receive either comfort, or counſell of her friends: the dead body of her ſonne ſhee greatly deſired, and to that end ſent to the Conqueror two ſage Brethren of his Abbey at Waltham, who had accompanied him in his unfortunate expedition: Their names (as I finde them recorded in an olde Manuſcript) were Oſgood and Alric, whoſe meſſage to the Conqueror not without abundance of teares, and feare, is there ſet downe in the tenor as followeth.

(50) The Duke, as he was of diſpoſition gratious, and inclined to mercy, forthwith granted their deſires: whereupon they drew our ſtore of gold to preſent him in way of gratulation; which he not onely utterly refuſed, but alſo offered them plenty to ſupply whatſoever ſhould be needfull for the pompe of his funerall, as alſo for their coſts in travaile to and fro; giving ſtrait commandement that none of his Souldiers ſhould preſume to moleſt them in this their buſineſſe, or in their returne. Then went they in haſte to the quarry of the dead, but by no meanes could finde the body of the King, for that the countenances of all men greatly alter by death, but being maimed and imbrued with blood, they are not knowne to be the men they were. As for his other regall Ornaments, which might have ſhewed him for their King, his dead corps was diſpoyled of them, either through the greedy deſire of prey, (as the manner of the Field is) or to be the firſt bringer of ſuch happy newes, in hope of a Princely reward; upon which purpoſe many times the body is both mangled and diſmembred, and ſo was this King after his death by a baſe Souldier, gaſht and hackt into the legge, whom Duke William rewarded for ſo unſouldier-like a deed, caſtrieing him for ever out of his wages and warres. So that Harold lying ſtript, wounded, bemangled, and goared in his blood, could not be found or knowne, till they ſent for a woman named Editha (for her paſſing beauty ſurnamed Swan-ſhals, that is, Swanſ-necke) whom hee entertained in ſecret love before hee was King; who by ſome ſecret markes of his body to her well knowne, found him out; and then put into a coffin, was by divers of the Norman Nobility honourably brought unto the place, afterward called Battle-Bridge, where it was met by the Nobles of England, and ſo, conveyed to Waltham, was there ſolemnly, and with great lamentation of his mother, royally interred, with this rude Epitaph, well beſeeming the time, though not the perſon.

Heu cadis hoſte fero, Rex à Duce Rege futuro,
Par paris in gladio, milite & valido.
Firmini juſti lux eſt tibi, luce Calixti;
Pronior hinc ſuper as, hinc ſuperatus eras.
Ergo tibi requiem depoſcat utrumque perennem:
Sicque precetur eum, quod colis omne Deum.

A fierce foe thee ſlew, thou a King, he King in view;
Both peeres, both peereleſſe, both feard, and both feareleſſe;
That ſad day was mixt, by Firmin and Calixt,
T'one helpt thee to vanquiſh, th'other made thee languiſh,
Both now for thee pray, and thy Requiem ſay;
So let good men all, to God for thee call.

Sigebertus. Will. Gemiticus. Guall. Creon. Ed. Woodſtocke.

(51) This Kings raigne was not ſo full of dayes as of great troubles: being but the ſpace of nine moneths and nine dayes, in whom was completed the Period of the Saxons Empire in Britaine, after they had continued from their firſt erected kingdome by Hengiſt in Kent, the ſpace of ſixe hundred and tenne yeeres, without any reverſement or interruption ſaving the ſmall Inter-raignes of theſe three Daniſh Kings, of whom wee have ſpoken. And although Aimund of Breme, in the favour of his Danes, ſharpely taxeth this Harold as being an impious man, and that by uſurpation hee aſpired to the Crowne, yet doth Eadred the Abbot of Rivauxe, (the Legender of S. Edwards life) much commend him for his courteous affabilitie, gentle deportment, and Juſtice, and for his warlike proweſſe none matchable unto him; and was reputed (ſaith he) verily a man paſſing well furniſhed with all vertues beſitting a Soveraigne Commander, and borne even to repaire the decayed ſtate of England; had he not, in the haughtineſſe and opinion of his owne valour and prudence, ſo much addicted himſelfe to his owne reſolutions, and too much neglected the wiſe deliberations of his beſt friends and Counſellers.

His Wives.

(52) The firſt wife of Harold, whom he had married and buried before he was King, I finde not named by any of our Writers; but that he had ſuch a one, appeareth, where it is recorded that he was a Widower, what time he contracted the Conquerours daughter; and that alſo he had children of ſuch age, that they made warres againſt King William in the ſecond of his Raigne; which it is probable, he had not by Editha, his Swanſ-necke, but were legitimate, and by this lawfull, though nameleſſe Mother.

(53) Algith, the ſecond wife to King Harold, was the widow of Griffith ap Llewelyn King of North-Wales, the ſiſter of Edwine and Morcar, Earles of Torkeſhire, and Cheſter, and daughter of Algar ſonne of Leofricke, ſonne of Leofwine, all Earles of Cheſter, Leiceſter and Lincolne: Shee was married unto him being then but Duke, in the laſt yeere of Edward Confeſſors raign, and of Grace 1065. neither did ſhe long enjoy him, or her Queenely title, after his aſpiring to the Crowne; for being reſident in London when he was ſlaine, from thence ſhee was conveyed by her brethren to Weſtchester, where ſhe remained in meane eſtate, and in good quiet (which uſually moſt attends the meaneſt) without any princely ſhew or name, during the reſt of her life, which laſted a great part of the Conquerours raigne.

His Iſſue.

(54) Goodwine the eldeſt ſonne of King Harold, being growne to ſome ripeneſſe of yeeres in the life of his Father; after his death and overthrow by the Conquerour

Conquerour, tooke his brother with him, and fled over into Ireland: from whence he returned, and landed in Somerſetſhire, ſlew Ednoth (a Baron ſometime of his Fathers) that encountred him, and taking great preyes in Devonſhire and Cornewall, departed till the next yeare. When comming againe, he fought with Beorn an Earle of Cornwall, and after retyred into Ireland, and thence went into Denmarke, to King Swayn his Cozen-German, where he ſpent the reſt of his life.

(55) Edmund, the ſecond ſonne to King Harold, went with his Brother into Ireland; returned with him into England, and was at the ſlaughter and overthrow of Ednoth and his power in Somerſetſhire; at the ſpoiles committed in Cornwall and Devonſhire; at the conflict with the Cornish Earle Beorn; paſſed and repaſſed with him in all his Voyages, Invaſions and Warres, by Sea and by land, in England and Ireland; and at the laſt departed with him from Ireland to Denmarke; tooke part with him of all pleaſure and calamity whatſoever, and attending and depending wholly upon him, lived and dyed with him in that Countrey.

(56) Magnus, the third ſon of King Harold, went with his brothers into Ireland; and returned with them the firſt time into England, and is never after that mentioned among them, nor elſewhere, unleſſe, (as ſome doe conjecture) hee be that Magnus who ſeeing the mutability of humane affaires, became an Anchoret, whoſe Epitaph pointing to his Daniſh Originall, the Learned Clarenciaux diſcovered in a little deſolate Church at Lewes in Suſſex, where in the gaping chinkes of an Arch in the wall, in a rude and overworne Character, certaine old imperfect Verſes were found, which hee ſuppoſeth ſhould be thus read:

Clauditur hic Miles Danorum regia proles,
Magnus nomen ei, magna nota Progeniei.
Deponens Magnum, prudentior induit agnum,
Prepete provita, fit parvulus Anchorita.

Here lies a Knight of Daniſh regall race,
He Magnus high, great name, note of great place,*
But Magnus left, an Agnus milde he prov'd,*
From world bereft, an Anchorite below'd.

* Great.

* A Lambe.

(57) Wolfe the fourth ſon of King Harold, ſeemeth to be borne of Queene Algith his ſecond Wife, for that hee was never mentioned among his other brethren; and having better friends by his mothers ſide, was left in England, whereas they were forced thence; neither is he ſpoken of, during all the raigne of the Conquerour, and therefore at his entrance may probably be thought to have been but an Infant: yet after his death he is named among his priſoners with Earle Morcar (his Vncle, if Queene Algith were his mother) and was by King William Rufus releaſed, and honoured by him with the Order of Knighthood.

(58) Gunhild a daughter of King Harold is mentioned by John Capgrave (the Writer of the Engliſh Saints) in the life of Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, reporting her to have beene a Nunne in a Monaſtery of England; who, among the many miracles done by the ſaid Wolſtan, (which he numbreth by tale, according to the ſuperſtitious manner of the time wherein hee lived) declareth, how he reſtored this Lady to her perfect eye-ſight, whereof by a dangerous infirmity, ſhee was almoſt wholly, and in moſt mens opinions, uncurably deprived.

John Capgrave.

(59) Another daughter of King Harold not named by any Story-writer of our owne Nation, is mentioned by Saxo Gramaticus, in his Daniſh hiſtory, to have come into Denmarke with her two brethren; to have been very honorably entertained by King Swayn the yonger, her kinſman: and afterwards to have been as honorably placed in marriage with Gereſlef, called in Latine Iarilaves, and of the Danes Waldemar, King of the Ruſſians: and by him to have had a daughter, that was the mother of Waldemar, the firſt of that name King of Denmarke, from whom all the Daniſh Kings for many ages after ſucceeded.

THE SUCCESSION OF ENGLANDS MONARCHS, FROM THE ENTRANCE OF THE NORMANS, VNDER WILLIAM THE CONQVEROR: VNTILL THE REGALL RIGHTS OF THE WHOLE ILAND WERE BY GODS PROVIDENCE VNITED VNDER ONE IMPERIALL DIADEME, IN THE PERSON OF OVR PRESENT SOVERAIGNE KING IAMES, SOLE MONARCH OF GREAT BRITAINE: THEIR SEVERALL ACTS, ISSVES, RAIGNES, ARMES, SEALES, AND COINES.

THE NINTH BOOKE.

CHAPTER. I.

VVHat hath beene spoken touching the Originals, Lawes, and Customes of the Saxons, and Danes, the ancient conquerors, and possessors of this our Iland, may in like fort be said of the Normans (being a branch from the same root) of whom wee are now to write, saving only that the name is not so ancient, and therefore their Manners may be thought more civill. Through the misty-darke times of which Stories, together with that of the Romans, and of our Britaines, (wherein no brighter Sun did shine unto us) by the assistance of the all-seeing power which bringeth light out of darkenesse, I am lastly approached to theſe times of more light, and unto affairs of more certaine truth: whose Current, to my seeming, is made now Navigable, by the many writers that have emptied their full channels into this Sea, wherein, though in respect of my owne defects, and that so many Master-Pilots have sailed before me, it may seeme but presumption to direct another course, with a purpose to better what they have so well performed; yet to make a compleate History from the first to the last: give me leave to continue, as I have begunne.

(2) Theſe Normans then, being anciently a mixt Nation with the warlike Norwegians, Swedens, and Danes, tooke their Name of that Northerne Climate from whence they came first, which was that Coast of Germany, anciently called Cimbrica Chersonesus, and Norway, for that it tendeth in respect of situation so farre Northward; and from hence, and the parts adjacent, the Saxons, Iutes, Angles, and lastly the Danes, made their incursions into this Land.

(3) This Tract therefore, as the womb of conception, by the disposse of the Omnipotent, after it had produced those Nations which formerly made Conquests of Britain, now again brought forth (as it were) her last-borne Benjamin, who devouring the prey in the morning, hath divided the spoile in the Even, and hitherto continued their glorious fame atchieved; which I pray, may extend to the last period of Times being: For theſe Normans, first by force got footing in France, with the Dominion and Stile of a Duke, and next the Diadem of this faire Empire, the last and most famous Monarches of the same.

(4) Theſe, formerly practizing Piracies upon the Coasts of Belgia, Frizia, England, Ireland, and France, proceeded in their hardy courses even to the Mediterranean Sea: insomuch that Charles the Great, seeing their roaving tall Ships, and considering the bold attempts they undertooke, with a deepe sigh, and abundance of teares, is reported to have said: Heavie am I at the very heart, that in my owne life time, theſe Pirates dare to come upon my Coasts, whereby I foresee what mischiefe they will worke upon my Posteritie. Which indeede proved so great, that in their publike Processions, and Letanies of the Church, this Petition was added, From the rage of the Normans, good Lord deliver us. This feare, and praier notwithstanding, they drave the French to such extremitie, that King Charles the Bald was forced to give unto Hasting a Norman Arch-pirate, the Earledome of Chartres, for to asswage his furie exercised upon his People; and again, King Charles the Grosse, granted unto Godfrey the Norman, part of Neustria, with his Daughter in mariage: Yet all this sufficed not, but that the Normans by force of Armes seated themselves neere unto the mouth of Sein, taking all for their owne that lay comprised betwixt that River and the River Loyre: which * Countrey afterwards tooke the name of Nor-mannie from theſe Northern Guests, at what time King Charls the Simple, confirmed it unto Rollo their Captaine.

(5) This Rollo, as say the Danish Historians, was the son of Guion, a great Lord in Denmark, who with his brother Gourin were appointed to depart the Country (according to the Danish customes) to seeke their adventures abroad, and leave more roome for the rest at home; but theſe refusing the order, made warre upon the King, in which, both Guion the Father and Gourin the sonne, were slaine, and Rollo forced to flye for safeguard of his life, with whom went a number of Gallants to seek Fortunes Court, and not a few misdoers or out-lawed-men: whose Acts in England registred by Albertus Krantius, seeing they vary from our owne historians in circumstances of times, and names, I have chosen in this place to insert, leaving the credit thereof to him the Reporter.

(6) Rollo, a Noble-man of Denmarke (saith he) and too powerfull in his Kings eye, was forced with a Navy to adventure his Fortunes into forreine parts, whose first arrivage, as he saith, was in England, where many of the Danish nobility had formerly tried their valours, and some of them attained to the Scepter, if not of the whole, yet of a great part of that kingdom. Indeed, (saith hee) England from the beginning was not governed by one King, as now it is, for the Angle-Saxons had their province, and the Mercians theirs, both governed by Provinciall Deputies, but the Northumbrians had a King; as the Scots and Picts also, in the same Iland had kept their owne limits under the like Government. Amongst these Northumbrians the Danes had their chiefest abiding, and in this Province Rollo the Dane brought first his men on Land, where making warre upon that Nation, he built both Castles and Fortresses to fortifie himselfe, his Navie lying upon the Seas: and proceeding forward into the Continent, tooke great booties both of Men, Cattle, and other spoyles, lading their ships as they lay at Anchor: the Incabitants of the Countrey making head against him, had still the worst.

(7) Rollo yet doubtfull and in suspence what to do, desired indeed to returne to his Countrey, but that the Kings indignation was an obstacle that way; next he affected to try his Fortunes in France, yet feared the issue would be dangerous, the People being exasperated against him, for the harms he had done them: but chiefely the Diademe of England ran most in his minde, though hee knew the hazard was great, to match his small Forces with an host of a King: in which perplexed thoughts, it chanced him (saith my Author) to fall into a sweet slumber, and in his sleepe hee seemed to sit in the kingdome of France, upon a high Hill, bending his head forward to a River which issued from the top of a Mountaine, at the foot whereof beneath him, he saw many kinds of Birds, which washed their ruddy left wings in the same water, where they all fed together, flew about, built, their nests, and at times appointed, brought forth their yong.

Allectt K. ann. Rollo his dreame.

(8) Rollo awaking from his pleasing dream, imparted the same unto his consorts, desiring their judgements for interpretation; which no way satisfying him, hee called a Christian of his English Captives, a man industrious, and of great capacity, and of whose deepe understanding he had a great opinion: this Captive then boldened, and willing (in likelihood) to divert Rollo from infesting England, told him that his dreame was significant and good, and did prognisticate the happy successe of himselfe and whole Nation: for by this he saw that he was shortly to receive a quiet possession, and a land of great renowne in the Continent of France, and that himselfe should be cleansed in the Laver of Baptisme, wherein also the ruddy sins of his People should be washed away, as the water had done the wings of the Birds.

The dreame expounded by an English Christian captive.

(9) This interpretation pleased Rollo, well, and hee easily beleeved that which he most affected, as in the like kinde dreamers commonly doe: therefore providing all things for France, he set his countenance only that way, yet because he had already performed great matters in England, he thought to follow Fortune for his best Leader, and before he departed from so fair a land, intended to sound the King by an Ambassage, that so, if he might find him inclinable to a league, he might have a refuge against future chances; if not, then was he resolute to goe forward with his journey: therefore making choice of certaine active persons, sent them to the English king Alstan, a Prince of a speciall religion and holinesse of life, these having audience, uttered their message as followeth.

Rollo sendeth to sound King Alstan.

(10) We being men distressed, and driven from our Country, sought out in banishment an habitation to rest in, and going forth, very many followed us, who incouraged us to seeke and win a land by Conquest, supplying us with strength, and giving us great hope of victory: which thing when we resolved to take in hand, a Tempest of weather drave us (O King) in these English Ports, where staying a fit season to put again forth, the Winter withheld us, and our wants made us to seeke further into the Land: whereupon our men, evermore brought up to the warre, being evill intreated of those inhabitants, were moved by such injuries to provide for their own defence, wherein some small skirmishes have passed betwixt them. Our Prince therefore and Generall Rollo, doth humbly require peace of thee, & to be permitted to sojourne in thy Land for a time, and to relieve his company with things necessary, wee paying sufficiently for it: these things when thou shalt grant, he shall rest content and pacified, untill the next spring, at which time he meanes to take his intended voyage.

(11) Alstenus, not ignorant of the Danish cruelty, and with how great Armies they might oppresse the English shoares, did readily grant what they required: And also added a further courtesie, saying withall, I doe greatly desire to see your Duke himselfe: and let him not thinke much to repaire to our Mansions, for he shall find none amongst us but his most loving friends. When this was signified to Rollo, choosing out the tallest and goodliest persons of his company, and such as were of greatest wisedome, with them he very joyfully meeteth the King, is entertained, presents him with great gifts, but receiveth greater: Then sitting downe to talke and commune:

Rollo commeth to Alstans Court.

(12) I am (saith King Alstenus) right glad most worthy Duke Rollo, to see you in this my Court. The renowme of your Nation hath beene related to me, a Martiall kinde of people ye are, and in fight unconquerable. And you your selfe also for your prowesse, are not unnoted among the rest of your famous Worthies: your valiant exploits are well knowne unto us: It is right pleasing unto us to enter with such men into amitie. Behold our whole Kingdome is before you, chuse out a seat for your selfe, and your people wher soever you best like, for we will have an everlasting league betweene us.

Will. Gemmit. lib. 2. c. 26. Alstans bounty to Rollo.

(13) Rollo glad of so faire promises, replyed: Most worthy and renowned King, I highly esteeme of your bountifull and most liberall proffers: God grant a happy successe of our affaires. I do thinke my selfe most bounden and devoted to your worthinesse; and if destiny ever answer to our desires, we will not be unthankfull for this your so great benignity. To seat our selves in your kingdome, though indeed, we are very willing, and your Royall proffers do much more incite us, yet Fate doth not permit it. I have determined (and will certainly performe) to go into France. For your gifts bestowed upon me, I esteeme them in the highest degree: and right well content I am to have a perpetuall League with you, that the like fortune may betide us both, the one to be a safeguard to the other. This I both offer, and accept of. This League God grant may to us both prove happy and fortunate.

Rollo the first Duke of Normandy.

(14) With such like interchanges, the time much spent, and night drawing on, they were brought to banquet: And early the next morning, comming forth of their lodgings, most lovingly embraced each other, when each gave and received presents best suting with their estates and occasions. Neither doth Krantius stay his pen there, but proceedeth to particular affaires betwixt these two Princes, without the concurrence of any of our owne Writers.

Angiers Records pa. 2.

(15) As how the English rose in Armes against Alstenus their King, taking opportunity of the time, for that Rollo (whom they knew to be joyned in a most strait confederacy with their Soveraigne) being then imployed in the warres of France, could not come or send to his aide: Alstenus therefore oppressed with a tumultuous kingdome, remembred Rollo his faithfull friend, and sending Ambassadours declared unto him what distresse he was in, who not unmindfull of the firme league betwixt them, left his French wars, and prepared for England with all his Forces; where entring the Iland, hee easily quieted the tumultuous rebels, ransacking their Cities, curbing their wildnesse, and so reducing them at last to an orderly subjection. For which his great love, care and pains, the King not unthankfull, resolved to requite him with the halfe of his kingdome, appointing the Cities, and limiting the bounds, which each of them should rule and governe as their owne possessions.

(16) Rollo in the meane time, as carefull of the peaces continuance, as regardlesse of so great remunerations taketh pledges of the rebels for securing their loialtie to the King, and peaceable bearing towards himselfe, upon accomplishment whereof, repairing to Alstenus he thus bespake him.

tifull presents, I can doe no lesse, then willingly bestow upon you these my paines for your safetie: it is no more then your deserts doe challenge; neither will I accept, or seeme so uncourteous as to expect, for my paines, any part of your dominion. Your selfe now may well governe it; for France calls for my presence: keepe therefore those your Pledges, brought to you by your Subjects, and there is no doubt but you shall hence-forward governe your Kingdome in a setled and contentfull quietnesse.

(18) The King could not containe those his eyes, which now beheld in a stranger so strange and unexempled kindnes, from resolving into teares; giving him both hearty thankes, and rich gifts, seeing hee could not fasten on him any portion of his Kingdome: of whom, all that Rollo desired was this, that hee would give licence to such voluntary Souldiers as would goe with him into France: whereto Alsten, ready in all things to gratifie his desire, gladly condescended, and furnished him with arrendants:

(19) But leaving Krantius the Dane, as likewise Gemeticensis the Norman, to favour their Country, and these their reports to the best liking of the iudicious; most certaine it is, that the French King Charles, commonly called the Simple, gave the Dutchie of Normandy with his daughter Gilla (whose mother was Aeguena, the daughter of Edward the Elder, King of England) unto Rollo the Dane, as is recorded in an old manuscript belonging to the Monastery of Angiers. And when Rollo was baptized, Charles receiving him for his God-sonne at the Font, he was there required to doe homage for his Dukedome received, and injoyned therein to kisse the Kings foot, which hee did, but with some disgrace to King Charles, and bound it with an oath that hee did not receive it upon courtesie.

(20) This Rollo by his second wife Popee, (for Gilla died childlesse) daughter to the Earle of Bessin and Baileulx, had a sonne named William, surnamed Longespee, and a daughter called Girlota, who was afterwards married to the Duke of Guyan.

(21) William Long-espee (so called of the Long Sword he usually wore) the second Danish Duke of Normandy, took unto wife, Sporta the daughter of Hubert, Earle of Sentlis, by whom he had onely Richard his sonne: this William receiving baptisme, received therewith a new name, and was thenceforth called Robert, who having governed his Dukedome with great moderation the space of twenty yeeres, was guilefully murthered by the working of Lewes King of France, to the great griefe of his people, who so far followed the revenge, that they intercepted Lewes in the Citie Rothomage, and detained him their prisoner, till he agreed to these Articles: That young Richard should succeed his slaine Father in the foresaid Dukedome; and that thenceforth when the King and Duke should conferre togethet, the Duke should be girt with his Sword, and the King disabled either of Sword or Knife: to which Lewes yeelded upon his corporall oath.

(22) Richard thus established, governed his Dukedome the space of fifty two yeeres. He was a man of an admirable fortitude, and therefore was called Richard the Hardy. His first wife was * Agnes, daughter to Hugh le Grand, Earle of Paris, Lord Abbot of Germans, and Father to Hugh Capet of France; but the dying issueless, he secondly married Gunnor, a Gentlewoman of the Danish bloud, (whom he had kept his Concubine before) by whom hee had three sonnes and three daughters: the first was Richard that succeeded in his dominions; the second was Robert Arch-bishop of Roan; and the third was called Maliger: his daughters were Hawisa, the wife of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and mother to Alane and * Guye his sonnes. Maud espoused * Eudes Earle of Chartiers and Blais: and Emma, called the Flower of Normandy, was Queene of England, both by the English King Ethelred, and Canutus the Dane, to both which shee was married.

(23) Richard the second, surnamed the Good, was the fourth Duke of Normandy, and ruled the same for twenty foure yeeres: In whose time the Normans began to be great, and gracious in England, the marriage of his Sister making their way: His first wife was Iudith the Sister of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, by whom he had issue, Richard, the fifth Duke of Normandy, and Robert the first, William a Monke, and Nicholas Abbot of S. Andrewes: his daughters by her were, Alice, that died yong, and another of the same name married to Reinold, Earle of Burgoine, and Eleanor espoused to Baldwin the fourth Earle of Flanders, who bare unto him Baldwin the fifth, father of Maud that was Queene of England, and wife to the Conqueror.

Richard 2. the fourth Duke of Normandy. Sym. of Dunelm. calleth him Richard the third.

(24) The second wife to Duke Richard the second, was Estrike, Sister to Canute King of England, from whom he purchased a Divorce, without any issue begotten on her body; and then taking for his third wife a faire Gentlewoman named Pavia, had issue by her William Earle of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Roan.

(25) Richard the third of that name, and fifth Duke of Normandy, in the second yeere of his Dukedome died an untimely death, not without suspition of Poyson, minister'd by Robert his yonger brother, who presently was invested in the Dutchie, for that he left no issue of his body to succeed.

Richard 3. the fifth Duke of Normandy.

(26) This Robert (Duke Richards Brother) was a man of a magnanimous spirit, and of such bounteous liberality as is uncredible. Hee comming to the City Phalesia in Normandy, chanced to see a most goodly and beautifull Damosell, dancing among others of her familiar consorts; her name was Arlet, of meane parentage (the daughter of a Skinner, saith Higden) whose pleasing feature and comely grace so pleased the Duke, that taking her to his bed, he begot on her, William his onely sonne, (who proved the onely man of the Normans bloud) and after upon a remorse of conscience, undertooke a pilgrimage unto Ierusalem, from whence hee never againe returned. Arlet in Roberts life time was married to Herlaine a Norman Gentleman, but of meane substance; to whom she bare Odo Bishop of Baion, by his halfe-brother William created Earle of Kent; and Robert created Earle of Mortaigne, a man of a dull and grosse wit; and a daughter named Emma, wife to Richard Count of Auranches, (a Province in Normandy,) the mother of Hugh Lupus Earle Palatine of Chester. And thus farre briefly I have thought good to prosecute the Line of the Normans, for the better illustration of our English Stories.

(27) Duke Robert intending his pious pilgrimage unto the holy land, assembled all his Nobility unto the City Fiscan, where he caused them to sweare fealty unto his sonne William, being then but seaven yeares old, committing him to the Governance of one Gilbert, an Earle of much integrity and prudence, and the defence of that Governement unto Henry the French King, and so in the eight yeare of his Dukedome, set on his voyage for Ierusalem; who entring Iury, and not able to travaile, was boren in a litter upon the Saracens shoulders, and neere unto the Citie, meeting a returning Pilgrime, desired him to report in his Country what he there saw, which is, (said he) that I am carried to Heaven upon the Divels backe: but so farre was hee boren that he never returned, being prevented by death: which the Norman Peeres hearing, made use thereof for their owne ambitious ends, without any regard of young William their Pupill and Soveraigne, and growne into factions, greatly troubled the Peace of their Country, wherein Earle Gilbert the Protector was slaine, by Randulphus the yong Dukes Cosen-Germaine.

(28) The beginner of these stirres was another of his kinsmen, even Guy of Burgoine, the sonne of Duke Richards daughter, brought up with William in his youth, and ever in his most especiall esteeme, who, upon a vaine hope to aspire to an Earldome, got the aide of the Vicounts, Nigill, and Randulph, but took such a fall a fall before he could ascend the highest step, that in losing his footing, he lost therewith his head.

(29) Strife also arose betwixt young William, and his Vncle William the base-borne Earle of Archis. Whereupon King Henry of France, who till then had held this Wolfe by the eare, fearing some hazzard to himselfe, if he should now let him go, thought it best to aide the Earle in his cause, and therefore sent him supply under the leading of some men of note; but William so begirt his Castle with strait siege, that hee caused the Earle by famishment to yeeld up his Fort, and drove the French with disgrace out of the field: where, with such successe he still prospered, that Henry now, to secure his owne Confines, sent Odo his brother for prefect, into those parts that lay betwixt the Rivers Rein and the Seyn.

(30) William, as watchfull as the French King was jealous, sent against Odo, Robert Count Aucensis, Hugh Gornacensis, Hugh Mountfort, and William Crispine, all of them stout Souldiers, which so bravely bare themselves, that Odo was the first man that made away, and the rest of the French saved themselves by flight.

(31) William that had sworne a league with King Henry, and in his Minority had ever found him his gracious Guardian, was loth to endanger the breach of his Oath, or the duty that love and deserts had obliged him unto; and therefore by this Stratagem hee fought to dislodge the French. In the silence of night when in the Kings Campe all were at rest, he caused to be cryed aloud, the flight of Odo, and his discomfiture, with no lesse terrour then it was; which rang so shrill in the eares of the French, that Henry thought best to be gone: leaving William the absolute Lord of Normandie.

(32) Which he valiantly defended, and uprightly governed all the dayes of King Henry: whose death presently caused an alteration of State; for he leaving Baldwine, surnamed the Gentile, and the fift Earle of Flanders, Tutor to his young sonne Philip, the quarrell betwixt those two Princes had an end; Baldwine on the one side so working his Pupill, and on the other the Norman, (who was his sonne in Law) that a most firme League was ratified betwixt them, and kept unviolated so long as William was a Duke: where wee will leave him in prosperity and peace, and proceed in our intendment, as hee did in his Conquest here in England.

farre engaged William to the Pope.

(4) William intending for London, being on his way, found the passage stopt up with multitudes of great trees, which by the policy of Fredericke Abbot of S. Albanes, (a man descended from the Saxons noble bloud, as likewise from Canutus the Dane) to secure his Monastery from the destruction of the Normans, were so cut downe: whereat the Duke both wondring and fretting, sent for the Abbot, under his assurance of safe returne, and demanding the cause why his woods were so cut; Frederick answered very stoutly, I have done (said he) the duety both of my birth and profession; and if others of my ranke had performed the like (as they well might and ought) it had not beene in thy power to have pierced the Land thus farre.

(5) William hearing the bold answere of this Prelate, and knowing it was now a time fitter to pacifie, then exulcerate the English spirits, gave way to the present necessitie, and withall hastned (as good policy required) his Coronation, which at Westminster was solemnized upon Monday, being the day of Christs Nativity, and yeere of salvation, 1066. where he received the Crown at the hands of Aldred Archbishop of Yorke; causing the Bishops and Barons to take the oath of allegiance unto him; and himselfe likewise at the Altar of St. Peters, tooke a solemne oath to defend the rights of the Church, to establish good lawes, and to see justice uprightly administred, as became a good King; and thereupon chose for his Councell, such Men as hee knew to be of great wisedome and experience: next, applying his thoughts for the securitie of his new gotten Empire; fortified such places as lay open to danger, bestowed strong Garrisons upon the Coasts, and Ships to ride in those Harbours which were most exposed to invasion.

(6) And the better to assure the South of the Land (best serving his purpose, if any new troubles should arise) hee tooke his way towards Dover, the locke and key of the Kingdome, as Matthew Paris termes it; that so hee might command the Seas from his enemies arrivage, and over-awe the Kentish, a most strong and populous Province. When Stigand therefore Archbishop of Canterbury, and Egelsine the Politique Abbot of Saint Augustines, (being the chiefest Lords and Governours of Kent) understood of his approch, they assembled the Commons at Canterbury, laying forth the perils of the Province, the miseries of their neighbours, the pride of the Normans, and the wrongs of the Church; all which now were too apparantly seene: the English till then, (they sayd) were borne free, and the name of Bond-men not heard of among them; but now servitude onely attends us, if wee yeeld (said they) to the insolency of this griping enemy: These two Prelates therefore, after the example of the undaunted Machabees, offered themselves to die in the defence of their Country; whose forwardnesse drew the people unto the like resolution, which by their advertisements were affigned to meete at a day, the place was Swanscombe, two miles West from Gravesend.

(7) Where accordingly convening, and keeping secret in the woods, they waited the comming of the Conquerour, all ioyntly agreeing, for that no way lay open save onely a front, to carry in their hands great branches of trees, wherewith they might both keepe themselves from discovery, and (if neede were) impeach the passage of the Normans: which device tooke so strange an effect, that it daunted the Duke, even with the sight, at his approach; who being as he thought free from the enemy, was now suddainly beset on all sides with woods, whereof seeing some before him to move, he knew not but that all the other vast woods were of like nature, neither had hee leasure to avoide the daunger. The Kentish inclosing his Army about, displayed their Banners, cast downe their boughes, and with bowes bent prepared for battle; so that hee which even now had the Realme to his seeming in his fist, stood in despaire of his owne life; of which his sodaine amazement, the reverend Prelates Stigand and Egelsine taking notice, and also advantage, presented themselves before him, and in the behalfe of the Kentish thus spake.

Stigands Oration.

"(8) Most noble Duke, behold heere the Commons "of Kent *are come forth to meet and receive you as their "Soveraigne, requiring your Peace, their owne free con-"dition of estate, and their ancient lawes formerly used: "if these be denied, they are heere presently to abide the "verdite of battaile, fully resolved rather to die, then to "depart with their Lawes, or to live servile in bondage; "which name and nature is, and ever shall be, strange un-"to us, and not to be endured.

The Conquerour driven into this strait, and loath to hazard all on so nice a poynt, their demands being not unreasonable, more wisely then willingly granted their desires; and pledges on both parts given for performance, Kent yeeldeth her Earledome, and Castle of Dover to their new King William.

(9) All things established for Englands securitie, and subjection now to the Normans; hee ordained his halfe brother by the furer side, Odo Bishop of Bayeux, (whom he created Earle of Kent) and his cosen William Fitz-Osburne (by him made Earle of Hereford) to be Governors in his absence over the Realme; and in the Lent following sayled into Normandy, leading with him many pledges for their fidelity, besides other Nobles, especially such as he feared to be too potent; amongst whom, Stigand the Archbishop of Canterbury, the two great Earles Edwin and Morcar, Edgar surnamed Etheling, Frethericke Abbot of S. Albans, Agelnothus Abbot of Glastenbury, Walteof the sonne of the warlike Siward Earle of Northumberland, Roger Earle of Hertford, Rainulph Earle of Cambridge, and Gospatricke Earle of Cumberland, were the men of greatest note; yet was hee no sooner gone, but that Edricke, surnamed Sylvaticus (sonne to Alfrick, the brother of Edrick Streona, the treacherous Earle of Mercia,) a man of great spirit, and of no little power, aided by the Welshmen, tooke up Armes and denyed subjection to the Normans, so that by either party (as in Civill discords it ever falleth out) great spoyles were made in many places; but most of all in Herefordshire, where Robert Fitz-Scroope, left to man the Castle, did much hurt upon the Tenants of Edricke, and he to requite him with the like, calling to his aide Blethyn and Symalhon Kings of Wales, wasted all to the mouth of Wye.

On the other side, such as preferred vassalage with some hope of tollerable, (yea, or untollerable) usage, they to curry favour with the Normans, seeming to forget who they were, became as strangers themselves, and did shave their beards, round their haire, and in garment, behaviour, and dyet, altogether unfathioned ned themselves to imitate them: it being a shame in those dayes, even amongst Englishmen, to bee an Englishman.

(11) Vnto these Male-contents, and voluntary Out-lawes, joyned Morcar and Edwine, the stout Earles of Chester and Yorkeshire, setting up againe for their Captaine Edgar Atheling (which if in due time at first they had done, might have prooved successefull) who with their complices right valiantly for a time resisted the Normans, and in their proceedings put many of them to the sword. King William as carefull and sedulous to prevent further mischiefe; collecting his forces, and not without danger of his life, dissolved their power, so that every man sought how to save himselfe by escape: among whom Edwine and Morcar, Welthesus and Merther, with some of the Bishops and Clergy, went into Scotland: Marleswin, and Gospatricke, Noble men of Northumberland went into Denmarke: Edgar Atheling, with his mother Agatha, and his sisters Christian and Margaret, tooke the Seas for Hungary; but by contrary winds were driven into Scotland, where they were most courteously entertained by Malcolme (surnamed Cammor) King of that Country, who so affected the person and qualities of Lady Margaret, that hee entred with her a Nuptiall contract, and the rather in respect of her possibility and neerenesse to the English crowne; whose marriage was solemnized about the feast of Easter, in the second of King Williams raigne, whereby Scotland became a Sanctuary to the English, which dayly fled thither from the pressures of the Normans.

King Malcolme marieth Lady Margaret.

(12) The Conquerour now perceiving the occasion of new stirres, sent unto King Malcolme for the delivery of Edgar his enemy; which if hee refused, hee threatened to denounce open warre against Scotland. But Malcolme minding more his owne honour, then King Williams threates, returned this answer, That hee held it an unjust thing, yea and (in a Prince) a wicked part, to betray him to his enemy, that came unto his Court for protection, as Prince Edgar was forced for feare of his life; whose innocency and demeanour toward William, his greatest adversary could not touch with the least suspect: alleadging further (besides the respect of ordinary humanity, in this case ever religiously to bee observed) the straight bands of their neere alliance, which required him to render the afflicted estate of his most loving wives, most loved brother, comming under his Canopy, as it were for defence.

King William forceth for Edgar out of Scotland.

(13) William thus frustrate of all hope from King Malcolme, and daily perplexed at the flight of the English unto his Kingdome, feared a revolt and dangerous rebellion; to prevent which, he caused foure strong castles to be built, one at Hasting, another at Lincolne, the third at Nottingham, and the fourth at Yorke, wherein he bestowed strong garisons: and disarming the English of armour, commanded every house holder to put out both fire; and candle at eight of the clocke at night, at which houre, in every City, Towne, and Village, hee caused a bell to be rung, of the French then called Coverfew (that is, Cover-fire) partly yet in practise, and in name very neere, commonly called Curfue: to prevent nightly tumults that might haply be done.

Warres ceased peace.

(14) All this his circumspection notwithstanding, could not prevent the troubles that presently arose; for Goodwine and Edmund, the sonnes of the late King Harold, comming with some forces out of Ireland, and landing in Sommersetshire, fought with Adnothus, (sometime master of their fathers horse, but now a Normanist) whom they slew with many others, and taking great booties both in Cornewall and Devonshire, departed againe for Ireland.

Exceter likewise, seeking to shake off the fetters of the Normans bondage, as also Northamberland, to recover their former liberties, tooke Armes: against whom, King William in all haste possible, sent Robert Cumin, and went himselfe strongly prepared against Exceter, which he most straitly beleagured; at which time the Citizens thought it not enough to shutte their gates against him, but contemptuously taunted and flouted him, untill a great peece of the wall falling downe by the especiall hand of God, (as the Historians of that age report) they immediately set open their gates; and submitted themselves to his mercy. The chiefe instigator to their disloyalty was Githa the mother of King Harold, and sister to Swaine King of Denmarke, with others siding against the Normans, who now seeing the yeelding up of that City, shifted themselves out of danger, and got over unto Flanders.

Camd. Dunon. Exceter yeelded to King William.

(15) But fortune to Cumin was not so favourable in the North, nor himselfe so circumspect as valiant; for lying securely, as hee thought in the City Durham, hee was on the sodaine surprised in the night by Edgar Asheling and his followers, where Robert and seven hundred of his Normans were slaine, one onely escaping, who brought the bloody newes thereof to King William, which happened in the third of his raigne, the twenty eight of Ianuary, and yeere of Christ 1068. The depth of Winter notwithstanding, he posted into the North; whose onely terror daunted all further attempts, so that taking some of the Authors of this rebellion, he cut off their hands, and some of their heads, conceiving hereupon more hatred against the English, and in that spleene of displeasure returned to London.

(16) Whiles these insurrections were on foote in England, the fugitive English in Denmarke, so far prevailed with King Swaine, that they procured his ayde to recover their rights, and the rather, as they alleadged, for that the Crowne of England was his, descending from those that had before made conquest thereof: hee therefore sent a puissant Navy of three hundred saile, well fraught with souldiers, under the conduct of Osburne his brother, and Harold and Canute his sonnes: who arriving in Humber, landed their men for Yorke, and wasted the Country all the way as they went, unto whom shortly joyned Edgar and his associates out of Scotland, so that their Army was exceedingly strong. Whose approach so terrified the Yorkers, that for very griefe thereof their Archbishop Aldred, (who was wholly become the Normans favorite) dyed, and the Normans Garrisons that there kept, left the enemy should have any shelter or succour, fet their suburbs on fire; the flame whereof carried with an over-high wind, soone consumed a great part of the City it selfe, and therein, the faire Cathedrall Church of Saint Peters, with a famous Library thereto adjoyning.

Lib. Elien. MS.

Yorke burnt on fire by the Danish souldiers.

(17) The Citizens, and Souldiers thus beset with sodaine flames, thinking to secure their lives from the fire, did enhazard them on the fury of the sword; for comming unawares upon these hardy and well-appointed Danes, were forced to come to a disordered fight, wherein though for a time they behaved themselves most valiantly, yet being overlaid were discomfited, with the slaughter of three thousand of their men. The Danes, swelling with this prosperous successe tooke into Northumberland, bringing all to their obeisance where they came; and the two yong gallants were thereby so fleshed, and incouraged, that they intended to have marched to London, had not the extremity of Winter (enemy to all warlike enterprises) hindred them; yea and William as willingly would have beene doing, if the same cause had not kept him backe: but when the time of the yeare was fit for warre, hee gathered a great hast, whereof the English were chiefe, this being his policy, to use their weapons each against others, whereby their strengths might be lessened, that so whosoever lost, his Normans might winne: these joyning battaile with the enemy, fought it out manfully; and lastly, making a breach into a wing of the Danish army therewith so daunted the rest, that all of them gave backe and fled; Harold and Canute to their ships, and Edgar Atheling by swift horse into Scotland. Earle Waltheof, who with his owne hands had slaine many a Norman that day, was reconciled to King William, now left Conquerour of the field; whose wrath was so kindled against these Northerne disturbers, that he wasted all the faire Country betwixt Yorke and Durham, leaving all desolate for threescore miles space, which nine yeares after lay untilled and without any inhabitant; when grew so great a famine, that these Northerns were forced to eate the flesh of men.

The North miserably wasted.

An. Dom. 1070. Polydor.

(18) The Conquerour after these troubles bare more hatred unto the English, whose inconstancy (so hee accounted their unquenched desire of liberty) hee daily dreaded, especially the Nobles, and men of power; whereupon hee began to deale yet more roughly, for light causes thrusting our some of them into exile, and depriving more of their lands and goods, seizing most part of every mans revenewes into his owne possession, as gained by a lawfull conquest, causing them to redeeme them againe at his hands, and yet retained a propriety thereof unto himselfe, by receiving an annuall rent, and other provisions and services, whereof if they failed; their lands were utterly excheated to the crowne; neither spared hee the Corporations of Cities, Townes, Monasteries, or Episcopall Sees; but tooke from them their ancient liberties and priviledges, whose redemptions set at what rate it pleased himselfe, soone weakened their estates, which was the onely thing he aymed at, and therefore often blamed Canutus for his over-much gentlenesse extended towards those, whom hee had conquered, whose steps therein hee ment not to tread.

The English hated and banished.

Matth. Paris.

(19) Hee charged the Clergy with armour, horse and money, for the maintenance of his warres, wherein the Bishops and Abbots were taxed at very great summes; which hee caused to bee registred and laid up in his treasury: so that hee did not onely bereave their Abbies and Monasteries of all their gold and silver, but, by the report of Roger Windover, laid hands upon their Chalices and rich shrines, and for their further undoing established by decree, that no English Scholler should come to promotion. In which respect also; whereas King Alfred had, for the maintenance of many learned Divines, (which might instruct his people in the Faith, in their owne vulgar tong) founded a goodly Colledge in Oxford, to bee maintained wholly at the Kings charges, which was accordingly performed, and royally continued in all his successors raignes: King William, desiring utterly to destroy the English tongue, and preaching therein; decreed, that the said annuall expence should never after bee allowed out of the Kings Exchequer, to the great impairing both of learning and religion. To further all which proceedings, his holy Father Pope Alexander the second, sent in a foote, sending two Cardinals, and a Bishop from the See Apostolike, who in a Councell degraded Stigand Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Egelwine Bishop of the East-Angles, besides divers other Bishops and Abbots of the English nation, deprived for no evident cause, but onely to give place to the Normans, in favour of the King.

(20) The ancient lawes of the land hee abrogated for the most part, ordaining new, nothing so equall nor so easie to bee kept; which his lawes although they neerely concerned the English, and therefore ought of them to have been familiarly knowne, were notwithstanding written in the harsh Norman tongue, which they understood not; so that many persons, partly by the iniquity of the law it selfe, partly by ignorance in mis-construction, and often also by the sleights of Pleaders and Iudges, who might pretend for law what they list, were wrongfully condemned, in forfeiture of goods, lands, yea and also of life, and generally so intangled with their unknowne interpretation, and tortured with their delayes, turmoiles and traverses, that they rather chose to give over their suites, then to follow them with their endlesse vexations.

Hard lawes imposed upon the English.

He caused likewise his Broad-Seale, wherewith he confirmed his Deeds and Charters, to bee inscribed on the one side, to acknowledge him for the Normans Patrone, and on the other, for the English King, as in the sculpture thereof, at the entrance of his history is seene, which beareth this sence;

(21) These snares of his lawes, accounted the fetters of the Natives, were by the Nobility sought to bee cast off: for Edwine and Morcar, (the two stout Earles so often mentioned) fainedly reconciled to the King not long before, combining with Fretherike, the bold and rich Abbot of S. Albanes, set up Edgar Atheling their Generall once againe, and fell into a new conspiracy: William, Lion-like, storming at the loose and regardlesse allegiance of these unsufferable subjects, daily with fresh attempts so disturbing his peace, with a mighty power hastened against them, and armed as well with the spirituall sword of Lanfrancke, (then advanced to be Archbishop of Canterbury) as with maile of Iron, or coats of steele, laid all barren where-soever hee came: his opposites for their parts knowing his purpose, as desperately maintained what they had begun, and fully were resolved to make the sword their Iudge.

The Kingdome fights against William.

(22) The King by his Spials hearing the encrease of their power, and knowing to his restlesse trouble, the unwilling subjection of the English, entred consultation with his Archbishops, who as Rehoboams Sages, gave him counsell somewhat to beare with their abuses, rather then to hazard the ruine of all in fight; and so farre prevailed in this his advice, that an assembly was appointed to meete at Berkhamsted in the County of Hereford, where the King entring parley with the English Nobility, so farre did winde himselfe into their good opinions, (being a very politicke, and faire-spoken Prince) that they all forthwith laid downe their weapons.

(23) And hee for his part fearing to lose the crowne with shame, which he had gotten by the effusion of so much blood, gave his oath upon the holy Evangelists, and the reliques of Saint Albane the Martyr, (the same being ministred unto him by Abbot Fretherike) swearing to observe, and inviolably to keepe the ancient lawes of this land; and most especially those compiled by King Edward the Confessor, though (as the event soone shewed) hee little meant to doe as hee pretended.

(24) Peace thus established, among other conferences beseeming such estates, it chaunced King William to demand the reason how it came to passe, that his fortune should bee in one dayes battaile to subdue the English, which the Danes before him could not doe in many; to which question whileft each stood looking on others, expecting what to answere, the stout Abbot Fretherick stept forth and said:

The Scots invade Cumberland.

(25) The reason thereof may easily be given, if the occasion bee well weighed; for womtedly the land was defended by dint of Swords, untill that their warlike wearers upon their godly devotions, laid them from their sides upon the Altars of Orisons, which through over-long rest are growne very rusty, and their edges too dull now for the field: for, (said hee) the maintenance of martiall men, with a great part of this lands revenewes, are daily converted to pious imployments, to maintaine and defend these holy votaries, whose prayers pierce more deeper then the sword: and therefore thou art obliged O King to maintaine their peace, that have beene the cause of thy so easie purchase.

men at Armes, and to keepe onely the religious in safety shall the Laity lye exposed to the invasions of the Danes, and other forreine Enemies? surely out of your owne mouthes I will judge you, and for redresse will first begin with thee: whereupon hee tooke from the Abbey of Saint Albanes all the lands and revenewes that lay betwixt Barnet and London-Stone. Abbot Fredericke, whose overbold answers had now offended the King, without delay called a chapter of his brethren, shewing them their approaching dangers, and to avoyde the present storme, went himselfe to Ely, where hee desisted not from his wonted machinations against the Conquerour.

Lib. S. Alban.

(26) This conference ended, and the Kings oath received, the English Armies disband themselves, as dreaming they had now good Fortune by the foot, and hoping the greateft stormes of their dangers were past; which presently prooved but a Vaine surmise: for King William having compounded with the Danes that lay all this last winter in Northumberland, and payed them a great summe for their departure, began extreamely to hate the Rebels, and with full resolution of their destruction, suddainely set upon them apart, which he durst not attempt, when they were united, so that slaying many, imprisoning others, and prosecuting all of them with fire and sword, well was he that could be first gone.

Simon Dunel. Matth. Paris.

(27) Edgar Atheling got againe into Scotland, and Edwine Earle of Yorkeshire following with the like intent, was slaine in the way by his owne Souldiers; Egelwine Bishop of Durham, Morcar Earle of Chester, Siward surnamed Bran, and Hereward (a very valiant Knight) got into the Ile of Ely, relying wholly on the advantage of the place.

King William wrasteth upon advantage.

This Hereward had received a hallowed Sword, and benediction, of his Vncle the Abbot of Peterborow, and had most valiantly defended his owne inheritance against the Normans, and with no lesse courage withstood the Conquerour, being made Captaine of those now assembled.

Rand. Hgd. Hen. Hunting. Matth. Paris.

(28) But the King, left delay should give them advantage, and the Ile harbor more of such his unbridled subjects, with a great power hasted thitherward, and stopping up the East-passage from all flight, or reliefe, drew a causey on the West through the deepe Fennes, even two miles of length, where likewise hee then built the Castle of Wisbech: against which, they in the Ile raised another of timber and turffes, and called it according to the name of their Captaine Hereward: at which place, many assaults and bickerings being made, but yet no entrance gotten, Morcar by boat escaped out of the Ile, and in Scotland obtained by price, what these distressed could not by prayer; so that Malcolme the King, in rescue and revenge of them, invaded Camberland, and foraged all Theisdale: Hereward also went out of the Ile, and got a gallant crew of choise and youthfull souldiers, which stood most stoutly for the defence of their liberties.

The Ile of Ely fortified against William.

(29) In the meane while, the Monkes, oppressed with miseries, sued for mercy unto the King, and Thurstan the Abbot repairing to Warwicke, where William then lay, offered him entrance unto the Ile, if he would restore to their Abbey the ancient possessions: the King then rejoycing to obtaine that by wit, which Canutus could not doe by maine strength, accorded to the requeft, and in great haft, but no little difficulty, got into the Ile, where slaying a thousand of the Common-sort, he used great cruelty against the better, imprisoning many, and dismembring others, some of their hands, some of their eyes, and some of their feete. Egelwine Bishop of Durham he imprisoned, first at Abington, then at Westminster, whose dyet was either so sparing, or stomacke so great in forbearance, or both (for both are reported) that ere long he dyed of hunger.

King William sworne unto King Edwards lawes.

(30) Howsoever the Monkes of Ely kept their promise with William for betraying of the Ile; hee contrary wise brake his for their preservation and peace; for by no meanes their prayers would enter his eares, till the sound of seven hundred markes had opened the way; to collect which, they were forced to sell both the jewels and ornaments of their church; which being brought to his receivers, there wanted (whether by errour or deceit) a groat in weight, (for in those dayes greater summes passed by weight, not by tale,) whereof when the King understood, hee in great (but captious) rage, denyed them all composition for peace, whereupon with much suite hee was entreated to accept of a thousand Markes more, to raise which, they disfurnished their Monastery even of things of necessary use.

The Abbot would hold his Bow lower the stiffer it is.

(31) But the English Fugitives, who had gotten the Scots to sticke to them, were not yet pacified, but entring into Cumberland, they wasted the Country before them, unto the Territories of Saint Cuthbert, and City of Durham; to meete whom, King William sent Gospatricke, who lately reconciled to his favour, and created Earle of Northumberland, shewed the like measure of cruelty upon the Scottish Abetters, as they had done against the English. The Conquerer therefore not a little mooved against King Malcolme, for that his Country was a receptacle of his Rebellious Subjects, and himselfe now the chiefe Leader of the Male-contents into his Kingdome, hasted into Scotland, with a desire and purpose to have done much more then hee was able to accomplish: for entring Galloway, hee more wearied his Souldiers in passing the Marish grounds and mountaines, then with encounter or pursuite of the Enemy, so that hee was forced to give over his enterprise, and then drew his forces towards Lothian, where King Malcolme and his English lay, being fully resolved, there to end by battaile, either his troubles, or his life.

Will. Malmsb.

(40) King William hearing of his sonne Roberts proceedings, was not (as great cause there was) a little offended thereat, and with a powerfull Army hasted to Normandy: where neere unto the Castle of Gerbory, at a place called Archenbraye, hee joyned battell with his sonne; where the fight was sore and dangerous on both sides, the Generalls being such men as they were: but in the heat of the foot battels that fought it out resolutely, Robert commanded a power of Horse to breake in upon the Rereward of his enemies, and himselfe valiantly following, chanced to light against his owne Father, and with his Lance thrust him through the Arme, bearing him off his Horse to the ground. King William thus wounded and falne, called for helpe to be remounted, storming to see his bloud spilt in his owne Land, and against his owne sonne, which never had beene in battailes of other Countries, nor drawne by the weapons of forraigne enemies, and in great rage threatned the reyenge: Robert, that knew his Father by his voyce, hastily alighted, and in his Armes tooke him from the earth, humbly desiring his pardon for this unknowne fact, and forgiveneſſe of his over-hasty attempt; then mounting him upon his owne Horse, brought him in safety out of the presse; who having escaped so great a danger, and seeing himselfe for the present too weake to withstand the enemy, left the honour of the field unto Robert, with the losse of many his souldiers, slaine there both in the battaile and chase, besides a great number that were hurt and wounded; among whom, William Rufus his second sonne was one, a man of a better temper, and more filiall regard to his parents, and therefore more deservedly and tenderly beloved then Robert; for which dishonour now done to his Father, and disloyalty for his unnaturall Armes, hee bitterly cursed him, and execrated the time wherein hee begat him: howbeit, others doe write, that for his most undaunted courage at that time, issuing and ending in such dutifull and tender care of his fathers safety, he presently forgave his former offences, and ever after had him in better respect.

(41) These stirres thus qualified, and King William returned, hee went forward with his former determination, for setling a further assurance to himselfe, and successours, of the English crowne; to which end, first on the East-side of London (the mother City of the Land) hee laid the foundation of a stately and strongly fenced Castle, or Magazine of warlike munitions; intrenched with a large and deepe Ditch, now called the Tower of London; the surveyor of which worke, was Gundulphus Bishop of Rochester; about the twelfth yeare of the Conquerours raigne; so much is lessened the antiquity of that Citadell, and credite of such as would have it founded by Iulius Cæsar; unlesse (perhaps) we would thinke that King William did onely adde some new fort to the former; being built (saith Fitz-Stephen) with morter tempered with the bloud of beasts.

laid great subsidies upon the land: and that the same might amount to his great benefit, (though with the greatest grievance of the people) hee caused an exact survey to be taken of the whole kingdome, yea and of every particular part and commoditie thereof, so that there was not an hide of land, lake, water, or waste, but he knew the valuation, the owners, and possessors, together with the rents, and profits thereof, as also of all Cities, Towns, Villages, Hamlets, Monasteries, and Religious houses; causing also all the people in England to be numbred, their names to bee taken, with notice, what every one might dispend by yeere; their substance, money, and bond-men recorded: how many yoke of oxen, and plough-lands were in the Realme, and what services they owed, who held of him in Fee; all which was certified upon the oathes of Commissioners. This done, he exacted five shillings to be paied him for every hide of land, which amounted to an huge masse of money. The Booke thus made of every severall survey, was commonly called the rowle of Winchester, (as being there at first kept) but for the generality, and inevitable censure therof, is by Authors named Liber Iudiciarius, by the English, Domesday Booke, kept to this day in the Kings Exchequer at Westminster: of which collection Robert, a Poet at Gloucester in ancient time, and ryme, wrote thus:

The King William, wor to wite the worth of his lond,
Let enqueri stretlich thorn all Engelond,
Hou moni Plou-lond, and hou moni Hiden also,
Were in everich fire, and wat hij were wurth yere to:
And the rents of each toun, and of the waters echone
The wurth, and of woods eke; that there ne lived none,
But that he wist wat hij were wurth of all Engelond,
And wite all clene, that wurth thereof ich understond,
And let it write clene inou, and that scrit dude iwis;
In the Treforie at Westminster, there it yut is,
So that wre Kings suth, when his ransome toke,
Trede wat folc might yive, hij fund there in yor boke.

(43) This exaction was gathered with such extremity, and paid with such impoverishing of the English, that they greeviously groned under their miserable estate, whereby more hatred grew daily to the King, and his Normans; whose love againe to themward was so little, that hee sought by all meanes to bring the English name, and Nation to ruine: for it is noted by Caster, and Rouse, that no English man was permitted to beare any office of Credit, or Countenance in this Conquerours dayes, and accounted it was a great shame to bee called an Englishman, or to marry into their blood.

(44) These greevances seeming unsufferable, the English incited Malcolme King of Scotland once more to enter King Williams confines, wasting all before him unto the River Tyne; against whom the Conqueror sent Robert his sonne, surnamed Courtoise, who marching with a mighty Army, made shew of doing much more then he did; this onely being memorable, that neere to the mouth of Tyne he laid the foundation of a Castle, whereof the towne of New-castle did afterward take both her beginning, and Name; though long before that time there was a place called Monkchester, because (as it should seeme) it had beene either the habitation, or possession of some Religious Order.

(45) Neither was Swaine, King of Denmarke, so quailed by his former expeditions, but that hee had a minde once more to grasp at the English Crowne, preparing a mighty Armado that way, as was constantly reported and beeleeved; King William therfore received a great power of French Souldiers with others, which hee had lately brought with him from Normandy, to disburden himselfe of whose Charges, hee appointed them to bee maintained at the costs of the English, both for their wages, and other provisions, which was another great burden unto the English, though it long lasted not; for that the Danish King better advising himselfe, gave over the enterprise, and thereupon these Souldiers were dischaged.

Matth. Westm. The English chinged with the maintenance of forraine souldiers.

(46) Another griefe and offence hee ministred against both God and man, for the fruitfull Countrey lying South from Sarisbury unto the Sea, hee dispeopled, pulling downe Townes and Villages, with 36. Mother-churches, from mans use, and Gods divine service; and for 30. miles, laid open the country, some say out of policie, to have safe arivage from Normandy in time of need: others say, for beasts, and for his owne game in hunting, or to use the words of Gualter Mapes, who lived immediately after, to dedicate the same unto wilde Beasts and Dogs-game; which place, called anciently Tyene, was ever since named the New-Forrest; imposing great penalties both pecuniary, and corporall on all such as offended in hunting his Game: in so much that he was then called the Father of wilde beasts, more favouring them then the people his Subjects. But Gods just judgement not long after followed this so unreasonable, and cruell act: for in this Forrest Richard his second sonne being goared by a Deere, (others say, blasted with a pestilent Ayre) was untimely slaine: And Rufus his other sonne mistaken for a Deere was by chaunce shot thorow with an Arrow, by Walter Tirell. Henry likewise his Grand-child by Robert Courtoise, whilst he hotly pursued the chase, was strucken by a bough into the jawes, and as Absolon, left hanging untill he died.

Thus, no doubt, God punished his sinnes, (even on his children, and childrens children) who had both taken away the places, and use of his service, and also disherited multitudes of Christian people to their extreme poverty, for his unstatiat and superfluous pleasure: so that (as some then thought) the Earth it selfe also seemed to cry Revenge, when as upon the sixt of Aprill, and fifteenth of King Williams Raigne, a most fearefull Earthquake, with a warring noise, did shake the ground.

Matth. Paris.

(47) Other great calamities are noted to have hapned upon his people, as burning fevers strangely consuming the people: Murrens devouring infinite numbers of Cattle; abundance of raine, and concourse of water-floods beyond credit, whereby the Hilles were so softned to the very foundations, that some of them fell, and overwhelmed the Villages which were in their way: most of the principall Cities of England much endammaged by fire, and London especially, where the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul (as much as was combustible) was consumed to ashes; and if that may also be noted (which caused not the least wonder) tame, and domesticke fowles, as Hennes, Geese, Peacockes, and the like fled into the Forrests, and Woods, and became very wilde, in imitation of men, degenerating then into savages: for in those times even the Church-men (and therefore lesse marvaile if others) became unlike themselves: Walter Bishop of Durham, bought of King William the Earledome of Northumberland, maintained Murtherers, and was murthered himselfe. Odo another Bishop, and Earle also, to revenge his death, made Northumberland desolate, beheading and dismembring the poorer sort, and at great ransoms fining the rich. And Pope Gregory for his part played Rex in this Land, sending hither his Buls with damning Curses against the married Clergie: commanding that none should heare their Masses: which how it was digested, either by God, or manlet us heare Paris an ancient Monke (and therefore herein no partiall man) speake his minde.

" (48) Pope Gregory in a generall Synode excluded " the married Priests from execution of their holy " offices, and forbad the Lay-men to heare their " Masses; a prefident new, and proceeding (as it " seemed to many) out of inconsiderate judgement, " contrary to the sentence of the holy Fathers: which " have written, that the Sacraments of the Church, " by the invisible operation of the holy Ghost, haue " their due effect, whether they are dispensed by " men good or bad, &c. By which fact so grieuous " a scandall is arisen, that holy Church was never " rent with a greater schisme in the time of any he- " resie whatsoever; whiles some stand for the right, " and others strive against it. Moreover, whereas " few observe this chastitie enioyned (for that " though some for gaine, or vaine glory, doe hypo- " critically pretend it; yet many doe heape up in- " continency with perjury, and manifold adulteries) " by this occasion the Lay-men shake off all due re- " spect to sacred orders, and ecclesiasticall governe- " ment; they prophane the holy mysteries, they " baptize Infants, annointing them with the fordid " humor of their ears in stead of holy oyle, they burn " the tithes due to the Priests; our Lords body con- " secrated by a married priest they tread under their " feet, and often doe wilfully cast forth the blood of " our Lord upon the ground.

(49) This Gregory (before called Hildebrand) sate in Peters chaire with such pranks of impietie, that his governement was odious to the Romans, who wi- shed an end of his raigne and life, so that certaine Southfaiers imploied in that busines gave forth, that after Gregory, Odo should bee Pope. Odo, our said Earle, the Conquerours brother, fed with full hope that hee was the man, sendeth to Rome to buy him a Pallace, adorning it with stately and over-lavish trimmings; salutes the Senators with great giftes and complements, stuffeth bagges with money, and let- ters to such as might doe much in the election, and provides honourable personages to attend him to Rome. Among the which for chiefe, was Hugh Earle of Chester, with many great men and Knights of the Land: for the Normans, variable, and desirous to see forraine Countries, were contented to forsake their faire lands in the West Climate, to accompany this proud Prelate over the River Poo.

This jolly traine was set forward into the Isle of Wight, and there in great pompe ready to set saile into Normandy, when on the sudden King William un- looked for, was even among them, and in his great Hall, in presence of his Nobles, thus spake:

" (50) Excellent Peeres, I beseech you hearken " to my words, and give me your counsell: at my sai- " ling into Normandy, I commended England to " the government of Odo my brother, Bishop. In " Normandy many forraine foes have risen up a- " gainst mee, yea and inward friends I may say, have " invaded mee: for Robert my sonne, and other " younglings whom I have brought up, and given " Armes, have rebelled; unto whom my false " Clients, and other bordering enemies have given " their assistance: but they have not prospered, " God (whose servant I am) ever defending mee: " neither have they gotten any thing of mine, be- " sides Iron in their wounds: They of Anion pre- " pared against mee, whom with the onely feare of " warre I have pacified. These businesses you know " have drawn me into Normandy, where I have stayed " long, and imploied my painfull endevours on pub- " like behoofs. But in the meane time, my brother " hath greatly oppressed England, spoiling the Chur- " ches of Lands and Rents, hath made them naked " of Ornaments given by our Predecessors, and hath " seduced my Knights, with purpose to traine " them over the Alpes, who ought to defend the " Land against the invasions of the Danes, Irish, and " other Enemies over strong for me; but my greatest " dolour is for the Church of God, which he hath af- " flicted, and unto which the Christian Kings that " raigned before me, have given many gifts, and with " their loves honored, for which now (as we beleeve) " they rest, rejoycing with a happy retribution in a " pleasant State: Ethelbert, Edward, Saint Oswald, Al- " thulph, Aefred, Edward the Elder, Edgar, and my co- " sen and most deare Lord Edward, have given Riches " to the Church, the Spouse of God: But my Bro- " ther to whom I committed the whole Kingdome, " violently plucketh away their goods, cruelly grind- " eth the poore, and with a vaine hope stealeth away " my Knights from mee, and by oppression hath exa- " sperated the whole Land with unjust taxations; con- " sider thereof, most Noble Lords, and give mee (I " pray you) your advice, what is herein to be done.

His Oppressions.

(51) At which pause, when all stood mute, as fearing to give their opinions in so weighty a point, concerning so great a Person, the King thus continued his speech.

His last Speech at point of death.

" Hurtfull rashnesse is ever unsufferable, and must " at length bee repressed. This man hath oftentimes " banded himself se against his owne father, and up- " on a stomack, blowne up with pride and folly, hath " fallen off to the King of France: therefore left with " overmuch lenity, we buy too larea repentance, he " shall remaine Prisoner, yet not as a Bishop, whose " name I both honour and reverence, but as an Earle, " subject to the Lawes and Censure of his King.

His Treacheries.

Which accordingly was done; upon seizure of whose estate, this Prelate was found so well lined in purse, that the heapes of yellow mettle did move ad- miration to the beholders, and many of his bags were taken up out of the bottome of Rivers, where they were hidden full of gold ground into powder.

His imprisonment.

(52) Soone after, some displeasure having arisen betwixt King William, and Philip King of France, hee having first generally caused to be taken the Oath of English Alleageance to himself e and successors, with a mightie masse of money (fitted for some great at- tempts) departed to Normandy; where falling sicke, and keeping his Bed more then his wont, the French King hearing that his disease was in his belly, gave him this frumpe; Our Cosen William (said he) is laid now in Child-bed: Oh what anumber of Candels must I offer at his going to Church? surely I thinke a hundred thousand will not suffice.

His Avarice.

King William hearing thereof, is said to make this answer; Well, our Cosen of France I trust shall be at no such cost; but after this my Child-birth, at my going to Church (swearing by the resurrection and brightnesse of God) I will (said he) find him one thousand candles, and light them my selfe. And accordingly towards August following, when both the Trees, Fruits, Corne, and Ground, was most flourishing, he en- tred France with a mighty Army, spoyling all the West parts thereof before him; and lastly, set the Citie Meux or Mauntz on fire, wherein hee consu- med the faire Church of our Lady, in the walles whereof was enclosed an Anchoret, who might, but would not escape, holding it a breach of his Religi- ous Vow to forsake his Cell in that distresse. The King busied in these attempts, cheered his men to feed the fire, and came himself e so neere the flames, that with the heat of his harnesse, hee got a sickness, and the same encreased by the leape of his Horse, that burst the inward rimme of his belly, and cost him his life.

His Counsell to his Children.

(54) Being laden with many and grievous sinnes, " (O Christ) I now tremble, who am ready to be " taken hence, and to be tried by the severe, but just " examination of God. I that have always beene " brought up in wars, & am polluted with the effusi- " on of blood, and now utterly ignorant what to do; " for I cannot number my offences, they are so in- " finite, and have beene committed by me now these " sixty foure yeeres: for which, without any delay " I must render an account to that most upright " Iudge. From my tender infancy and age of eight " yeeres, I have hitherto sustained the weight and " charge of Armes to defend my Dukedome, go- " verned by mee now almost fiftie five, both in pre- " venting those snares that have beene laid for my " life, and in vanquishing those Conspirers which " would have usurped my right: a stiffe-nec- " ked people I may say, my Armie hath still ma- " naged, I meane the Normans, who with an hard " hand, if they bee curbed, are most valiant, and " in hazardous attempts invincible: for, as they ex- " cell all men in strength, so doe they contend to " overcome all men by valour. But if the reine bee " once let loose, and laid in their neckes, they will " teare and consume one another; for they are ever " seditious, and desirous of new stirrings; experi- " ence whereof sufficiently I have had, not only of " my confederates and allies; but even of mine owne " kindred, denouncing me to bee a Bastard, degene- " rate, and unworthy of government: against whom, " I have beene forced to put on Armour, before I " was by age ripe to weild it: all which I have van- " quished, and some of them captivated, God so " preserving mee, that they never had their desires. " A Royall Diadem, which none of my Predecessors " ever ware, I have gotten, not by right of inheri- " tance, but by heavenly grace. What labours and " conflicts I have sustained against those of Excester, " Chester, Northumberland, Scots, Gauls, Norwegi- " ans, Danes, and others, who have endeavoured to " take the Crowne from mee, is hard to declare; " in all which the lot of victory fell ever on my side: " which worldly triumphes, how soever they may " please the sense and outward man, yet they leave an " inward horrour, and fearefull care which pricketh " mee; when I consider, that cruell rashnesse, was " as much followed, as was the just prosecution of " the cause. Wherefore I most humbly beseech " you, O yee Priests and Ministers of Christ, that " you in your prayers will commend mee to God, " that he would mitigate my heavy sinnes, under " whose burden I lie pressed, and by his unspeake- " able mercy make mee safe among his Elect. Nine " Abbeyes of Monks, and one of Nunnes, which my " Ancesters founded in Normandy, I have enrich- " ed and augmented; and in the time of my govern- " ment, seaventeene Monasteries of Monks, and " sixe of holy Nunnes, have beene founded by my " selfe and my Nobilitie; whose Charters I have free- " ly confirmed, and doe by princely authoritie con- " firme against all emulations and troubles; in them " God is served, and for his sake many poore peo- " ple releeved; with such Camps both England and " Normandy is defended, and in these Forts let all " younglings learne to fight against the Divell and " vices of the flesh. These were the studies that I " followed from my first yeeres, and these I leave " unto my heires, to be preserved and kept. In this " then (my children) follow mee, that heere and for " ever you may be honoured before God and men: " And chiefly, O you my very bowels, I warne " you to frequent and follow the company and coun- " sell of good and wise men, and governe your " selves accordingly, so shall yee long and happi- " ly prosper. Doe justice to all, without partiall af- " fection; for it is a true wisedome indeede that can " discerne betwixt good and evill, right and wrong. " Shunne wickednesse, relieve the poore, succour " the weake, but suppresse the proud, and bridle the " troublesome. Frequent the Church, honour the " religious, and without wearinesse bee obedient " unto the Law of God. The Dukedome of Nor- " mandy, before I fought against Harold in the Vale " Semlac, I granted unto my sonne Robert, for that he " is my first begotten, and hath already received ho- " mage of all the Barons almost of his Country: that " honour given cannot againe be undone; but yet " without doubt, I know it will be a miserable Regi- " on, which is subject to the rule of his government; " for hee is a foolish proud knave, and is to bee puni- " shed with cruell fortune. I constitute no Heire to " the Realme of England, but doe commend it to the " everlasting Creator, whose I am; for I possesse not " that honour by any title of inheritance, but by the " instinct of God, the effusion of blood, and the per- " jury of Harold; whose life bereaved, and his fa- " vourers vanquished, I made it subject to my Do- " minion. The Natives of the Realme I hated, the " Nobles I dishonoured, the vulgar I cruelly vexed; " and many unjustly I disherited, in the Countie " of Yorke, and sundry other places, an innumerable " sort with hunger and sword I slew: and thus " that beautifull Land, and noble Nation, I made de- " solate, with the deaths of many thousands, (woe " worth the griefe.) These then my sinnes, being " so great, I dare not give the offices of that " Land to any other then to God, lest after my death " they yet bee made worse by my occasion. Yet Wil- " liam my sonne, whose love and obedience from his " youth I have seene, I wish (if so bee the will of God) " may flourish in the Throne of that Kingdome, with " a long life and happy raigne.

His prisoners hee command- ed to bee set at liberty, affirming that hee had done Earle Morcar much wrong, whom as hee then con- fessed, hee had imprisoned more for feare then for fault, onely his half e brother Odo he would have had to remaine a perpetuall prisoner, but that by the im- portunate intercession of friends hee was released.

Princes friends.

(57) Wherein; as we see the instability, both of Mans life, and Glory, (a point fitting for great Princes ever to thinke on;) so by the sequell we shall perceive, how ill-rooted and ungrounded the friendship is, which attends the greatnesse of soveraignes, whose Favourites chiefe or onely ends are their owne Ambition and Gaine, the fewell whereof once beginning to decay, the fire of their seeming-devotion will bee quickly colde. For no sooner had this late glorious Princes Soule bidden farewell to his Body, but his dead Corps was presently abandoned by his followers of neerest place, and best meanes, who posted homewards apace to defend their owne; and by the meaner and his inferiour servants, hee was dispoyled of Armour, Vessels, Apparell, and all Princely furniture, even so farre from all wonted and due respect, as that they left his dead Body naked upon the floore; like true Kites, preying whilest any thing was to be had.

The sudden fame of his death stroke such feare into the Commons hearts as was admirable, every man shifting for one, but all neglecting the funerall rites of their King, untill that one Harluins a poore Country Knight, undertooke the Carriage of his Corpes unto Cane, and at his owne coft, both by Sea and Land, unto Saint Stephens Church, which this dead King had formerly founded.

His Herse also abandoned of all.

At his entrance into Cane, the Covent of Monkes came foorth to meete him, and to celebrate the buriall with all Ceremonies beseeming; but behold even at that instant, a fudden chance of fire happened, which presently invaded a great part of the Towne, that, as his Corps before, so now his Hearse was of all forsaken, whiles they addressed themselves to represse that furious Element: which done, and the Funerall Sermon ended, the Stone-Coffin set in the earth, the Chancell betwixt the Chorale and the Altar, and the body ready to bee layd therein, one Asselinus Fitz-Arthur, a man of some Note, stood up and forbad the buriall: This very place (said he) was the floore of my Fathers house, which this dead Duke violently tooke from him, and here upon part of my inheritance founded this Church: This ground therefore I challenge, and in Gods behalfe, forbid that the body of my dispoiler, be covered in my Earth, neither shall it be interred in the precincts of my right. Whereupon they were enforced to compound with him for a present sum of money then delivered, and with consent of his sonne Henry, for a hundred pound weight of silver after to be paid, and so the Exequies went forward; when, behold againe the Corps laid into the Tombe was with the largest, when being pressed, the belly (not bowelled) brake, and with an intollerable stench so annoyed the by-standers, that neither Gummes, nor Spices, fuming from the Censures, could bee any whit sensible to relieve them, insomuch that all with great amazement hasting away, they left the Monks to shuffle up the buriall, and they were soone glad to get them to their cels.

His buriall place denied him.

Hence Stow notes their report for falsitie, who wrote that his Body was found uncorrupt 500. yeeres after his death.

(58) This then was the life and death of this great Monarch, the Conquerour of men, but not of Death, nor surviving Envie; a bright example of the dimme glory of Man, who in life had the possessions of Kingdomes and Dukedomes, men at Armes, riches, and honour, and all things thereto adhering; but after his death, neither Ornaments, nor Attendants, nor place of buriall, till it were bought; all which, private men seldome want: so vaine is the pompe of this world, and so uncertaine the state of her darlings.

(59) Hee was for stature indifferent, of countenance sterne, his fore-head high, and haire very thin, fat and corpulent of body, with his belly bearing out, so strong of joynts and armes, that few could bend his Bow; of wit ready, and very politique, in speech eloquent, resolute in attempts, in hazards valiant, a great Souldier, and as great in successe; rough and covetous towards the English, in his taxes, lawes, and in giving to his Normans their lands; whose Charters were of a farre other tenour, forme, and brevitie, then those tedious and perplexed conveyances, since in use, as by these few inserted may appeare:

(60) At the suite of William Bishop of London, he granted the Citie (whose chiefe Magistrate was then called the Portreve) their first Charter written in the Saxon tongue, confirmed with greene waxe, whereas the Saxons before used only to signe with guilt crosses, and such like marks: the Copy thereof is this:

(61) In the like Charter, granted to his Nephew Alane Earle of Britaine for Lands in Yorkeshire, he writeth himselfe William surnamed Bastard; and yet it seemeth, hee was offended at Guy of Burgundy for tearming him Nothus; perhaps, because that word signifieth such a one, whose Father is unknowne, whereas King Williams was not only knowne, but renowned also.

Saint Stephens in Caine. John Leland.

(62) Howsoever hee was sterne and hard to the English, yet to his Normans he was facile and too indulgent, much devoted to Religion and frequenting the Church, both morning and evening; The Clergie that lived according to their rule and profession, he both honoured and richly endowed; but to the licentious was very rough and hard handed: his Vncle Malgerius Archbishop of * Rotomage: for his dissolute life hee disgraded: his brother Odo Bishop of Baieux, he imprisoned, and many of the English deprived, as we have heard.

Vnto p. 194. Will. Malm. * Rouen.

(63) Besides his many other stately buildings, both for fortification and devotion, three Abbeyes of chiefe note he is said to have raised, and endowed with large priviledges and rich possessions. The first was at Battell in Sussex, where hee wonne the Diadem of England, in the valley of Sangue-lac, so called in French, for the streames of bloud therein spilt: but William of Newberie deceived in the soile it selfe, which after raine sheweth to bee red, affirmeth firmeth, that after any small showre of raine, the earth sweateth forth very fresh bloud, as by the evident sight thereof (faith hee) doth as yet plainly declare, that the voyce of so much Christian bloud there shed, doth still cry from the earth to the Lord.

Battle-Abbey so called of a battell there fought 'twixt Harold. Will. Newbrig.

(64) But most certaine it is, that in the very same place where King Harolds Standard was pitched, and under which he himselfe was slain, there William the Conquerour laid that Foundation, dedicating it to the Holy Trinity, and to Saint Martine, that there the Monkes might pray for the soules of Harold and the rest that were slaine in that place: whose Priviledges were so large, that they, and others of the like condition, were afterward dissolved by Act of Parliament, when it was found by experience, that the feare of punishment being once taken away, desperate boldnesse, and a daring will to commit wickednesse, grew still to a greater head: for it was enfranchised with many freedomes, and among others, to use the words of the Charter, were these: If any Theefe, Murtherer, or Felon, for feare of death, flie and come to this Church, let him have no harme, but let him be dismissed, and sent away free from all punishment. Be it lawfull also for the Abbot of the same Church to deliver from the Gallowes any theefe or robber whersoever, if he chance to come by, where any such execution is in hand.

The Standard it selfe curiously wrought all of gold and precious stones, made in forme like an armed man, Duke William presently upon his victory with great complements of curtesie, sent to Pope Alexander the second, as good reason it was, the Popes transcendent pleasure and power being the strongest part of the Dukes Title to the Crowne, and his cursing thunderbolts the best weapons whereby he attained to weare it.

(65) At Selby also in Yorkeshire, where his youngest sonne Henry was borne, hee founded the Abbey of Saint Germans: at Excester, the Priorie of Saint Nicholas; and to the Church and Colledge of Saint Martin le grand in London, hee gave both large priviledges, and much land, extending from the corner of the Citie wall, by Saint Giles Church without Cripplegate, unto the Common Sewer, receiving the waters, running then from the More, and now More-fields.

(66) At Cane in Normandy, hee founded the Monastery of Saint Stephen the first Christian Martyr, adorning it with most sumptuous buildings, and endowing it with rich revenewes; where his Queene Maud had erected a Nunnerie for the society of Vailed Virgins; unto the honour of the blessed Virgin Marie. In which Monastery Queene Maud his wife, was buried before him, and lastly himselfe after a most glorious and victorious raigne. In whose tomb (opened by the Bishop of Bayeux, in Anno 1542.) was found a guilt plate of brasse, wherein was ingraven this Epitaph:

Hollinsh. Lamb. Peram.

Et Canomenses virtute coercuit enses,

He that the sturdy Normans rul'd, and over English raign'd,
And stoutly won, and strongly kept, what he so had obtain'd,
And did the swords of those of Maine, by force bring under awe,
And made them under his command, live subject to his law,
This great King William lieth here, entomb'd in little grave.
So great a Lord, so small a house, sufficeth him to have.
When Phabus in the Virgins lap, his circled course apply'd,
And twenty three degrees had past, even at that time he died.

His Wife.

(67) Maud the wife of King William, was the daughter of Baldwine the fifth, surnamed the Gentle, Earle of Flaunders; her mother was Alice, daughter of Robert King of France, the sonne of Hugh Capet: Shee was married unto him when hee was a Duke, at the Castle of Angi in Normandy, and in the second yeare of his raigne over England, she was crowned Queene upon Whit-Sunday, the yeare of Grace, 1068. And although she maintained Robert in his quarrell for Normandy, and out of her owne coffers paid the charges of warre against his Father, and her owne Husband; yet, because it did proceed but from a motherly indulgence for advancing her sonne, it was taken as a cause rather of displeasure, then of hatred by King William, as himselfe would often avouch, holding it an insufficient cause to diminish the love, that was linked with the sacred band of a marrimoniall knot. Shee departed this life the second day of November, the sixteenth yeare of his raigne, and of Christs humanity, 1083. for whom he often lamented with teares, and most honourably enterred her at Cane in Normandy, in the Church of Saint Maries, within the Monastery of Nunnes, which she had there founded.

His Issue.

(68) Robert, the eldest sonne of King William, and of Queene Maude his wife, was surnamed Curtuoise, signifying in the old Norman French, short Boots: hee succeeded his Father onely in the Duchie of Normandy, and that also he lost afterwards to his brother Henry King of England, at the battell of Edwardsbray, (in that Dukedome) the yeare of our Lord 1106. where he was taken prisoner, and having his eyes put out (an unbrotherly punishment) was committed to the Castle of Cardiffe in South-Wales; and after twenty eight yeares imprisonment, there deceased, the yeare before the death of his said brother, An. 1134. and was buried at Glouceiter, in the midst of the Quier of Saint Peters Church; where remaineth a Tombe with his Carved Image at this day. Hee had two wives, the first, Margaret daughter of Herbert, Earle of Maygne, both married in their Child-hood, and shee died before they came to yeares of consent: The other was Sibyll, daughter of Geffrey, and sister to William, Earles of Conversana in Italy, and Neece of Robert Guiscard, Duke of Apulia: By her he had two sonnes, William and Henry; this Henry was he that was slaine by mischance, as he was hunting in the New-Forrest in Hampshire.

(70) William, the third sonne of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, in the twenty one yeare of his Fathers Dukedome, ten yeares before he was King, 1059. he was surnamed of the Red colour of his haire, in French Rows, in Latine Rufus; hee was brought up under Lanfranke, the learned Lumbard, who was Archbishop of Canterbury, of whom he received both instructions of knowledge, and the order of Knight-hood; hee served under his Father at the battell of Gerberoth, in Normandy, 1079. wherein he was wounded: and he always framed his actions so pleasing to his Fathers humour, as that he thought him much worthier then his elder brother to succeed in his Kingdome.

Henry Beauclerke.

(71) Henry the fourth, and yongest sonne of King William and Queene Maud his wife, was borne in England at Selby in Yorkeshire, the third yeare of his Fathers raigne, and our Lord God, 1070. his childhood was trained up in learning, at Cambridge, saith Caius; but the ancient Annales of Saint Austins in Canterbury, say, he was Philosophiâ peregrè informatus, instructed beyond Sea in Philosophy; where for his notable knowledge in the Liberall Sciences, he was surnamed by the French, Beau-clerke, that is, the fine Scholler. Vpon his returne he was made Knight, being 16. yeares old, by his father at Westminster, in Whitsontide the nineteenth yeare of his Raigne, Anno 1086. and, though at his Fathers death he had nothing bequeathed him but Treasure, yet afterward he succeeded his brothers, both in the Kingdome of England and Dutchie of Normandy.

(72) Cicelie, the eldest daughter of King William and Queene Maud his wife, was borne in Normandy, brought up in England, and carried againe into Normandy, where in the ninth yeare of the Kings Raigne, and the yeare of our Lord 1075. she was by her Father on Easter-day, with great solemnity offered up in the Church of Foscampe, and vailed to be a Nun in the Monastery there; but was afterward elected by the Nunnes of our Lady at Cane, to be Abbesse of their Monasterie, founded by her Mother, which she governed, and where she dyed and was interred.

She is vailed a Nunne.

Constance.

(73) Constance, the second daughter of King William, and Queene Maud, was the first wife of Allayne, Earle of little Britaigne, surnamed in the British, Fergent; in English Red. In regard of which marriage, and his service done at the Conquest of England, his Father in law gave him all the lands of Earle Edwine, whereon he built the Castle, and wherof he made the Earledome of Richmond, which long after, belonged to the Earles and Dukes of Britaigne his Successors; although he had his children by another wife; for she died very young and without issue; and was buried in the Abbey of Saint Edmondsbury in Suffolke.

The Earledome of Richmond erected.

Alice.

(74) Alice, the third daughter of King William and Queene Maud, was married to Stephen Earle of Bloys in France, and had issue by him William an Innocent, Thibaud surnamed the Great, Earle of Blois and Champain, Stephen Earle of Mortaine and Boloine, (who was King of England) Henry a Monke of Clugny, after Abbot of Glastenbury, and Bishop of Winchester, Mary married to Richard Earle of Chester, and Emme, wife of one Harbart, an Earle of France, and mother of Saint William Archbishop of Yorke: Shee survived Earle Stephen her husband, and in her widowhood tooke upon her the profession of Religion in the Priorie of Nunnes at Marcigny in France, where she ended her life.

Saint William Archbishop of Yorke.

Gundred.

(75) Gundred, the fourth daughter of King William, and of Queene Maud, was married to William of Warren, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the first Earle of Surrey in England; by whom shee had issue William the second Earle, Progenitor of the Earles that followed; and Reinold of Warren, her second sonne, who had also issue. Shee died in Childbed, three yeares before her husband, at Castleaker in Norfolke the 27 of May, in the 20 yeare of her Fathers reigne, being in the yeare of our Lord, 1085. and is buried in the Chapter-house of Saint Pancrase Church within the Priory, at the towne of Lewes, in the County of Sussex.

Ela.

(76) Ela, the fifth daughter of King William, and his Queene Maud, in her Child-hood was contracted in marriage to Duke Harold, when hee was in Normandy, being then a young Widower. Notwithstanding, hee refusing her, tooke another wife, and usurped the Kingdome of England, after the death of king Edward, whereby he occasioned his owne ruine, and Conquest of his Country, which afterward ensued when her Father sought revenge, so much (as some write) to the discontentment of this Lady, that for griefe of these mischances, she ever after refused marriage, and led a single and solitary life; though others upon better warrant collect, that she dyed young, and before William her father set forth for England; Harold himselfe pleading, that he was free from all covenants and promises to Duke William, by reason of the death of this his daughter.

Margaret.

(77) Margaret, the sixth and youngest daughter of King William and Queene Maud, was in her childhood given in marriage to Alphonso King of Gallicia in Spaine, that afterward was so renowned for the Conquest of the Citie Lysbon, for his victories against the Moores, and for the slaughter of the five Kings, and was the Founder of the Kingdom of Portugall, the first King thereof, and the first bearer of the five Shields of the said five Kings, which are to this day the Armes of the same. But this Lady being thus contracted, deceased before those things happened, and before she came to yeares of lawfull consent to the marriage.

An. Dom. 1087. William Rufus comes into England.

VV*Illiam* posting for England, and Archbishop Lanfrank, his earnest soliciter by liberall gifts given, and promises made to abrogate the over-hard lawes of his Father, had the readier passage into the opinions of them that could doe most: and the more to notifie his intended milde government, with other his noble inclinations to princely vertues, as eye-witnesses of his favours towards the English, he brought with him from Normandy, Morcar, the stout Earle of Chester, and Wilnoth the sonne of King Harold, both of them released out of prison, and then held in especiall favour with him. But most of the States standing for Robert Curtoise his elder brother (a man deemed of a more liberall disposition, and better temperature towards the Subjects) their titles had beene tried by swords, had not Lanfranke and Wulfan, both wife and reverend Prelates, by their Counsels & Mediations stayed their hands.

(2) Consent thus gotten, and all voyces given for William, he was crowned their King at Westminster, upon Sunday the twenty sixt day of September, and yeare of Salvation 1087. by the hands of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury; under whom he had beene educated even from his Childe-hood, and by him made fit both for Warre and Government, had not the variable inclination of his owne minde carried his actions past the limits of any stayed compasse.

and made their Duke: which title notwithstanding seemed to him dishonourable; his younger brother being invested to a Kingdome, and himselfe disinherited; no other cause moving, but his overmuch gentlenesse, being by nature composed nothing so rough, as was Rufus.

Odoes emulation against Lanfrankes.

(4) The like emulation incited Odo, Bishop of Baieux (his Uncle) against Lanfranke the Archbishop, who now ruled all, and had worn him out of favour with the Conqueror his halfe-brother, whom hee taught the distinction of imprisoning Odo, as an Earle, not as a Bishop: now therefore seemed the time most fitting for a just revenge: and albeit that Rufus brought him from Normandy, where hee had beene captivated, and restored him his honours and dignities in England; yet he, ungratefull man, envying that Lanfrank should goe before him, complotted the downfall as well of the one, as of the other. And drawing into this conspiracy, Robert Earle of Mortaigne, and Hereford his brother, with many other of the English Nobility, wrote his letters into Normandy unto his Nephew, hasting him to repaire into England, and recover his right, which by his meanes hee promised should soone be effected.

(5) The businesse thus wrought to Duke Roberts hand, and the English resorting daily into Normandy, assured his hopes of a happy successe; onely the hinderance was want of money, and that very much as the world then went with him, having ever borne himselfe no lesse then his birth, nor ever had made his bags his summum bonum. In these extreames, he well saw the lesse was to bee followed, and to set a Dukedome at stake to cast at a Kingdome, he thought it ods sufficient, though the chance were doubtfull: Therefore to his yonger brother Henry, who had store of Gold, and wanted Land, hee morgaged the Countie of Constantine, a Province in Normandy, and then sent to Odo, that he should expect his landing on the West-coast of England by a day prefixed.

(6) The Bishop now growne bold upon Duke Roberts great power, shewed himselfe the first in the Action; and fortifying Rochester, beganne to molest the peace of Kent, sending to his complices abroad to doe the like, which was not long in performing: for in the West, Robert de Mowbray, Earle of Northumberland, assisted by Geffrey, Bishop of Constance, sacked Bath, and Berkley, with a great part of Wiltshire, and strongly fortified the Castle of Bristow against King VVilliam: In Norfolke, Roger Bystow against King VVilliam: In Norfolke, Roger Bystow against King VVilliam: In Norfolke, *Roger Byst making many promises to amend his life, if God would be pleased to give him longer life: the hard Lawes against the English, he vowed to reforme, as also his owne vices, and to settle peace and good order in the Church, then farre out of frame, for almost all the Monks in England, lived rather like Consuls, being Hunters, Hawkers, Dicers, and great Drinkers (saith Higden) little regarding the rules of their profession. Those Bishopricks and Monasteries that were vacant, and in his owne hand, hee forthwith, and (much against his will wont) freely bestowed: the Archbishopricke of Canterbury upon Anselme a learned Norman Abbot: the See of Lincolne hee gave to Robert Bluet his Chancellour, a man of meane learning, and some other touches, but otherwise of many singular parts.

(20) But the danger past, and health recovered, he beganne to be more ficke in minde, soone repenting him of his too-soone Repentance: for as in spending his owne wealth, he was very prodigall, so was he very diligent to enter into other mens estates, and to gaine from them what hee could, and therefore tampereth with Anselme, perswading him, that the trouble of the Archbishops place was very burthenous, especially for a man wholly brought up within the walles of a Monastery, devoted to contemplation, and unexperienced in the mannage of great affaires of State. But all this Art could not induce him to let goe his hold-fast of the Kings absolutely passed promise, nor yet to satisfie his great desire with money, and therefore the King paid himselfe out of his lands. Likewise from Roger of Lincoln he exacted five thousand pounds; and the Commons he fined for transgression of his penall Lawes; and in truth molested all for money: None were rich but Treasurers and Collectors, none in favour but unconscionable Lawyers, and none rewarded but Promoters: So that his over-haled Subjects fled daily out of the Realme; against whom he published Proclamations, with an inhibition that none should depart without his safe Conduct.

(21) Soone after this, Malcolme King of Scotland came unto Glouceſter, to conferre with King William touching the Peace of both the Realmes; but conceiving a grudge, for that hee was not entertained according to the Majestie of his estate, departed in displeasure without speech with the King, and immediately raising a power against England, destroyed the Countrey unto Alnewicke Castle.

Robert Mowbray then Earle of Northumberland, a most valiant Souldier, seeing his Countrey thus over-runne, made head against him, not staying for directions from his King; and lying in Ambush for his returne, so fore and sodainly distressed his forces, that both King Malcolme himselfe and his sonne Prince Edward were there slaine.

(22) Hereupon Earle Mowbray growing proud, and greatly suspected by King William, beganne to fortifie the Kings Castles, with Munition and Armes against the like invasion, indeed against the Kings will; who sent him word somewhat roughly, to desist from his doings, and presently to repaire to his Presence; which whilest he lingered and neglected to doe, King William sent his brother Henry to spoile Northumberland, and immediately followed after himselfe, where without much adoe, hee tooke the Earle, and committed him prisoner to Windsor Castle.

(23) These stirres in the North are diverſly reported: for Walsingham in his Ypodigma Neustria, saith, that Robert Mowbray and William of Anco with others, conspired to deprive the King both of crowne and life, and to have set up Stephen de Albemarle, his Aunts sonne: the issue of which treason was prevented by surprizing Mowbray, who dyed a Prisoner. William of Anco was punished with losse both of his eyes and his virility; and William Alverie (the Kings Godfather, Kinsman and Sewer) cruelly whipped, and all naked goared in bloud, though guiltlesse, was hanged. Hector Boetius, the Scottish Historian, relates somewhat otherwise of the death of King Malcolme; as that the English having gotten the Castle of Anwick, King Malcolme with a strong siege invironed it about; when, the English distressed, and ready to surrender, a certaine Knight amongst them attempted a very desperate enterprize; for mounted upon a swift horse, unarmed, excepting onely a light Speare in his hand, upon the point whereof he bare the keyes of the Castle, he rode directly to the Scottish Campe, and was with great applause brought unto their King, where couching his staffe, as though he meant with submission to deliver him the keyes, sodainely ranne him into the left eye, and through swiftnesse of his horse escaped, leaving the king there dead: for which act King William (saith he, though erroneously) changed the Knights name into Perceeye, whence that Noble Familie is descended.

Guilielmus Gemeticenſis saith indeed, that it was reported that King Malcolme was slaine by a guile, declaring not the manner, but by the hands of Morell, Nephew to Earle Mowbray, where likewise died Prince Edward his sonne, and the greateſt part of his Armie, with which dolefull newes (saith Hector) his Queene Margaret (called the Saint) within three dayes after died of griefe. But Paris hath set it downe, as is said; and in the same yeare makes William the Conquerour of Wales; since which time the English Monarchs have beene accounted their chiefe Governours.

(24) Grudges now grown betwixt King William and Duke Robert his brother, each accusing other of breach of oath and of Covenants, William from Hastings ſet faile into Normandy, where some bickering fell betwixt the two brethren, but by the mediating of certaine grave persons, their quarrels were compromised, and Princes chosen to be their Arbitrators; which hearing indifferently all allegations, adjudged King Rufus in the fault, who thereupon (as thinking nothing right, but what went with him) was so farre from following their award, that being offended with their censure, he presently affaulted, and tooke the Castle of Burren; neither did Robert for his part sleepe the whiles, but surprized the Castle of Argenton, which was by former Covenants given to King William, drawing likewise Philip the French King to his side, who with his Army entred Normandy for his assistance.

(25) King William then waying into what danger he had brought himselfe, (all approoving Duke Robert, and disallowing his Acts,) he sought to doe that by money, which he could not by sword. Therefore to those souldiers, which in heat of his furie, hee had commanded to bee sent him into Normandy, (even twenty thousand, now in readinesse, and at Haſtings staying for a wind) he sent a countermand, exacting of every common souldier tenne shillings in money for the release, and so without further trouble to returne to their homes; with which summe he so pacified the French King, that he now left Robert to looke to himselfe, who thus forsaken, was constrained to come to an unreasonable peace.

(26) And the more willingly, for that the holy wars for Ieruſalem, celebrated of five yeares before, were now hotly pursued by Pope Vrbane the second, (whom Bibliander blameth to be the causer of much Christian bloud-shed) onely to set up that, which Christ by prophesie had laid in desolation. Among these Christian valiant Captains, Duke Robert would be one, but wanting money, (no newes at all to his coffers) he sent to his brother King William to bee supplied, and for the summe of five thousand, five hundred, sixty six pound of silver, (Paulus Aemilius saith, five thousand foure hundred thirty foure more) mortgaged his Dutchy unto him, giving him the possession thereof before his departure.

(27) To make up which summe, he did not onely oppresse and fleece his poore Subjects, but rather (to use the words of Paris) with importunate exaxions did did as it were flea off their skins; for the Churches and Monasteries, having sold away their Iewels and Chalices to satisfie his apperite, and answering they could make no more; the King replyed, with some scorne; And have you not, I beseech you, Coffins of Gold and Silver for dead mens bones? Accounting the money laid out upon this holy Expedition, to be better imployed then to garnish the reliques of the dead.

(28) The King thus finding his fortune in all things pliable to his wilhes, and his heart therewith greatly puffed up, his purpose was now at his returne from Normandy, to make a full conqueſt of Wales; therefore redoubling his forces hee drew into the Marches, where pitching his Tents, hee consulted with his Captaines what was best to bee done. The Welſhmen finding themselves over-weake, fled according to their accustomed manner, into the Woods and Mountaines, taking thereby such advantage against their pursuers, that the King returned without any notable deede done, and with the like succesſe hee undertooke another Expedition against them the yeere following.

(29) But bearing a minde still to subdue all Wales, he had first in his eie the Iland Angleſey against which he sent Hugh Mountgomery Earle of Shrewesbury, and Hugh Lupus Earle of Chester, who there executed their Conquests with very great cruelties, cutting off the Noses, Hands, and Armes of their resisters, without regard of age, or sexe, nor sparing either places or persons, sacred or prophane. At which very time it chanced Magnus King of Norway, the sonne of Olavus, (the sonne of Harold Harfager) to have made his Conquest of the Iles of Orkeney, and then wafting along the Seas, fought to come on Land in Angleſey, whom to impeach, these Earles made all their powers: where Hugh Mountgomery armed at all parts, but onely the sight of his Bever, was shot into his right eye, whereof hee died eight dayes after.

(30) The holy voyage now set forward, (unto which Pope Vrbane was a chiefe instigator) thirty thousand Christians tooke the Signe of the Crosse, wearing it on their garments as the cognizance of their devoted warfare: The chiefeſt Captaine of which Princely army, was Peter a poore Hermit, who returning from Ieruſalem, certified the Pope of the Christians great misery under those mercileſſe Infidels: but the good man more exercised in prayers (the weapons of Votaries) then expert to guide an Army, was soone entrapped among the Bulgares, and slaine, with most of his Souldiers. But yet the businesse still prosecuted, the number of all degrees and ages flocking to the service, is reported to have amounted (a thing almost incredible) unto seaven hundred thousand. In chiefe command of which huge Armie, were imployed many brave Princes of Christendome; as Godfrey the famous Duke of Loraine, with his brethren Euſtace and Baldwin: Bohemund Duke of Naples, and his Nephew Tancredus: Robert Earle of Flanders: Hugh le grand, brother to Philip the French King; Raymund, Earle of S. Egidius; and besides many other great Princes, the foresaid Robert Duke of Normandy, not the last in esteeme for his renowned service; as his memorable prowesse in that imployment did afterwards make apparent unto the World. All these meeting at Conſtantinople (where Alexius was Emperour) passed over Helleſpont, and proceeded with better succesſe then the Hermit had done, subduing Cities and Countries before them, with the slaughter of an hundred thousand Infidels, and purchase of great spoyles: and lastly, tooke Ieruſalem the holy Citie, in the thirtie ninth day after the Siege thereof. But let us from Iewrie returne into England.

(31) King William at rest whilest his Brother and the rest were in warres, thinking now both of fortifying and beautifying his Kingdome, caused new walles to be built about the Tower of London, and at Weſtminſter, (* where before was the ancient Palace of Saint Edward and his Ancestours) laid new foundations of a most large and Princely Palace, the Hall whereof, by the testimony of Paris, should have extended (if he had lived to finish it) from the River Thames ſis even unto the common high way, as might appeare by the first ground-works, at the time when in Paris wrote: but that stately Building, which now we call the Great Hall, he finished as it now standeth, containing in length two hundred and seventy foote, in breadth seventy foure: yet (when some praised the largeneſſe thereof) hee found fault that it was not made bigger, accounting it scarse worthy the name of a Bed-Chamber, in respect of that which he intended to build.

And certes, of a right magnanimous disposition was this Rufus, as appeared at such time, when sitting at dinner, purposing forthwith to take his pleasure in hunting, a messenger brought him sudden newes of the Siege of Mayne, a Citie in Normandy: whereto when the King answered, He would take advice what to doe: But thy Subjects (replyed the party) are in distreſſe, and cannot be delayed; whereat the King swore his wonted Oath, that if they could not, they ſhould not, and that hee would not turne his backe till he were with them; and thereupon commanded to breake downe the wall that he might goe forth the next way to the Sea, leaving straight Commission for his Nobles to follow him with all celerity.

(32) But the winds being contrary, and thereby both the Sea and the King in a great rage; his Pilote misdoubting hazard of Shipwrack, desired him humbly to expect a while, till those boysterous Elements were calmer, and passage more safe. Whereunto he answered, as no whit daunted: *Haſt thou ever heard that any * King hath beene drowned? therefore hoyſe up the Sailes, I charge thee, and be gone.* The City upon this unexpected speede of the King, was soone released, and Helias, Consull of Cinomannia, who did beleaguer it, being taken by a traine, was by King William jested at to his face, as a man neither of Martiall prowesse nor policie: at which indignitie the Noble Helias disdainingly storming, with great boldnesse said unto Rufus: I am now thy Priſoner, not by thy prowesſe, but by chance of warre, and my owne misfortune: but were I at libertie, thou ſhouldeſt well know, I am not the man thus to be laughed at. The King well-liking the confidence of his spirit: Well then (said he) I give thee full liberty, goe thy wayes, doe what in thee lieth; I am the man that ever will mate thee.

(33) And surely, how soever he might be blemished with many staines of bad Government, yet for his valour and resolutions in wars he is greatly commended; and so much by some, that, if it were not against the faith of Christianity, it might be thought (saith Malmesbury) that the soule of Cæsar had entred into the body of this Rufus, as that of Euphorbius is said to have done into Pythagoras: yea, and those staines (wee may well thinke) were no whit lessened by his story-writers, who were dependants of the Romish See: for that he little favoured their Holy Father, or any such as adhered unto the See of Rome, against the Prerogative of his Crowne; as especially appeared in his Offence conceived against Anſelmus Archbishop of Canterbury, for his too Romiſh humor. There was at that time a Schisme in the Roman Church, which Monster-like, had then two heads on one Body; the Emperor (who claimed that as his right) placing one, and the Roman Clergy aberting another, Vrbanus by name, with whom conforted Anſelme, against the Kings command.

The King alledged, that no Archbishop or Bishop of the kingdome should (or ought) be subject to the Pope or Court of Rome, with whom they had nought to doe: that he and his Realme had as large franchesies, ever since the receiving of the Christian faith, as the Emperour had in his Empire; and that therefore none ought in his Realme to be received for Pope, whom himselfe and his State should not first approve:

Pope Gregory was juſtly by all mens judgements (ſaith Paris) deroſed for Treaſon againſt the Emperour.

To Gregory the moſt Excellent Paſtour of Holy Church, William by the Grace of God, King of England and Duke of Normandy, wiſheth health and friendſhip: Your Legat Hubert; Religious Father, came vnto me, exhorting me, in your name, to make Allegeance to you, and your Succeſſours, and to take better order for the money which my Predeceſſors were wont to ſend to the Church of Rome. *The one I have granted, of the other I have not admitted. Fealty to you, I neither would, nor will make; for I neither promiſed you ſo much, neither found I that ever my Anteceſſors did performe it to yours. The * money hath beene negligently gathered, my ſelfe almoſt theſe three yeares being in* France, but being by Gods mercy returned into my Kingdome, as much as is collected is now ſent by the ſaid Legate: the reſt ſhall be ſent when it may conveniently, by the meſſengers of Lanfranke our faithfull ſervant. Pray for us, and for the good eſtate of our Kingdome; for I have loved your Predeceſſors, and my deſire is above all others ſincerely to love you, and to heare you obediently.

Amongſt Lanfranks Epiſtles, lib. 3. epiſt.

The Pope would have William Conqueror to ſweare him allegeance.

This money was the Peter-pence or Romefeat, which Edward Confeſſor called th Eleemoſyne, as given of Almes to the Church of Rome.

His Holineſſe was then very wroth, that things did not cotten better to his deſires in England. But Lanfranke cleared himſelfe of the blame, ſhewing him how diligently, (but indeed traiterouſly) hee had beſtirred himſelfe, in counſelling the King to yeeld to ſweare obedience to the Pope: Suaſi, ſed non perſuaſi, (ſaid he,) I have ſo adviſed him, but I could not perſwade him.

Lanfranke counſelleth the King to ſubject himſelfe to the Pope.

(35) By which incredible pride and Popiſh incroachments, attempted by the meanes of theſe chiefeſt Prelates of the Kingdome, King William Rufus (no doubt) ſaw it was high time for him to prevent farther miſchiefes to his State, by following his Fathers ſteps in timely repreſſing ſuch Papall intruſions: yea ſo farre was he from yeelding his necke to that yoake, that hee avowed, that the Popes, though boaſting of Peters Chaire, had not from him any power of binding or looſing, whoſe godly ſteppes they wholly neglected, following onely after Lucre and worldly Honours: that alſo it was but impoſture to teach interceſſion, and bootleſſe to uſe Invocation to Saints, even to Saint Peter himſelfe. And as for the reſt of the Romiſh Clergie, who then gave themſelves ſtrangely to worldly and fleſhly pleaſures, wearing their guilt Girdles and Spurres, and trimming their buſhie Locks; their looſe lives the King much deteſted, and ſought to puniſh; which moſt incenſed their Choler: and theſe were the haires no doubt in thoſe Monkiſh writers Pennes, that ever blotted his faire name, under their faſt-running, and uneven hands. For ſo much may we gather from Gemeticenſis, the Recorder of his life, who having reported many Acts of this Kings, ſeemeth laſtly to checke himſelfe for going ſo farre: where (he ſaith) Theſe and many other like things wee could truely report of him, were it not we thinke it not convenient largely to relate his actions, becauſe he perſecuted very many of Gods ſervants, and the holy Church not a little, for which it is thought by the moſt part of wiſemen, that he repented too late and unprofitably.

(36) And true it is, that ſome of them have taxed him for great Pride and Covetouſneſſe, whereof yet ſome pregnant examples to the contrary are not wanting; as, (though the inſtance be ſomewhat familiar) when his Chamberlaine bringing him a paire of new hoſe, and he demanding the price, was anſwered that they coſt three ſhillings; Away baſe fellow (quoth he) are thoſe beſeeming a King? bring me of a marke price: his ſervant went, but brought him another paire of no greater coſt, but told him (as great Mens reckonings uſually are made) that they were of the rate appointed: wherewith the King was very well pleaſed, and disburſed that great Price to fulfill his owne pride.

Rot. de Glous. Chron. S. Albans.

An example of Will. Rufus his wonderfull Pride.

Every baſe knave will now goe coſtlier.

(37) His Covetouſneſſe what it was, may hence appeare, that when two Monkes whoſe Abbot was lately dead, repaired to his Court, and each in large offers out-vied and overbad the other, to ſucceede in the Abbacie; a third Monke very ſober, and poore in ſhew, accompanying them in their buſineſſe, ſtood by; whom the King asked what he would give to be made Abbot? Nothing, ſaid the Monke; for I entred my profeſſion to be poore, and hitherto have beene, little eſteeming the pompe or riches of the World. Then thou art the man, (replied the King) and ſhalt be their Abbot, more worthy in thy poverty, then they for their price; and ſo conferring on him that high honour, checked the others, to their open infamy and reproach.

As the like he alſo did to Hugh a Norman Knight, and Souldier by profeſſion, who of a ſincere devotion had entred the Monkiſh Order in the Monaſterie of S. Auguſtines at Canterbury, and at the death of Vido the Abbot, was but a Probationer; when coming with others to the King for the electing of another, was choſen himſelfe (though ſore againſt his will) without any requeſt or proffer; whoſe penitency and unfained humility ſo moved the King, that in this his Election he burſt forth into teares.

A preferment hollowed unlookedfor.

HENRY; THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FORTIETH ONE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN:

HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER IIII.

An. Dom. 1100. Will. Malmesb. Iohn Sarisb. Ann. Waverl. Matth. Paris.

HENRY, the youngest sonne of the Conquerour, and third King of his race, was borne heere in England, and brought up in Learning even from his childhood, whereby hee gained to himselfe the high honour very rare in those daies, especially in Princes, to be, and to be stiled the Beauclerk: whose portion of Treasure, was not a little, given him by his father, neither any whit spared by himself to purchase friends at the death of his brother; Henry* of Newburgh the right Noble, vertuous, and learned Earle of Warwicke, ever making his way both with the Clergy and Nobles, who * refused to admit any King but with capitulation and covenants to their own likings.

* This was the first Example of Monarchie from the Conquest, to be continued only ad placitum. Ex Tho Rudborne.

* A politicke, but traiterous course of capitulating. Matth. Paris.

(2) The steps then by which hee mounted the Throne of Majesty, were the dislikes of Williams over-hard curbing of his Natives, as hee ever called the English; the rash and giddy head of his brother Robert; his absence in Syria, for whose returne to stay was dangerous, and whose election for King of Ierusalem, was likely to employ his person there still: his English-birth, having both a King and Queene to his Parents; his faire promises for reformation of bad and rigorous Lawes, imposed by his Father and Brother, the restoring of the Clergy from exile, and to their Church-Livings; remission of Taxes exacted on the Subjects; and due punishments of such persons as were the chiefe Causers thereof; in which behalfe to satisfie the People hee committed Ralphe Bishop of Durham to the Tower. Then promising by Oath to frame just Lawes grounded on those of Saint Edward (then which nothing was more desired) did winde himselfe so farre into the loves of all, that with a generall concurrence hee was saluted King.

King Edwards Lawes revived againe.

His Charters sent to be kept in Monasteries. Matth. Paris.

(3) He began his raigne the second of August, the sacred rites of whose Coronation were celebrated at Westminster, by Maurice Bishop of London, (in the absence of Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury) the fifth day of the same moneth, the yeere of Christ 1100. When Henry the fourth possessed the Imperiall Diadem, Philip the first swayed the Scepter of France, Edgar wore the Crowne of Scotland, and Paschall the second sate in the See of Rome.

(4) His first businesse was to put in execution what he had promised; and because he might be thought unfit to guide a large kingdome, who cannot reforme those who are ever at his elbow, began, (as a good Prince ought) with his owne Court and Houshold (as knowing that to bee the patterne and warrant of others enormities) whence hee cashiered all Courtminions and nice or effeminate wantons, and enacting a decree against his Courtiers rapines, Adulteries and Robberies, punished their Thefts with * death, and Lechery with the losse of their Eyes; and other parts peccant.

(5) Then hee restored to the English the use of lights, which his father forbad by the ringing of a Bell, and had now continued for the space of thirty three yeeres, ordaining likewise many good Lawes, and common liberties, exemplified at large in Matthew Paris, which summarily may be thus abridged.

1. The Freedome of the Church from oppressions, or reservation of their Possessions upon vacancies.
2. That the Heires of his Nobility should possesse the Lands of their Fathers, without redemption from him, which favours the Nobles likewise should afford to their Tenants.
3. That the Gentry might give in Marriage their Daughters and Kinswomen without his licence, so it were not to his Enemy.
4. That the widow should have her Joynter, and not be compelled to marry against her owne liking.
5. That the Mother or next of kindred, shall be Guardian of the Lands of her Children.
6. *That Coyners of false Money should be * punished; and likewise ordained a measure to the length of his * Arme to be a Standard for Commerce among his People.*
7. Then did hee forgive all debts to the Crowne before his owne time, and murthers committed before the day of his Coronation: with some other like indulgences: But, to the greatest content of the People, hee gave power and strength unto King Edwards Lawes.

(6) To these his Ordinances he set his Name and Seale, with the subscription of sundry Peeres, commanding as many Copies as there were Counties in England to be transcribed and kept in the Monasteries of every Province. Then did hee recall Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury forced out of the Land by Rufus, and bestowed all vacant Church-livings upon the worthiest persons. But to ground his new planted affection more deepe in the hearts of the English, hee became a suter to Edgar King of Scotland, to have his sister to wife, which was Maude the daughter of Queene Margaret, Sister to Edgar Atheling, and Grandchild of Edmund Ironside, whereby his issue might meerely be both of the English bloud, and of the ancient English Kings.

(7) Shee by report of some Writers had vowed Virginity, and was brought up in a house of Religion at Westminster, (having entred the profession of a Nunne under her Aunt Christian) whose sanctity and knowledge both in matters humane and divine, with her mother Margarets, are highly commended (saith Gemeticensis) in a booke written of their lives: notwithstanding others hold that she vailed her selfe but for a shift, to put off some unworthy matches, which her father Malcolme would have imposed upon her; and indeed this scruple was such a core in Anselms mouth, that he would not pronounce the words of Contract untill her selfe had cleared the doubt by her open confession.

King Henry strengthneth himself against Duke Robert.

(8) Duke Robert, who now had bin five yeeres in the holy warres, and therein borne himselfe with such valour, that hee of all the Christian Princes was thought the worthiest to be annointed King of Ierusalem, had their voyce and election, standing in the Temple before the Altar, upon Easter-Eve: and that the rather by a miracle of his Taper, which tooke light of it selfe, or from Heaven (if we will be so light to believe it:) but he hearing of the death of Rufus, refused that in hope to have England; for which his neglect of Divine appointment, it is said God never after prospered him: Then returning from Syria into Normandy, was there joyfully received, and assumed againe his Dukedome (which he had engaged to his brother William) without repayment of any money: where hearing that Henry his younger, was stept into his throne of England, laid projects in his mind how to defeate him. And to further these his designes, Ralphe Bishop of Durham, corrupting his keepers, brake out of the Tower of London, and gat into Normandy, where he instigated Duke Robert against his brother of England; others also delighting in alterations, solicited Robert to make into England, with promise of their assistance to recover the Crowne.

(9) King Henry for his part resolving to hold what he had got, neglected no meanes to keepe the Diadem as it was set, and therefore rigged forth his Navy to secure the Seas, manned his Fortresses, and with a great Army repaired towards the coast, where neere unto Hastings hee lodged his Campe, relying more upon his owne strength and valour of his People, then any just title he had to the Kingdome.

An. Dom. 1101. An. Reg. 2.

(10) Duke Robert by this time had taken the Seas, and was upon the Kings Fleet before they were aware, where preparing for Conflict, the most of the English fell to the Normans, either by the perswasion of the Duke, or in hatred of Henry, that then began to tyrannize over them, as they did imagine: By which meanes the Duke, had safe landing at Portesmouth, and did not a little rejoyce in this his fortunate beginning; threatning his brother to be revenged for his wrongs and blaming the Nobility for suffering him thus to be abused, whilest he for the common good of Christendome, was imployed in the Holy-Lands warre. King Henry, as wise, as the other was valorous, wrought under-hand for an agreement of peace; for hee very well saw, that the event of warre hath commonly issue from the first successe, and at one and the same time doth bolden and weaken the courage of the multitude; therefore certaine Noble-men on both sides so traversed the businesses, that the Brethren in short time became friends, and a composition made to both their contents. The agreement was thus, that, because Henry was borne after his fathers Conquest of this Land, and stood now the Crowned King with common consent, hee should during his life, enjoy the same, paying Duke Robert in way of fealty three thousand Markes by yeere: and the survivour to be heire to his brother deceased, if hee dyed without a sonne. In which it was also concluded, that all, either English or Normans, which had taken part with the King or Duke, should bee pardoned of all offences, and their Livings against restored: for the Confirmation whereof, and the performance accordingly, twelve Princes upon either parties tooke their Corporall Oathes; and the Armies presently dissolved.

But the Sunne-shine of these faire dayes, began forthwith to bee over-cast, by the incitation of such as endeavoured to sow discord betwixt the two Brethren: and not onely those in Normandy, which ever buz'd jealousies into Duke Roberts eares, but even in England also, some fell in dislike of King Henry, and affecting alteration, with the malignant eye of envy beheld the glory of his beauteous Crowne.

(13) Neither were those men busier to raise stirres abroad, then was Archbishop Anselmus to doe it at home; who being a man of a stiffe resolution, in a Councell holden at London, drew on him the offence both of the King and Clergy: for therein, first, hee excommunicated all married Priests, * halfe the Clergy of England at that time, being either married or the sons of married Priests; next he inhibited all lay-men to heare their masses. But this thing (saith Paris) howsoever it seemed good to some, yet unto others very dangerous, lest while they affected after a purity which was above their strength, they might fall into impurity of a higher quality. In this Councell also Anselme, peremptory upon the Popes assistance, deprived many great Prelates of their promotions, because they had accepted their Investures from the King, which was done by receiving of a Pastorall staffe and a ring, an ancient rite, testifying that their donation was from their Sovereigne, (as Saint Wulfan received his Staffe from Saint Edward, and therefore professed he would resigne it onely to him,) in which number were the Abbots of Ely, of Ramsey, of Persors, of Saint Edmunds, of Tavestocke, Peterborrow, Burch, Bodiac, Middleton, and Stoke: for which his bold parts, and for refusing to consecrate certaine Bishops, advanced by the King, great contention fell betwixt them: and the Archbishop, taking himselfe much wronged by the present over-bearing power, appealed unto his Holy Father, Pope Paschall, and soone after went in person to Rome.

(15) Robert Curtuoise, either to sound his brothers designes, or to congratulate him in a brotherly love, came into England; where he was so royally entertained, that all suspition was quenched, and himselfe so well contented, that at the onely motion and request of Queene Maud, he remitted the three thousand Markes, covenanted to bee paide yeerely unto him, though hee were lesse able to forbeare, then King Henry to give. But when his wants told him of this his over-lavish releasement, hee openly exclaimed against King Henry, that hee had craftily circumvented, and deceitfully cheated him; and now giving open eare and credit to such as fought their dis-union, gave his Brother all occasions of enmity, who was ready enough of himselfe, to make the least very great. For besides this present displeasure conceived against Duke Robert, headded others, and this especially, that hee had wilfully wasted the Inheritance which his father had left him, to wit, the Dukedome of Normandy, having nothing now almost in that Dominion besides the City of Roane, which he would have parted with also, had not the Citizens thereto denyed their consents.

(16) Neither was it the least motive to King Henries displeasure, that his traiterous subjects were so willingly received by his brother; for besides Robert Beliasme and others, William, Earle of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornewall in England, the sonne of Robert, halfe-brother to the Conquerour, because the Earledome of Kent, (which he made claime unto, as heire to his unkle Odo) was denyed him, in a discontent got him into Normandy, where besides his valiant assaults of the Kings Castles, and Souldiers, hee much endangered the possessions of Richard Earle of Chester, then a child and the Kings Warde: so that the flames of warre raised by these seditions, seemedto be blown from England unto the parts beyond the Seas, and to fire the territories of the English there; neither is it ease to declare (saith Hoveden) what misery (the meane while) by exactions, the land felt here at home.

Kingdome by all right did appertaine: yet stood hee rather in feare of men then God (whose favors hee cunningly laboured to keepe) whom hee meant to please another time by building of an Abbey for his satisfaction. Duke Robert then seeing and detesting the kings swolne pride, posted backe unto Normandy to gather his powers. Henry also held it good policy, not to give passage unto Roberts wrath knowing him a Souldier, and well waying his desperate estate: and therefore calling his Lords unto London, in an assembly tickled their eares with these delectable and smooth words.

"(20) My friends, and faithfull Counsellors, and "native Countrimen, you know by true report, "how my Brother Robert was elected, and by God "himselfe called to bee the fortunate King of Ierusa-"lem, and how unfortunately, or rather insolently, he "refused that sacred estate, whereby he is now most "justly reprobated of God; you also know by many "other experiments, his pride and arrogancy; for be-"ing a man of a warring humour, he is not onely im-"patient of any peace, but also wilfully desireth to "trample upon you as men of abject and contemp-"rible disposition, upbraiding you for idle droanes, "for belly-gods, and what not, But I your King, na-"turally inclined to bee both humble and peaceable, "take delight in nothing more then to doe you good, "to maintaine your tranquillity and ancient liber-"ties, (as I have often sworne unto you,) and meeke-"ly and willingly to yeeld my selfe to your advises "whereby I may circumspectly governe you as a "clement Prince: and to that end even now will "I confirme (if your wisedomes so thinke fit) your "over-worne and undermined Charters, and will "roborate them most firmely with a new oath and "ratification. And with "these faire promises (which yet afterwards hee ut-"terly neglected) hee so wonne the hearts of them all, "that they would die with him, or for him, against any "hostility what soever.

(21) Duke Robert gone, and preparing for warre, Henry thus setled in his peoples affection, followed him with all expedition, having in his company the choyce Nobility of England, Normandy, Gaunt and Britaine, so that hee was exceedingly strong. With Robert, for men of chiefe account, were Robert Beliasme, Earle of Shrewsbury, and William Earle of Mortaigne, in like displeasure with the King, and therefore armed with the like desperate boldnes.

(22) Henry with his Army had pierced into Normandy, even as farre as * Tenerchebray, a Castle of the Earle of Mortaignes, using all meanes possible to surprise the same; for whose rescue, the Duke with these his Consorts, made all diligence to dissolve the siege, and after some few skirmishes joyned a bloody battaile, bravely fought on each part, where at the first on-set, the Kings power (though much greater in number) went downe; but by their multitude and manhood (especially through the * Kings example and encouragement) they soone prevailed; where Duke Robert, with Earle William, and sundry others of good note, manfully fighting in the very presse of their enemies, were taken prisoners; but * Robert Beliasme escaped by flight. And thus (as Mathew Paris observed) Gods Iustice and Mercy tooke effect; his Iustice upon Robert, for his refusall of Ierusalems title, and upon Henry his favour, according to the prophesie of King William his Father. This battaile was fought, and Normandy wonne, upon Saturday, being the Vigill of S. Michael, even the same day forty yeeres that William the bastard set foot on Englands Shoare for his Conquest; God so disposing (saith Malmsbury) that Normandy should bee subjected to England that very day, wherein England was subdued to Normandy.

(24) But long it was not ere Duke Robert, weary of this unwonted duresse, fought to escape; and having liberty to walke in the Kings Meadowes, Forrests, and Parkes, brake from his keepers without any Assisters, or meanes for fecurity; who beeing mist, was presently pursued, and taken in a quag-mire, wherein his Horse lay fast: whereupon the King hearing of this his attempt, confidering that woods were no walles to restraine the fierce Lyon, and that to play with his claw was to endanger a state, commanded him not only a greater restraint and harder durance; but also (a thing unfit for a brother to suffer, and most unworthy for Beauclerke to act) both his eyes to be put out, causing his head to be held in a burning bason (to avoyd the deformity of breaking the eye-balls) untill the glasse tunicles had lost the office of retaining their light.

(25) Having thus quieted all forraine oppositions, King Henry set his mind to prevent Domestick; and therefore (about this time) those Flemings, whose Lands the Seas had devoured som few yeeres before, and place was granted them in Cumberland, first by King Rufus, and afterwards by Henry 1 were now by the King, upon better advisement removed into Wales, both to disburden his In-land of such guests, and that so they might bee a defence betwixt them and those ever-stirring people. Which project nothing deceived his expectation; for by the testimony of Gyraldus, they were a Colony stout and strong, and continually endured the warres of the Welsh; a Nation most accustomed to seeke gaine by cloathing, by trafficque also and Marchandize, by Sea and Land, undertaking any paines, or perils whatsoever. A people of very great power, and as time and place required, ready by turnes to take plough in hand and till the ground, as ready also to goe into the field and fight it out; and that I may adde thus much more (saith hee) a Nation most loyally devoted to the Kings of England, and as faithfull to the Englishmen.

(26) By the which his policy, hee attained that which his brother Rufus could not, who many a time had but small successe in those parts, though otherwise, ever sped most fortunately in all his adventures of warres: But it is thought by some, that as the Mountainous craggineste of the Country; and sharpnesse of the Aire encouraged them in their rebellion; so the same impeached Rufus his successe.

(27) And now being free from all feare of subverters, King Henry, growing disdainfull (saith Paris) refused to fulfill what he had so often promised to his Nobles, heaping threats upon threats; for God had bestowed on him three bounties, wisedome, victory, and riches, above any of his Predecessors: but for all these he shewed himself to God most unthankefull: And of his Clergy (wee may say) too regardlesse, in suffering Anselme, newly reconciled, to lay heavy punishments upon the married Priests, putting many from their places, because they denied to put away their lawfull wives, whereof great contention followed, and grievous sinnes in short time committed, both against God and Nature.

(30) The Kings peace, which seemed to be secured by his new affinity with the Emperour, and his glory raised to the height, began now to bee envied and his brother Duke Roberts extreamities greatly to bee pitied, both by some English and also Normans, For Foulke Earle of Anion both threaned the revenge, and by corrupting the inhabitants wanne the City of Constance, from his obeysance. To stay whose irruptions King Henry passed into Normandy, where hee used great extremity, and put to death Helias Earle of Cenomauna, who held that County against him; for which cause Godfrey Earle of Gaunt tooke such displeasure, that hee entred into that Earledome, and marrying the said Helias his daughter, kept the County perforce against King Henries great power. But Robert de Belisme that had escaped at Duke Roberts overthrow, was then taken and committed prisoner to Warham Castle, too gentle a punishment for so blood-thirstie a man, whose nature was such, that he delighted himselfe onely in cruelty, an example whereof hee shewed upon his own sonne, who being but a childe and playing with him, the father for a pastime, put his thumbs in the boyes eyes, and thrust out the balles thereof.

These Earles so incensed the King, touching these and other outrages of the Wellshmen, that in a rage hee vowed not to leave one alive in all North Wales, nor in Powys-land; and straight repairing thitherward, divided his Armie into three parts, The first was led by Earle Gilbert, against South-Wales, the second band by Alexander King of Scotland, and Hugh Earle of Chester, against North-Wales; and the King himselfe led the third, under whose Standard was the chiefe ftrength of middle England. But the Welsh seeing themselves far unable to withstand this present preparation, took into the Mountaines and Woods, (their surest houlds) where being followed, with great difficultie many of them were slaine, and the rest yeelded to King Henry; who now as a Conquerour, in Triumph, returned to London.

(42) King Henry thus at once deprived of all his lawfull posterity (onely Maud the Empresse excepted) upon the tenth of Aprill, and two and twentieth yeere of his Raigne, married his second Wife Adelicia, a Lady of surpassing beauty, the daughter of Geffrey first Duke of Lovain, in hope (though it proved otherwise) to have repayred his late losses by issue of her; whose Coronation was appointed to bee celebrated by Roger Bishop of Sarisbury, the infirmity of Palsey so troubling Ralphe Archbishop of Canterbury, that himselfe could not performe it; yet becaufe Roger was not appointed by him, he forbad his imployment; and the King wearing his Crowne, faith the Monke of Chester, this testy olde man could hardly bee entreated by the Lords, to with-hold his hands from striking the same from the Kings head; of such Spirits then were those spirituall Prelates, and jealouse to loose their pompous preheminence of honour: but his high top was fome what borne down by the boysterous blasts of Pope Calixt, from whose holy hand Thurstan Arch-bishop of Yorke (contrary to the Kings commaund, and his owne * Oath) having received consecration, and thereupon forbidden by the King to put foot againe within his Dominions, his Holinesse commaunded his New-Creature should bee installed (* against all right and custome) without professing any subjection to the See of Canterbury; and threatened with his curse to interdite both Provinces till that was performed. (43) Whether it were about this contention of Investing, or about a Fryer of the Holy Sepulchre, whom (as Malmsb. saith) the King had imprisoned, or about Thurstans hard usage; certaine it is, that the Pope much desiring to have private talke with the King, came to him into Normandy, and so at Gisors conferred (saith Paris) the Great King and the High Priest: but notwithstanding the Popes threates or intreates, Thurstan was kept in banishment full five yeares, and then for the Popes pleasure was restored. But at this meeting the King was so liberall of rich gifts to the Pope and his Cardinalls, that therefore the Pope (saith a Monke) held him a most wise and eloquent perswader, and his actions very justifiable: But it seemeth the Cardinals were neither so eloquent nor learned as they should bee, for that (saith hee) two youths in the Kings Company, sonnes of the Earle of Mellent (learned both, and therefore fit to bee with that learned King) reasoning of some points with them, and disputing Scholler-like with Logicall Syllogismes, the Grand Rabbies (used to other exercises at Rome, then studying) were quite gravelled, and had nought to say, but that more learning was in these Westerne parts, then they had thought. But as these Church stirres did not a little disquiet the King, so also did new Welsh tumults, raised by Meredith ap Blethyn, who with the three sonnes of Cadogin, Eneon, Madoc, and Morgan, fore troubled the Kings people and peace, by breaking into the Marches, and especially into Cheshire, where they burned two Castles. The King therefore making towards them, had sent his maine Armie to conduct the Carriages, whilst himselfe with a small Company tooke a neerer way through the Mountaines and Straites; which being fore-laid by the Enemy, was with great courage set upon, and through the advantage of the place, many of his men slaine, and more hurt by the Welsh Archers, whose showers of Arrowes rained thicke upon them from the higher ground: amongst which, one was so levelled at the King, that it struckе him on the breast, yet being surely armed, did him no hurt; but hee therewithall wonderfully dismaied, and by likelihood fearing some treason amongst his owne, (for, then he swore by our Lords death, his usuall oath, that no Wellshman shot that Arrow, but one of his owne Provincials) and confidering that by, these his over-rash proceedings, his glory purchased in more famous parts, might againe bee lost in this wilde and rude Country; came to a Parley and Peace; receiving of the King a thousand head of Cattle, and leaving Lord Fitzwarren Lieutenant of the Marches, returned to England, where he held three Parliaments in the same yeere, one at Norwich, another at Northampton, and the third at London.

This Pontificall Prelate was entertained by all the Bishops and Abbots with great and costly Presents, and afterward being solemnely set in a Councell at London, upon the birth-day of the Blessed Virgin, made a solemne Oration in praise of Virginitie and Chastitie, with a terrible invective against the married Priests: and to amplifie their sinnes the more, he shewed what extreame impietie it was, to rise from the bed of unlawfull lust, (for so was their chaste Marriage termed) and with polluted hands to touch the Sacrament of the body of Christ: but the same night following he * having that very day consecrated that holy Sacrament, was himself taken with a Whore, the matter being so apparant, that it could not bee hid, (neither ought it to be silenced, saith Huntingdon) to the great approach of those most unchaste boasters of Chastitie, as both Paris and Higden themselves doe confesse: and so hee returned to Rome with shame enough, but with little successe in that intended businesse: till some few yeeres after * King Henry, seeming very desirous to settle his pretenced continency in the Clergie; in a Councell held at London, obtained (through simplicity of the Archbishop of Canterbury, saith Paris, that himselfe should have the execution of justice and punishments of the Priests, that offended either in keeping of their wives, or using of Concubines, (for likely those that liked not the one, loved the other, as Vpon which his suddaine flight and missing, the Empresse Maud * some say, was suspected to be guilty of his death, and for that cause was kept continually in the Queenes Chamber. Indeede, that she abode still in Chamber with the Queene, Paris records; but hee gives a wiser reason thereof, for that her Father did love her exceedingly, as being now his sole Heire; and where should an Empresse rather live, then with a Queene? a Daughter, then with her Mother? a faire Lady, a Widow, and an Heire of so great a Kingdom, then where her person might bee safest from danger, her minde from inveigling, and her carriage from suspicion? But as for that other idle conjecture, it is razed out, both by those Writers, who record his Buriall, and Monument at Spire, (as * Higden himselfe signifieth) and also by the pen of William Gemeticensis, who reporteth her to bee a woman generally well thought of, and approoved among the greatest Princes of the Empire, for her prudent and gracious behaviour towards the Emperour her husband; insomuch that they became suters unto her, seeking by all meanes to attaine her to governe them, and to that end attended her to King Henry in Normandy to solicite the same; to whom in no wise hee would give his consent, meaning to make her his Successor in the Kingdome: Whereunto Malmsbury (who then lived) accordeth; saying, thee was very unwilling to have come out of those parts of the Empire, where both her dowry and acquaintance lay, and that the Princes of those Countries came more then once into England, to have her for their Empresse, but that the King would not part with the Heire of his Crowne.

(53) Were it not reported by some Writers of note, I might heere well passe over certaine presaging dreames (as the Monkes interpreted them) which King Henry had, being ready now to goe into Normandy: for to his seeming hee saw a sort of ruſticke Plough-men with their Instruments of husbandry; after them Souldiers with their weapons of Warre; and lastly, the Bishops with their Crosier Staves, all of them angerly threatning, and attempting his death: wherewith hee was so perplexed, that leaping out of his bed, he called for helpe; but seeing it but a dreame, as a dreame hee esteemed it, and passed over into Normandy: where long he staid not, but that his Daughter Maud, upon some displeasure, departed from her husband, and came with her Father into England. Some write that shee was the provoker of certaine displeasures between her Husband and Father, which so affected his minde with passions of wrath and griefe, that many thought it was a great hastning of his end; and indeed Malmsbury witnesseth, that the King upon his death-bed passionately mentioned the wrongs and indignities wherewith her husband had disquieted his minde. Howbeit soone after this her departure from him, by consent of the States, who met at Northampton, shee was reconciled to her Husband, sent unto him upon his intreaty, and bare him a sonne, whose name was Henry; for joy whereof, King Henry assembled his Lords, and againe made his said Daughter, and the lawfull Heires of her body his Successors in his Dominions.

(56) For Robert the Curtoise, after twenty sixe yeeres imprisonment and blindnesse, through griefe conceived at the putting on of a faire new roabe, (too little for the King, and therefore in kindnesse sent to Duke Robert to weare) grew weary of his life (as disdaining to be mocked with his brothers cast cloathes) and cursing the time of his unfortunate Nativitie, refused thenceforth to take any sustenance, and so pined himselfe to death. His body was buried at Glocester in the Church of Saint Peter, and middle of the Quire, where to this day remaineth his Tombe, with a carved Image of his feature, as the monument of a most unfortunate man.

(57) And not long after, King Henry in Normandy, comming scarse very well from Hunting in the Forrest of Lyons, and Towne of Saint Denys, made his repast of a dish of Lampreyes (which meate hee too well loved, but could never well digest;) whereupon he fell more grievously sicke, and the same still increasing, after seven dayes sickneesse, upon the first of December, the sixtie five of his age, and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1135. when he had raigned King of England, thirtie five yeeres, foure moneths, lacking foure daies, and Duke of Normandy, twentie nine yeeres and foure moneths: he died in the said Towne of Saint Denys, and from thence was conveyed to Roan, where his Bowels, Eyes, and Braines, were taken out, and buried; the body also sliced, and powdred with much salt, was wrapped in a Buls hide to avoide the stinch, being so intolerable, (a point fitting for such great Princes to thinke on, and in their great glory and pleasures to remember their fraile and humane condition,) that the Physician, who tooke out his Braines, was poysoned therewith, and presently died: whereupon some observed, that other Kings killed men in their life, but hee also * after hee was dead; thence was his Corps carried into England, and honourably buried upon the day of Chrisis Nativitie, at Reading in Barkeshire, in the Abbey that himselfe had there founded, and endowed with large possessions.

(58) After his death, (saith Huntingdon and Hoveden,) men spake their minde as freely of him, as of any other dead man: some commending him for these three glorious felicities, * Wisedome, Victory, and Wealth: others condemning him for three especiall vices, * Covetousnesse, Cruelty, and Lechery; some instances of which we have touched in the relation of his life; the first three, in obtaining and keeping the Crowne: the last, in his most grievous taxations, cruell handling and imprisoning his Brother; and his incontinency of life shall presently appeare, by his many illegitimate Issues, the fruits of his wantonnesse, and witnesses of his shame: in that Princes who are to punish such sinnes in others, ought themselves especially to be free from them: for though their living fortunes stop mens tongues from upbraiding, yet after their death the tongues of the vulgar, and pens of the learned, will make the infamy of their vices to be immortall.

(59) He was for personage of a reasonable stature, broad-breasted, well joynted, and full of flesh: amiable of countenance, sharpe and faire eyes, blacke of haire, and that somewhat carelesly hanging on his forehead; his minde was enriched with many vertues, a follower of Iustice, a lover of Religion, severe against theeves, and all effeminate nicities; So that hee commanded mens long haire (which against God and Natures law was matchable at that time with womens) to bee cut off: temperate of diet, and never drinking but for thirst; valiant in battaile, yet very circumspect; seeking rather to winne by wise care, then by effusion of bloud: and by the report of most Writers excelled all the Princes of the World in his time, in Mercy, Wealth, and Bountie, unto Monasteries: the land hee defended by Garrisons of Souldiers planted on the Confines of his neighbour Princes, building many Forts, Bulwarkes, and Castles; besides twentie five Townes and Cities: whatsoever was wisely or vertuously performed in his Government, is chiefely ascribed to his younger yeeres institution in true Learning and Philosophy, which was the * great furnishment of him unto the Science of Regalitie; being often heard to say, that hee esteemed an unlearned King but a crowned Asse. In which regard (saith * Rossus,) hee tooke chiefe pleasure to reside in his new Palace, which himselfe built at Oxford, both for the delight hee had in learned men, himselfe being very learned, and for the vicinity of his new Parke at Woodstocke, which he had fraught with all kind of strange beasts, wherein hee much delighted, as Lyons, Leopards, Lynces, Camels, Porcupines, and the like. His delight also in works of devotion, shewes it selfe both in the erection and indowment of the Collegiate and * Episcopall Sees of Carleile, and * Ely, as also of the Abbeyes of Hide, Circester, Reading, and the Priorie of Dunstable: His Wife Queene Maud founded the Priorie of Holy Trinitie within Algate, and the Hospitall of Saint Giles in the Fields: so that by himselfe, his Queene, and other devoted persons, twentie foure foundations to religious uses (if not more) were erected in the raigne of this King.

His Wives.

(60) Maud, the first Wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Malcolme the third, surnamed * Canmoir, King of Scotland: her mother was Saint Margaret, daughter to Edward, sonne of Edmund the Ironside, King of England. Shee was married unto him at London in the first yeare of his raigne, Anno 1100. by Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury: having formerly vowed her selfe a Nunne, which some swore thee did not for love of single life, but to avoid some unworthy matches, which her Father would have imposed on her. Her Coronation was at Westminster by the same Anselme, on Sunday the eleventh of November in the same yeere. Shee was his Wife seventeene yeeres and more, famous for her learning, love to learning, charity to the poore, and all vertuous dispositions; and deceased at Westminster the first of May, in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, and yeere of our Salvation, 1118. where shee was buried in S. Peters Church, on the right side of King Edward the Confessor.

Shee was married unto him the nine and twentieth of Ianuary, in the twentie one of his raigne, and yeere of Christ, 1121. and was crowned the morrow after, being Sunday. Shee was his wife fifteene yeares, but ever childlesse, and surviving him, was re-married to William Daubeny Earle of Arundel, and was Mother of Earle William the second, Rayner, Godfrey, and Ioan, married to John Earle of Augi, &c.

His Issue.

(62) William, the sonne of King Henry, and Queene Maud his first Wife, was borne the second of his Fathers raigne, and of Christ, 1102. When he came to age of foureteene yeares, the Nobilitie of England did him homage, and sware their fealties unto him at Shrewsbury. The third yeere after, hee married the the daughter of Foulke, Earle of Anion: and the same yeare hee was made Duke of Normandy, doing his homage for the same to Lewis the Grosse, King of France; and received the homage and oathes of the Nobilitie of that Countrey: but in his returne for England, he was unfortunately drowned neere unto Barbfleet upon the twenty sixt of November, the yeere of Grace 1120. and eighteenth of his own age, without any issue, to the great griefe of his Father.

(63) Maud, the daughter of King Henry, and of Queene Maud his first wife, was borne the fourth yeare of her Fathers raigne. She was the second wife of the Emperour Henry the fourth, espoused at sixe yeeres of age, and at eleven with great solemnitie was married and crowned his Empresse at Mentz in Germany, 6. Ianuary, Anno 1114. the ninth of her husbands, and foureteenth of her Fathers Raignes. Shee was his wife twelve yeares, and survived him, without any issue by him; and comming into England a widdow, shee had fealty sworne unto her by the Nobilitie, and was re-married to Geffrey Plantagines Earle of Anion, sonne of Foulke King of Ierusalem, upon the third of April, and yeere of Grace 1127. by whom shee had issue, Henry, the second, King of England, Geffrey Earle of Nantes in Britanie, and William, who was called Earle of Poyto: Shee was his wife twentie three yeares, and surviving him also, continued a widdow the last seveteene yeeres of her life, which she ended in the City of Roan the tenth of September, 1167. the foureenth of the raigne of King Henry her sonne, and was buried in the Abbey of Bec in Normandy.

(64) Richard, a second sonne to King Henry, and Queene Maud, by the testimonie of Gervasius the Monke of Canterbury, who maketh Maud their eldest Child, William the second; and lastly, Richard; and then (saith he) the left bearing: but Malmsbury saith, she had but two Children, one of each sexe.

(65) Eusem, also another daughter, and fourth Child (by Hector Boetius the Scottish Historian) is said to be borne unto the Beuclearke by Queene Maud; the credite of the two last, I leave to the reporters, who onely thus name them, without any further relation.

His Naturall Issue.

(66) Robert, the naturall sonne of King Henry, was Earle of Glouceſter, and married Mabel daughter and heire of Robert Fitz-hammon Lord of Glamorgan, by whom hee had issue William Earle of Glouceſter, Richard Bishop of Bayon, Roger Bishop of Worcester, and Maud the wife of Randolph Gernon; the mother of Hugh Kevelior Earle of Chester, and Richard his brother: Earle William married Avis daughter of Robert Bossu Earle of Leicester, and had issue three daughters and heires of that Earledome, which by Avis the second of them, in the end descended to Clare Earle of Hereford. This Earle Robert died the last of October, in the twelfth yeare of King Stephen, and was buried at Brisslow in the Church of S. Iames, which he had founded, and his body laid in the midst of the Quire; unto him William Malmsbury dedicated his Booke called Historia Novella.

(67) Richard, another naturall sonne of King Henry, was as it seemeth by an ancient Regiſter of the Monastery at Abington, borne in the raigne of King William Rufus, of the widow of Anskill, a Nobleman of the Countrey adjoyning to the said Monastery; and it seemeth he is that Richard that was drowned in the Norman Seas, neere Barbfleet, among the reſt of King Henries children.

(68) Raynold, the naturall sonne of King Henry, was borne of a daughter unto Sir Robert Corbet, Lord of Alcester in Warwickshire, by the gift of the King in favour of her, who was after married to Henry Fitz-herbert his Chamberlaine. This Raynold was created Earle of Cornwall, and Baron of Castlecomb, with consent of King Stephen, and had issue foure daughters, of whom have sprung many faire branches.

Reynold.

(69) Robert, another of that name, was borne of Edith, the sister of Ive, sonne and daughter of Forne, the sonne of Sigenolfe, both of them great Barons in the North: which Edith afterwards King Henry gave in marriage to Robert Doilie, Baron of Hook-Norton in Oxford.shire; and with her gave him the Mannor of Eleydon, in the County of Buckingham, by whom he had issue Henry Doylie Baron of Hook-Norton, who oftentimes mentioneth this Robert in his Charters, ever calling him Robert his brother the Kings sonne.

Robert.

(70) Gilbert, another naturall sonne of King Henry, is named in the additions to the story of William Gemeticensis the Norman Monke, in the Chronicle of that country, written by Iohn Taylor, being a Translator of that worke out of Latine into French, and lastly, in the Treaties betwixt England and France, written in the French tongue by Iohn Tillet, Secretarie to their late King Henry the second, and yet in them, not any other mention is made, but onely of his name.

Gilbert.

(71) William, also a naturall sonne of Henry the King, had given unto him the Towne of Tracie, in Normandie; of which he tooke his surname, and was called William of Tracie: But whether he were the Progenitor of the Tracies, sometime Barons in Devonshire, or of them that now be of the same surname; or whether Sr. William Tracie, one of the foure Knights that slew Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, were any of his posteritie, is not certainly reported: nor any thing else of him, more then that he died a little after his Father, which was in the yeare of Christ, 1135.

William.

(72) Henry, another naturall sonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Nesta, daughter of Rees ap Tewdor Prince of South-Wales, who was the Wife of Sir Gerald Windsor, and of Stephen, Constables of the Castles of Pembrooke, and Abertivie in Wales, and Progenitors of the Families of the Fitz-geralds, and the Fitz-Stephens in Ireland; hee was borne and bred, and lived, and married in Wales, having issue two sonnes, namely, Meiler and Robert, of which, Meiler the elder married the daughter of Hugh Lacie, Lord of Methe, in Ireland; hee was at the conflict in the Ile of Anglesey, betweene Magnus the sonne of Harold Harfager, King of Norway, and Hugh of Mountgomery, Earle of Arundell and Shrewsbury, wherein he was slaine, as some say, with the said Earle, Anno 1197.

Henry.

(73) Maud, the Naturall daughter of King Henry, was Countesse of Perche, and the first Wife of Earle Rotroke, the first of that name, son of Arnulfe de Hesding, the first Earle of that County: She had issue by him one onely daughter, named Magdalen, wife to Garcy the fourth King of Navarre, mother of King Sanches, surnamed the Wife, from whom all the Kings of Navarre are descended: She died upon Friday the twentie sixth of November, in the twentieth of her Fathers raigne and year of Grace 1120. being drowned in the Sea with her brother Duke William.

Maud.

(74) Maud, another of that name, and naturall daughter of King Henry, was married to Conan the first of that name, surnamed the Grosse, Earle of little Britaine in France, sonne of Earle Alan by Ermengard his second wife; by Alan shee had issue Howell, pronounced illegitimate, and disherited by his supposed father Constance, that died without issue; and Bertha the wife of Eudes Earle of Porrohet, mother of Earle Conan the yonger, who by Margaret sister of William King of Scots, had issue Constance, married to Geffrey sonne of King Henry the second.

Maud.

(75) Iulian likewise, another naturall daughter of King Henry, was married to Eustace the illegitimate sonne of William Lord of Bretevil in Normandy, who was the sonne and heire of William Fitz-Osborn, and elder brother of Roger, both Earles of Hereford

in England, and this Eustace had hee beene lawfully borne in wedlocke, had beene heire to the Earledoms of Hereford and Iverie: notwithstanding hee had as small a part in that inheritance of the Towne of Pacie from which he tooke his surname, being commonly called Eustace of Pacy, and had issue by this Iulian his wife, William and Roger of Pacy his sonnes.

(76) A naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the continuer of the History of William Gemeticensis, and by Iohn Tillet his follower, is reported by them to have beene married to one William Goet a Norman; but in neither of these writers is any mention made of her name, or of his estate, issue, or other relation.

(77) Another naturall daughter of King Henrie is without name, recited by the said Authors, and by them reported to be married to the Vicount of Beaumont, which is a Towne within the Countie of Maigne. Shee had issue by him, as Roger of Hoveden writeth, Richard Vicount Beaumont, Father of Queene Ermengard the wife of King William of Scotland: and Robert the Abbot of Mount-Saint Michael mentioneth another of her sons, named Ralph, who (as he saith) was Bishop of Angiers.

(78) Another naturall daughter also of King Henry is recited by the Normane and French writers before avouched, and reported by them to be married to Matthew of Mountmorancy, the sonne of Bouchard of Mountmorancy, from whom perhaps descended the House of Mountmorancy, who after came to be Earles and Dukes, being growne to bee one of the greatest houses in France, next to the Princes of the bloud, for possessions, alliances, and honour.

(79) Elizabeth the last naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the former Authors, was unmarried in the time of the one, and her husband unknowne to the other; but both of them agree, that she was born of Elizabeth the sister of Walleran Earle of Meulan, who was sister also of Robert Bossue Earle of Leicester, wife of Gilbert Earle of Pembrooke, and mother of Earle Richard Strangebow, the Conqueror of Ireland.

CHAPTER. V.

An. Dom. 1135. King Henries Heir defeated of the Crowne by Stephen.

THough the Empresse Maud had fealty sworn unto her in the life time of her Father: and againe both her self and issue ordained to be his successors in Englands Throne, as hath beene said; yet so powerfull is Ambition, where the Object is a Diademe, and so weake are all assurances which are built on the wavering Multitude, that King Henries providence, was soone defeated, and with his death all fealties reversed, and that by him onely who had * contended to bee the formost of the Laity in taking that oath, even Stephen Earle of Mortaine and Bolleine, a man whose descent was very Noble, being the third sonne of Stephen Earle of Bloys and Champaigne, who was the sonne of Earle Eudes, and he of Earle Theobald, the sonne of Gerlon the Dane, the companion of Rollo Duke of Normandy; his mother was * Adelicia the third daughter of William the Conqueror by Queene Maud his wife: And himselfe was advanced to bee Earle of Mortaigne by King Henry his uncle, whose Crowne he now endeavoured to usurpe, being otherwise for his many princely parts, worthy to weild a Scepter, if his claime thereto had been just and warrantable.

(2) For as soone as Natures course had brought King Henry, where Princes and poorest Subjects are all equall; forthwith hee was working to dispossesse his Issue, which onely now rested in Maud and her Children; in which attempt it happened fortunately for him that his yonger Brother Henry was then Bishop of Winchester, and a very potent man in the State, who had industriously stirred himselfe in making way to his entrance; and (upon assurance of all liberties to the Church and Common-wealth) had drawne on also William Archbishop of Canterbury, the very first man that had sworne sworne unto Maude the Empresse: by whose example many others were winded into the like perjurie, * traitorously avowing, that it was basenesse for so many, and so great Peeres, to bee subject unto a Woman. And to helpe forward those audacious beginnings; Roger Bishoppe of Salisbury, the late Kings Treasurer, protested (Malmesbury, who reports it, himselfe heard it from him) that they were free from the oath made to the Empresse, for that without consent of the Barons she had married out of the realme; but that which wrought most, was the testimony of Hugh Bigot, * Seneschall unto King Henry departed, who comming over with Stephen, tooke his corporall oath, that the King on his death-bed, upon some offence taken against his daughter Maude, disinherited her, and appointed this Stephen, his nephew, to be his successour. These colourable instigations so moved the * too credulous Archbishop and the Peeres, that they all swore fealty unto him, and became his Liege-men.

(3) His first landing in England, (being at Whitsun-day) by a tempest of thunder so wonderfull and terrible, that the people thought verily the end of all was at hand, did prognosticke the storms of troubles which his perjurie brought with him; for even then both Dover and Canterbury fortified themselves against him, though London gave better leave to his entrance, whose Person and presence drew ever the affections of the beholder, being in all parts compleat with natures endowments, of personage passing comely, of disposition loving, cheerefull, and affable to the meanest, always very liberall; but now especially, knowing his Purse the best Lawyer to plead for his Title; and in Martiall prowesse gave place to none of that time, wherein, though his whole raigne was continually spent, yet (by reason of King Henries great Treasure left) never burthened hee the Commons with any exactions, a thing that ever gained the love of the common sort: neither is hee taxed with any other observable crime, save onely his perjury against the Empresse Dowager, and her sonne.

(4) Hee entred his government the yeare of Christ Iesus, 1135. the second day of December, and was crowned at Westminster the twenty sixt of the same Moneth, being Saint Stephens day, by William Corbell Archbishop of Canterburie, who with the rest of the Prelates doing him homage, and knowing now hee would yeeld to any conditions (for performance whereof his* Brother of Winchester did there engage himselfe for a pledge) they all tooke their oath of allegiance, conditionally, (traitorously, I might say) to obey him as their King, so long as hee should preserve their Church-Liberties, and the vigour of Discipline: And that the Lay-Barons made use also of this of policy, appeareth by Robert Earle of Gloucester, who sware to be true Liege-man to the King, as long as the King would preserve to him his dignities, and keepe all Covenants, whereupon the King promised for the present, that he would speedily reforme the over-hard Lawes of his Predecessors, and mollifie the extreames thereof, to their owne likings, under his Seale and Charter: and so thence hastening to meete the Corps of his deceased Vncle, (which was now brought into England) hee honoured that pompous funerall, with his owne, and all his great Prelates and Peeres attendance at Reading; whence presently hee went to Oxford, where he sealed his fore-promised Charter, of many indulgent favours: * prefacing therein, that hee attained the Crowne by Election onely; and that Pope Innocentius confirmed the same; whereby may bee conceived, that his Holinesse, either out of hatred to the Empresse, (whose husband * Henry was no friend to the Papacy) or for some other holy ends, had no small hand in advancing Stephens perjured and disloyall intrusion. The Tenour of the * Charter it selfe is; That all Liberties, Customes, and Possessions, granted to the Church, should be firme and in force; that all Persons and Causes Ecclesiasticall should appertaine onely to Ecclesiasticall Iudicature: that none but Clergymen should ever intermeddle with the vacancies of Churches, or any Church-mens goods; that all bad usages in the Land touching forrests, exactions, &c. should be vterly extirpate, the ancient Lawes restored, &c. As Stephen well knew, that they had chosen him their King, onely to make their vses of him, so these immunities hee granted, rather to bleare their Eyes, then * with any purpose to manacle his owne hands with such Parchment-Chaines.

(5) This his entrance was very peaceable, (saith Gervasius of Canterbury) but by little and little, civill discord increased, to the lamentable destruction of Men, and the Land: whereto Robert Earle of Gloucester, halfe-brother to the Empresse, whose wisedome and power King Stephen much feared, gave a secret beginning, when amongst them that swore him fealty, hee concluded his (as wee said) with this reservation, that his owne authority should bee nothing empaired, meaning no longer to respect him as his King, then the King should him as a Peere: and a generall sufferance to erect Castles, for strength, throughout the Land, was no security to his peaceable estate: Intended indeed to strengthen the Kingdome against Maud the Empresse; but prooved the bane of all subjective obedience: which was politickly considered by Henry Fitz-Empresse, in the conclusion of Peace betwixt King Stephen and him, when a thousand one hundred and fifteene Castles so raised, were againe razed and cast downe.

(6) The first man that professedly set himselfe opposite to Stephens usurpation, was Baldwin de Redvers, who fortified the Citie and Castle of Excester against him; the Welshmen also, bearing in minde the harms that K. Henry had done them, desired revenge, and made many slaughters upon the Kings people: Against these, Stephen proceeded with his band of English and Flemmings, and after a strong and chargeable siege, by famine drew forth Baldwin, his wife, and children, all which he disherited, and expulsed the Land, using so great lenity towards all other offenders there, that it gave great encouragement to others rebellions. But in Wales the businesse prospered not so well, where at Cardigan a great battell was fought, with such slaughter and over-bearing of the English, that the men, by women, were taken and led away Captive, and so many drowned by the full of a Bridge over Temd, that a passage was made over the water with the dead Carkases therein heaped.

(7) Neither thus onely, but some of the English also distasting King Stephen, secretly instigated David King of Scotland, to revenge the wrongs done to the Empresse Maude, a service as they urged it, very gratefull unto her, and even pleasing to God and Man. Hee therefore consenting, invaded the Borders, and tooke from the English both Carleile and New-castle, which he stuffed with Garrisons. Against these, King Stephen prepared, and with a great power came into those parts, where divers accidents by divers reporters are related, yet all agree that ere long peace was concluded, Carleile still enjoyed by King David, and the Earldome of Huntingdon by Prince Henry his sonne; for which he did homage at his fathers command, David himselfe refusing to to doe, (as Hector Boetius the Scottish Writer affirmeth) for that he had given his faith before unto Maud the Empresse.

(8) King Stephen returned, and all in good quiet, he suddenly fell sick of a Lethargy, yea, and in such danger of life, that the common report gave forth he was dead, which stirred great troubles both in England, and else-where; for thereby his friends were stricken into great feare, and the factious more bold to prepare for Queene Maude; for Hugh Bigot one of his chiefest and first raisers, fortified himselfe in the Castle of Norwich, and would not deliver it unto any save onely to the King, yea and very unwillingly also unto him: and in Wales, Owen and Cadwalader the the sonnes of Gruffuth ap Conan Prince of that Country, carried great spoiles from the English, as of other goods, so also of Horse and Armour, and habiliments for warre; likewise in Normandy, Conspiracies began to bud forth; for Geffrey Earle of Anion, who in right of his wife made claime unto all, easily got the hearts and endeavours of many to adhere unto the true heire; possessing himselfe of certaine Castles; but entring further on the Demaines of one Talevaz, a man of note (proscribed for some offence or displeasure by King Stephen) the Normans disliking that, and some other his doings, sent for Theobald Earle of Bloys (Stephens elder Brother) offering him both their Dukedome, and their swords, and lives to defend him in it; who comming to Luxonia, Robert Earle of Glouc.ester, (not unwilling away to weaken King Stephen) delivered unto him upon compostion, the County of Falesa, himselfe carrying no small summe of money thence out of King Henries Treasury, and very throughly, (though secretly) watching all opportunities to advance the title and designes of the Empresse.

(9) Stephen recovered, and hearing these stirres, prepared himselfe first into Normandy, at whose approach, after some small attemps, the people (distracted betwixt feare and sense of their duety) yeelded themselves unto his power; surrendring their fenced Cities, and other strong holds. This good successe thus fortunately begunne, hee hoped further to prosecute, by meanes of a League, which hee lately had made with Lewis the seventh, King of France: and hereupon created Eustace his eldest son living, Duke of Normandy, commanding him to do his homage for the same to Lewis.

(10) Earle Theobald seeing himselfe thus defeated of his hopes and purposes, stormed at the wrongs done by King Stephen; for hee, (his elder by birth; and Bloyses Earledomes lawfull heire) laide his title both for Normandy and England also, now usurped by Stephen his yonger: notwithstanding (rage nought availing without power) hee came to a composition, and remitted his Claime for two thousand markes annually to be paid. Geffrey of Anion likewise, whose title by his Wife was better then them both, nor able at the presnt (being so farre over-matched by the Kings power, wealth, and confederates) to doe what he would, yeelded to necessitie, and for five thousand markes yeerely to be paid, suffered Stephen quietly to enjoy the Crowne.

(11) Having thus at once swept the two greatest rubbes out of his fortunes way, hee well hoped that all cloudes of displeasure, and opposition, were now over-blowne, when unexpectedly newes came, that England was in tumults, the sparkes of conspiracie kindled secretly before in the hearts of factious Peeres, now openly breaking forth, upon advantage of his absence in Normandy: therefore, having not altogether composed his businesse in those parts, he tooke ship for England in the depth of the winter; and even in the Pigill of Christs Nativitie, besieged, and after tooke the Castle of Bedford, that was manned against him in the behalfe of the Scots; about which time David their King having entred Northumberland in the quarrell of Queene Maude, the ruder sort of his Armie (as commonly the best governed is not emptie of such) revenged too tragically the wrongs of the Empresse, in ripping up the wombes of women with childe, and tossing their Infants upon the points of their speares, flaying the Priests at the Altar, and dismembring the slayne bodies in most unhumane manner.

(12) Against these, King Stephen made hastilie forward, affirming it no policie, to give one houres rest unto the Enemie: and threatning more then hee accomplished, entred Scotland; whence after some small reuenge wrought, hee was hastily recalled; so many of his Nobles in England now in Armes against him, that hee was in a fort beset on every side. and what other could hee, a Vsurper, expect from them, but Treason, whom himselfe had formerly taught to be Traitors to their right full Soveraigne? But yet (as no Rebellion was ever without pretence of Reason and Iustice) they alledged, that hee had * violated his Oath touching their Forrests, and other Immunities of Church and Common-wealth: but Church and Common-wealth were but publike colours for private grudges, (as Malmesburie, who then lived, well unfoldeth,) which the Great-Ones conceived against their King, because he would not grant them such Castles, Commands, and Lordships, as themselves liked and expected of him, whom they thought to bee so obliged unto them, that he ought denie them nothing. The endlesse and shamelesse importunities of these men, sometimes hee put off, alleadging thereby, the impaire of his Crownes revenewes; sometimes hee was faine to satisfie, distrusting their falling from him: whose loialty notwithstanding being built on so un-noble grounds, was but coloured, and therefore could not long bee permanent. Neither was it. For Robert of Glocester (the Empresses halfe-brother, and now her chiefe Counsellor and Captaine) finding those particular dislikes apt to be wrought on, and made serviceable for a common behoofe; wherted on with the touch of conscience, and counsells of religious learned men, (who urged him, with the hazard both of his credit, and soule, for neglect of his first, and onely-lawful Oath to the Empresse) sent threatning messages unto King Stephen, charging him with his Oath of Allegiance unto Ladie Maude his Soveraigne, against whom he had shewed himselfe a most perfidious man, and had impiously drawne him, with others, to doe the like; and so denouncing Stephen an open Enemie to the State, and himselfe unto Stephen, made strong his faction with the assistance of many Nobles; among whom, Milo, a chief man of warre, and High Constable to King Stephen, revolted from him, and became a great help to their proceedings.

(13) Earle Robert, (whom ere-soones the enraged King discharged of his honours and possessions in England) tooke into the Castle of Bristow, and made good also his Castle of Slede; his complices likewise did the like in other places: for William Talbot manned the Castle of Hereford, William Lovell the Castle of Cary, Paganell the Castle of Ludlow, William de Mount the Castle of Dunester, Robert de Nichol the Castle of Warram, Eustace Fitz-John the Castle of * Meltune, William Fitz-Alain the Castle of Shrewsburie, and Walkelinus the Castle of Doure. And thus those Forts which were erected to defend the Crowne, first offended the King, some few whereof as he recovered, he flatted to the ground, and wished the other no higher wals; still swearing by Gods Birth (his usuall Oath) hee would not so slightly bee unseated of his Crowne, and wondring what should moove them, who had so readily advanced him, so speedily to unstate him. One fresh motive to these Noble-mens discontents was the Kings * seizing on some great men and their lands, on bare suspicion of their loyaltie; and on the other side, the extraordinarie favour, which Stephen shewed to William de Ypre, and his Flemings (which they interpreted as a contempt of themselves and their Nation) whose counsells he generally followed, and chiefely relyed upon. In disdaine whereof, they sent word to the Empresse, that within five Moneths, thee should have the Realme at command, according to their Oathes made to her Father.

(14) These turmoiles thus working in the bowels of the Kingdome, David King of Scotland had better opportunity to assaile the sides and skirts thereof; and following what hee had begun, with a very great Army entring Northumberland, made great slaughter of the English, and destruction of their Countrey: Against whom the Northern Lords prepared, at the command of Thurstan Arch-bishop of Yorke (left by King Stephen Lieutenant in those parts) who being by sickenesse kept from the Field, appointed appointed Ralph Bishop of Durham his Generall; whose Invective Oration before their joyning of battaile, occasioned upon the fore-said misdemeanors of some undisciplined Scottish, is at large set downe by Hoveden, Huntingdon, Wendover, and others; in the close whereof, he absolveth from punishment of sin, all such of his side, as should die in this battaile: which made the English more desperate in fight, who so sorely pressed upon their enemies, that they forsooke their King, he notwithstanding valiantly persisting, till his dearest friends ernestly urged him to avoid. But his sonne Henry, esteeming more of glory then life, rushed in amongst his retiring souldiers, and with undaunted courage, persw ading them to regard themselves and his presence, with threat of shamefull deaths to all such as fled, he held them in for a time; till at length over-laid with the maine battaile of the English, the magnanimous Prince Henry, likewise quitted the field, bitterly curfing the frowardesse of Fortune, and the mischance that hapned that day.

(15) With like fortunate successe, proceeded Stephen against his disobedient Barons, and wanne from them the Castles of Hereford, Gloucester, Webley, Brissow, Dudley, and Shrewsbury, whereby hee weakned Earle Robert so much, that he was constrained to flie into France, and there instigated his sister the Empresse to come into England.

(16) These domestick opposites thus removed out of his way, King Stephen re-addressed himselfe for the North, to prosecute that which Thurstan had begunne: first therefore winning the Castle of Leids, he went into Scotland, where by the perswasion and prowesse of Mars and Vulcane (saith Paris) a Peace was concluded betwixt the two Kings; and Stephen thence returning, brought Prince Henry, (whom he created Earle of Huntingdon) with him into England, and at the siege of Ludlow-Castle, the adventurous Prince was almost surprised, where the besieged with an Iron Grapple plucket him from his Horse, and so had taken him, but that King Stephen himselfe, with great valour and honour recovered him: who having wonne the Castle, went presently to Oxford, whither newes was brought him that the Empresse was preparing for England.

(17) To make all sure as he went, Stephen thought it good to demolish and raze those Castles lately built, (having had experience to what troubles they had brought him) and to prevent the building of new; and namely, that of the Devise, now (as he surmised) in fortifying against him: hee therefore sent for Roger Bishop of Salisbury (the Founder both of that Castle, as also those other of Sherborn & Malmsbury) a man who in a bad cause had stood King Stephen in good stead, howsoever some envying his greatnesse, had incensed the King against him and other Prelates, as if they were false from his side. The Bishop standing peremptorily on his innocencie, yet mistrusting the event, craved the company of Alexander Bishop of Lincolne, and of Nigell Bishop of Ely; so with a great and well-appointed traine, repaired to Oxford unto the Court, where Stephen had summoned a Grand-Councell of the States.

(18) The King, who expected of Church-men humilitie, seeing them now armed as men for the field, commanded his attendants to take armour likewise, and so entring communication of divers matters with his Peeres and Prelates, their Souldiers casually meeting, fell at variance, where the Bishops friends had the worser, so that many of them were wounded, and the rest forsaking their masters ranne away. This great assembly thus disturbed, the King required the Bishops to satisfie his Court for those outrages of their servants, which satisfaction should be, to deliver the keyes of all their Castles to the King, as pledges of their fidelity, which they refusing, the Bishops of Salisbury and Lincolne were laid hold of; but Ely escaped to the Castle of Devise: Alexander was imprisoned, till hee had yeelded him his Castles of New-warke, and Slaford; Roger the Castles of Sherborne, and the Devises (accounted then one of the goodliest Castles of Europe) besides fourtie thousand Marks in silver; (which losses the Bishop did not long survive.) The King imployed the money to purchase Lady Constance, sister to Lewis King of France, to be wife unto his sonne Eustace: all which was to strengthen himselfe against the Empresse Maud, whose comming hee continually feared, and now before his expectation thee was landed in England, at a fit time for her designes, when all the great Prelates, (who formerly were his chiefest friends) were highly incensed against the King for such oppression of their Brethren.

(19) The place of her arrivall was at the * Port of Arundell, into which Castle shee was joyfully received by William de Albeny, who had married Queen Adeliza, the late wife to King Henry, whose Dowrie it was; from hence Earle Robert diverting his course onely with ten Horse-men, and as many Archers, (for in all hee brought over but one hundred and fourtie with him for so great an exploit) passed thorow the Land unto Wallingford and Gloucester, soliciting his Complices for the aide of his sister the Empresse. * A man who then lived, holds him, in this bold attempt with so small forces, no way inferiour to Iulius Cæsar, whom Livie reports to have begun his civill warre, and to have set himselfe against the whole World, onely with five Cohorts of Souldiers.

(20) King Stephen as then lay in siege of Marleburgh-Castle, but having intelligence of this more dangerous an enemy, dislodged thence, and with all expedition made towards Arundell; whereat the Empresse, wanting her Counsellor, was wonderfully perplext, yet wanted not a womans wit to helpe at need; insomuch that by the report of Gervasius, left her dignity and right might any way be endammaged, shee tooke an oath, that none of these the Kings enemies, by her advice or consent had entred the Land, but with condition to carry themselves orderly, without impeachment of the honour and allegiance due to the King; By which policy (to give it no worse name) shee so satisfied King Stephen (whom all do censure for too much credulity and facilitie towards his foes) that he caused her to be convayed honourably unto Bristow, where shee remained the space of two Moneths, and then got thence unto Wallingford.

(21) Earle Robert in the meane while dispersed the newes of the Empresses approach, unto whose aid so many gathered, that the same Monke reporteth, no man was able to see downe their multitudes in context of Historie, much lesse by way of Computation: then beganne (saith he) both labour and dolour, which brought the whole Realme to a most grievous division, and in a manner to an utter ruine: for those that favoured the King, what evill soever could be wrought or imagined, they did against them that tooke part with the Empresse: and contrariwise, Earle Robert, whose power daily encreased, tortured with cruelties all those that stood for the King; and to augment a more mischiefe, the Flemings left their owne Countrey, and came over by multitudes, like unto a Company of hunger-starved Wolves, seeking to bring the Lands felicitie unto nothing.

(22) Stephen, whose head was now full of troubles, delaid no time to forward his Fortunes, but straightwaies besieged Maud and her brother in Wallingford. Castle; notwithstanding, wearied with long labour, and profiting little, he caused a Tower of wood to be there erected, which he strongly fortified with men and munition, and then removed to the siege of Malmesbury. His brother also of Winchester, a stout and politique Prelate indeede, bestirred all his wilie wittes in Stephens behalfe; for inviting certaine Noble-men to his Palace at Winchester, retained them prisoners, till he had compelled them there, to resigne their Castles to the King. In the meane while Earle Robert subdued and spoyled Worcester: Ralph Painell, in the Empresses favour, burned Nottingham; and Randulph Earle of Chester, joyning in wishes with Robert (whose daughter he married) shewed himselfe not not unwilling to annoy King Stephen, though he had received great honours at his hands. The Empresse her selfe, the better to secure her owne person, and to give accesse unto her favourites, tooke into Lincolne, where she meant to make her abode, storing the City with all provisions necessary.

(23) King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was politike, made straight wayes thitherward, and begirt the City with a straite siege, where hee had surprised his greatest Enemy, had he not found meanes thence to escape: and so possessing himselfe of the City, settled it, and the whole Country in very good quiet. Soone after whose departure, Ranulph Earle of Chester, with his Countesse and Brother, comming to Lincolne, to keepe their Christmas; the Citizens knowing the Kings jealousies, and desirous to curry favour with him, sent secret intelligence, that if hee would surprize both those Brethren, he had now the fittest advantage: whereto the King giving eare, came thither with great expedition; and whiles they, thus circumvented, stood on their guard in the Castle, the Earle escaped forth, and went to crave ayde of the Empresse, for refcue of his Wife and Brother whom hee left besieged. Earle Robert, hearing the newes, and glad of so faire an opportunity, joyned with Ranulph, and they both gathered all their powers both of Welsh and English, for the releefe of their friends in Lincolne: where, resolutely first wading through the River, (which parted them from the Kings Army, and was then deepe) upon Candlemas day, and yeere of Christ Iesus one thousand one hundred forty one, they pitched their Tents, and in the Kings sight ordered their Battaile: One Squadron whereof, was lead by Earle Ranulph: the Disherited were the Guiders of another; in the third was Earle Robert himselfe; and the Welsh-men served for the Wing. Their troupes thus marshalled, Ranulph appointed in rich Armour, and full of brave resolution, spake thus to his followers, in the presence of Robert of Glocester.

" (24) I yeeld you unfained thankes, (invincible " Captaine, and you, our companions in Armes) " which heere so resolutely witnesse your loves unto " mee, upon my sole requeste, even to the hazard of " your owne lives. Sith then, I am the chiefe cause " of this your perill, it well befits me, that I my selfe " be formost in the hazard, and give the first on-set " of battaile against this faithlesse King; who made " us a shew of truce, onely to take advantage for our " ruines; and therefore both mine owne courage, " and the Kings unjust dealing, give mee cause to " hope, that I shall forth-with breake asunder the " strongest array of his Army, and make my way " through their midst, by dint of this my Sword. It " shall be argument of your prowesse, to follow me, " leading you the way, and to imitate mee, giving " you example. My thoughts already tell mee, that " even now I am breaking through his Battles, " trampling on the neckes of his Chief-taines, and " piercing with this my Sword the very sides of the " King himselfe. His speech though short and headdy, as more fitting a Souldier then an Orator, yet well suited with the time, and was seconded with great applause of the Souldiers: Whereupon Robert Earle of Glocester, stept forth and said.

" (25) It is not against right, most noble Earle, " that the honor of this dayes service, and first assault, " should bee permitted unto you, in regard of the " greatnesse both of your descent, and your martiall " atchievement; but yet, if Delcent bee stood on, " I my selfe am both the sonne, and nephew, of a " mighty King; if Valour, heere now are many of " choiseft worth, of whom none living can challenge " precedence for prowesse. But other reason ought " now to sway. For sith the King, contrary to his " Oath made to my Sister, impiously usurped the " Kingdome, he hath made a confusion of all things, " both in causing the bloud of many thousands " to be spilt, and in making many Owners (as him-

" selfe was) of that which was not their owne, by de- " priving other of their rightfull inheritance: These " therefore thus disherited, ought of right (in assu- " rance of helpe from their righteous Iudge and re- " venger) give first assault on their unrighteous op- " pressor; and God who justly judgeth his people, " will (doubtlesse) looke downe from his heavenly " habitation, and will not leave us fuccour-lesse, " whiles in a just cause, wee impugne a most unjust " Intruder. But one thing, (most resolved Cap- " taines and fouldiers) I would have you throughly " to consider, that through these Fennes (which " with so much a doe you have passed) there is no " way fit for escape: heere must wee either vanquish, " or leave our lives, for hope of flight is none at all, " nor is there any other way left us now to goe, but " by our swords into the City: and (if I gesse a- " right) even this, that wee have no meanes to flye, " will bee to us the meanes (by divine assistance) to " get the Victory; because they must needs trust to " their Man-hood, who see no hope to thrive by " their Cowardize. Indeed, the Citizens of Lin- " colne keepe nigh to their houses, and in the brunt of " the Battle, there will their minds bee, and thither " will their heeles follow, whiles you victoriously " shall keepe the Field. And consider farther with " mee, what kinde of Captaines they have: First, A- " laine Duke of Britaine, he comes armed, not against " you, but God himselfe, a furious person, sported " with all filth of sinne, in malice unmatchable, who " thinks it his greatest dishonour, to see any man ex- " cell him in cruelties: With him commeth the trea- " cherous Earle Robert Mellent, the very crafts-ma- " ster of fraud, in whose heart dwels impietie, guile " in his mouth, cowardize in his actions; high of " minde, vaine-glorious in words, degenerous in per- " formance; last in the fight, first in the flight. Next, " comes Hugh By-god, his name neerely sounding his " perjury; who thought it not sufficient to breake " his Oath with the Empresse, but that he must be " once again forsworne (as all the world doth know) " that Henry at his death bequeathed the Crowne " unto Stephen, to the prejudice of his owne daugh- " ter; a man (in a word) who accounts Treacherie " a Vertue, and Perjury a courtly quality. Among " these Gallants, marcheth the Earle Albemarle, a man " of a singular constancy in evill; very ready to at- " tempt, and very loath to leave any mischiefe; whose " Wife, through irkesomeneffe of his insufferable fil- " thy qualities, is gone from him; and the Earle that " keepes her, hee commeth against us too, a notori- " ous Adulterer, and the Non-parcill of impurity, a " true Souldier of Bacchus, a stranger to Mars; to " whom the sight of all bloud, except of the Grape, " is very fearefull. Then setteth forth Simon Earle of " Hampton, whose deeds consist altogether in words, " and whose liberality onely in promises; for when " he hath said, he hath done, and yee get no more. " Lastly, you see heere gathered a knot of Peeres, all " like to their Prince, accustomed to robberies, en- " riched with rapines, fatned with Man-slaughters, " and all tainted with perjury. You therefore (No- " ble spirits) whom great Henry advanced, and this " Stephen hath cast downe, whom Henry made weal- " thy, and Stephen hath impoverished, be now cou- " ragious, and upon assured confidence of your great " valours, yea, of Gods justice, seeke both your just " Revenge, which God even puts into your hands, " on these ungodly wretches; and immortall Glory, " which shall henceforward attend both your selves, " and your posterity for ever. If you are all of this " minde, for executing this Iudgement of God now " upon them, then vow your selves unto God, and " this his service; and forbeare, nay rather forsweare " to shew your backes to your foes.

At which words, all joyntly lifting up their hands, and acclamations unto Heaven, with a terrible shout abjured all thought of flight, and quickning up their brave spirits, advanced gallantly towards the enemy.

King Stephens addresse to the Battle.

(26) King Stephen, the meane while, was farre from being idle, who also ordered his Armie into three severall Battalions: the greatest part and best harnessed, whose Horses he had sent away (perhaps also to deprive his men of all hope of flight) he appointed to remaine on foot with himselfe, and certain of his Nobles, all under one Banner. The Horsemen hee disposed into two severall wings, the one commanded by Alaine Duke of Britaine, Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Simon Earle of Hampton, with the two Earles of Mellent and Warren; and the other Wing was governed by William de Ypres the Flemming. Then the King, because his voyce was not very pleasing or audible, commanded Baldwine Fitz-Gilbert, a Man of great honour and prowesse, to utter his minde unto the Army, who standing conveniently to be heard, spake unto them as followeth:

Matth. Paris. Simon Dun.

Hen. Hunting. Roger Hoved.

"(27) All such as addresse themselves, and expose their lives, to the hazard of battaile, have "three things advisedly to be thought on: The e- "quitie of their cause; the Number of the Forces; "the sufficiency of their men. The first, left they "endanger the state of their Soules; the next, left "they be overlaid with multitude of their enemies; "and the last, left while they presume upon num- "bers, they finde them but faint-hearted, to their "utter ruine. But in all these, we know our selves "to bee sufficiently furnished. The Iustice of our "cause is, for observing the vow made before God "unto our King, to withstand them that have falsifi- "ed their faith, even to the hazard of our lives. For "our number, in Horsemen, tis not inferiour to theirs; "in Foot-men wee farre exceed them: and for suffi- "ciency, what words can equall the noble valour of "so many Earles, Lords, Captaines, and Followers, "trained up ever in the warres? But above all, the "incomparable prowesse and presence of our King, "will be in stead of thousands to us. Sith then this "our Lord, and the Lords Anointed (to whom "you vowed your faith) is in Field heere amongst "you; now performe this your vow unto GOD, "assured, that the more constant you proove in this "your Princes service, and faithfull against those "faithlesse perjured persons, the more shall your re- "ward be at the hands of God, and of him. There- "fore be both couragious and confident, the rather, "considering against whom you fight; even against

"ons are his shame. Chesters Earle, what is hee? a "man audacious, but without all judgement; heady "to plota Treason, but still wavering in the pursuit "of it: ready to runne into battaile, but uncircum- "spect in any danger; ayming beyond his reach, and "conceiting things meerely impossible; and there- "fore hath he few with him that know him, but "lends only a rout of vagrant Rascals: so there is "nothing in him to be feared; for whatsoever hee "begins like a Man, hee ends it like a Woman; un- "fortunate in all his undertakings; in his encoun- "ters still either vanquished, or if he chance (rarely "God wot) on a victorie, it is with farre greater los- "ses then the conquered. The Welshmen hee bring- "eth, are fitter for our contempt then feare: their "rashnesse you may easily see, for it is naked and un- "armed, who wanting both Military Art and Pra- "ctise, runne head-long, like brutes upon the Hunters "lavelins. The rest, as well Nobles (if such they "may be reamed) as common Souldiers, are but "straglers and runnagates: of whom I would wish "their number greater; for the more they be, the "more successesse will be their service. You there- "fore (great Peeres and Worthies) it now bee- "hooveth (and indeed it much behooveth you) to be "very mindfull, both of your Valour, and Noble- "nesse: this day advance your Prowesse to the height,

The welsh.

"and following the fore-steps of your famous An- "cestors, leave to your posteritie both a noble pat- "terne, and an everlasting renowne. Your daily "successe of victories, should quicken your hearts "this day to archieve bravely, and the continuall "miscarrying of our enemies, will quicken their "heeles to flie as speedily: and (I dare say) they al- "ready repent of their comming hither, and are by "this time casting how to be gone, if the nature of "the place would give them leave. Then sith it is "unpossible for them either to fight, or flie; why "come they hither, but even by Gods owne appoint- "ment, to offer themselves, and all their provisions "into your hands? and heere you see their Horses, "their Armour, yea and their bodies, to rest at your "pleasure: reach forth therefore your warlike hands "to seize on that joyfully, which God hath freely "brought you.

Which exhortation hee had scarcely closed, when the noise of Trumpets, and shout of the enemies comming on, was Rhetoricke enough to incite them to their taskes.

The Battle joyn.

Hen. Hunting. Will. Paron. Matth. Paris.

(28) A fore battaile was fought, and with equall successe a long time maintained: for the band of the disherited, whose particular wrongs whetted their courage, (and were therefore politiquely placed in the front) brake terribly into the Kings Vauntguard, and contrariwise William of Ypres into the Welsh, untill the Foreward of the Kings Horse-men began to shrinke backe, and (not without suspition of Treason) galloped away; when presently the Earle of Chester encountred the Kings battaile of Foot, in whose strength 'hee reposed most trust; but it being over-laid with Assailants, began also to faint and to flie, leaving the King enraged, both with his friends faint-heartednesse, and with his foes successe. A very strange sight it was, (saith Paris) there to behold King Stephen, left almost alone in the field, yet no man daring to approach him, whiles grinding his teeth, and foaming like a furious wild Boare, hee drave backe with his Battle-axe whole troupes assayling him, and massacring the chiefest of them, to the eternall renowne of his courage: If but a hundred such had there beene with him, a whole Army had never beene able to surprize his person: yet as hee was single, hee held out, till first his Battle-axe brake, and after that, his Sword also, with the force of his unresistable strokes, flew in peeces; and hee now weaponlesse, and (by an unknowne, doubtlesse an un-noble hand) stricken downe with a great stone throwne at him, was seized on by William of * Kahames, a most stout Knight, and by Earle Roberts command, preserved from any violence to his person, was carried prisoner unto Maud the Empresse at Glouecster, and thence was sent bound unto Bristow, where in the Castle he remained in safe custody.

(29) The Empresse having thus got the Lion in her hold, triumphed not a little in her owne fortune, and now as sole Soveraigne of England, Monarchie, commanded all businesse, elected her Counsellors, and bestowed many dignities, where the most favoured. Notwithstanding, that the altered not her stile of Empresse, or Queene of Romans, may appeare by this her Broad-seale ensuing; under which she granted the custody of the Tower of London unto Geffrey de Mandevil, and his Heires, covenanting with him therein, that shee would not make Peace with the Citizens of London, without the said Geffreys consent, because they were his mortall enemies: but this Earle being afterwards unawares apprehended in the Kings Court at Saint Albans, could not be released, till he had surrendred both the Tower of London, and other his Castles to the King.

(30) But

THE TRVE SCVLPTVRE OF MAVD THE EMPRESSES BROAD SEALE, APPENDANT TO HER CHARTERS.

(30) But the Empresse conducted in State to Winchester, had the Regall Crowne of the Kingdome there delivered her; no man more forward then Henry the Bishop, and Brother of Stephen, who upon the vowing to bee ruled by his advice in affaires of Estate, being then the Popes Legate, solemnely in a Synode of the Clergy, accursed all such as withstood the Empresse, and blessed all them that assisted her intereſt: but both hee, and his friends forgot not to adde that wonted traytorous clause of their oath, so long to keepe faith to her, as shee kept her Covenants with them: and so with applause of the people, shee came to London, and after much perswasion and mediation (for that the Citizens were very stiffe against her) was received into the City with a royall Proceſſion.

(31) Neither was King Stephen thus defeated of England onely, but Normandy also cast off the yoake of subjection; for Geffrey of Anjou, husband of the Empresse, having some intelligence of this atchieved victory, induced the Normans to incline unto him, by publishing the captivation of Stephen, unable now to relieve them, or himselfe; and David King of Scotland for his part was not behind, to set forward the claime of Lady Maud, assuming in her behalfe the County of Northumberland.

(32) Maud thus established, all now esteemed her as Fortunes deare-darling, and beheld her as their onely rising-Sunne; the Prison-walles overshadowing the Presence, feature, and favours of the now-dejected unfortunate Stephen, whose sorrowfull wife Queene Maud, inceſſantly sollicited the Empresse in her Husbands behalfe, desiring his liberty, but not his Crowne, which hee was now contented to let her enjoy; and thereunto offered for pledges many great persons, who protested for him to the Empresse, that hee thenceforth would devote himselfe unto God, and either become a Monke or a Pilgrime: Henry of Winchester also became a suiter unto her in the behalfe of his Nephew Eustace, King Stephens sonne, that the * Counties belonging before to the Father, might be conferred upon the sonne.

(33) The Londoners likewise having received her into the City as their Lady, thought now (as most doe with new Princes) they might have what they would aske, and became her importunate Suppliants, that the over-hard Lawes imposed by her Father, might now be remitted, and those of King Edward might wholly bee in force. But she rejected all these Petitioners, out of Pride, say some; but it may seeme rather of policy, holding it safest, to passe affaires of importance, not upon intreaty, but by due advice, and to governe the subject with a severe austereneſſe, rather then an indulgent lenity. But this too regular strictneſſe, which might have done well in a setled governement, in this her yet greene, and unsecured estate, prooved not so behoovefull. For first, Queene * Maud sent to her sonne Eustace, that their suites must bee obtained onely by warre; willing him to make strong his party by the assistance of the Kentish: the Nobles likewise, Stephens undertakers, repined that they were so slightly regarded, or rather rejected: and the Londoners also storming at the repulse of their desires, devised how they might take the Empresse their Prisoner, and so redeeme King Stephen, to whom their affections were ever firme: but shee hearing of their conspiracy, fled secretly in the night, and tooke into Oxford, which in all her difficulties shee ever found true unto her, out of their love, both to her cause, and to her Father; and threatning due revenge for her late wrongs, wrought it upon the Nobles in prison, and (more then was due or decent) upon Stephen himselfe, whom shee commanded to be laden with Irons, and to bee abridged of all princely services.

(34) Winchesters high mind not broking the Empresses denial of his suite, in behalfe of his Nephew Eustace, upon secret conferences with Queene Maud, by her lamentable entreaties, began to melt in his affection towards the distressed King his brother; and in fine, resolving to try the uttermost for him, absolved all those whom before hee had excommunicated; pretending, that the Barons had all kept faith with her, but she had not kept touch with them; and thinking this a fit time to worke for his brother, sollicited the discontented Londoners in his behalfe, and stored the Castles of Waltham, Farnham, and Winchester with Munition and Men; meane while the Empresse came speedily to Glouecster, to conferre with Milo her chiefest friend, and presently againe returning to Oxford, (* which shee chose for her Court and chiefe place of abode) was there maintained onely at his charge, not having one dayes dyet, or provision of her owne; to requite which fidelity, and other noble services, shee there created him Earle of Hereford.

(35) Her forces recollected, and thither assembled, she went forth with to the City of Winchester, accompanyed with David King of Scotland her uncle, Earle Robert her brother, and many other Nobles; where the Messenger with this equivocall answer, that hee would * with all speed addresse himselfe, as if hee had meant to follow them: so forthwith issuing secretly out of the City, did indeed addresse himselfe to worke her ruine: for sending for Queene Maud, her sonne Eustace, the Londoners, and William Ypres, (afterwards created Earle of Kent) made strong his part, himselfe and friends abiding in the City, whiles the Empresse and her Nobles defenced themselves in the Castle, not adventuring to goe forth amongst so many their mortall enemies: and soone after, to worke his wrathfull will, knowing the Citizens to be more affected to the Empresse then to him, commanded the said City to be set on fire, *Where in, the Monastery of Nunnes, above twenty Churches, * the Covent of Saint Grimbald, and the better part of the City, were consumed to ashes.*

(36) Seven weekes thus spent, in this counter-siege of the City and Castle, the Bishop, to deceive the Empresse, commanded peace to be proclaimed, and the Gates to bee set open towards evening. The Empresse then, who had indured such troubles, and so long a restraint, greatly desired to change her lodging, and to recreate her perplexed spirits in some other place; so taking horse, accompanyed with her brother, Reynold Earle of Cornewall, her servants, and many others her friends, besides Earle Robert, who followed behind with a troupe of Nobles and Knights; presently at the Bishops commandment, shee was pursued by his Souldiers, and many of her traine wounded and taken prisoners; the Empresse by good providence escaped into the Castle of Lutegaresshall, and thence to the Castle Divize: where understanding that shee was still in hazard to be surprized, shee devised, (as what will not necessity endure, and a womans wit devise?) to bee laid in a coffine as dead, bound fast with cordes; and so, as if it had beene her Corse, carried in a Horse-litter to the City of Glocester: in which bonds of her owne distresse, she had good occasion to remember the chaines of King Stephens captivity. To such extreamities were these two Princes at the selfe-same time subject, that whiles they turmoiled for spacious Kingdomes, brought themselves to the very extreame wants, of ayre, and of elbow-roome; but with such dalliance doth Fortune (wee see) oftentimes follow her game, that shee maketh even Monarchs the Balls of her play, and tosseth them lastly into the Hazard, whence hardly they escape with safety of life. Yet this was not the worst; for Earle Robert her brother, whilest hee was busier in providing for her safety then for his owne, was taken by his pursuers at Stowbreg with others; brought backe to Winchester, and there presented by the Bishop unto Queene Maud, King Stephens Wife, who committed him to the custody of William Ypres, and hee for more safety to Glocester; but others taking sanctuary in the Nuns Monastery of Warwell, were burned together with the place: Thus then the King on the one side, and the Earle on the other, were kept in safe custody; but the Queene labouring for the Kings release, and the Countesse for the Earles, many Articles were propounded, and many messengers imployed: at length, this was thought fittest, that Stephen should bee restored to his Kingdome, and Robert under him to have the whole governement of the Land; so that both of them should now joyntly uphold that, which they (the two Ring-leaders) by opposition had cast downe. But Earle Robert as he was no whit dejected in mind, with any frowne of Fortune whatsoever, so reserved hee his fidelity to the Empresse unstained, and unmoved either with feare or faire inticements, still refusing to capitulate for his freedome, but to his Sisters liking; who likewise bare so brave a mind, that were her state never so weake, shee would not consent, nor give the least care to any composition for the Crowne.

(37) Then was enmity increased, the Kingdome divided, and the peoples hatred kindled in maine-taining the factions, all fore-running the ruine of the Land: For these two Chieftaines wearied with irkesomeneſſe of Irons, and hard imprisonment, made exchange the one for the other, without any farther mention of peace, and so studied not onely to renew their former designes, but to encrease the Lands misery by more eager wars. Stephen in England wrought the people for him, and Robert * taking pledges of the Nobles to attend and guard the Empresse at Oxford till his returne, went into Normandy to solicite Geffrey her husband for her defence. But the Earle having troubles with his owne Nobility, and the Normans scarsely brought to any subjection, thought it not convenient by his owne absence for a state in hope, to hazard that in hand; and therefore sent with Robert some strength of Armes, and with them his young sonne Prince Henry into England.
